PUBLISHERS' ADVERTISEMENT. In presenting to subscribers the fifth and last volume of the Comprehensive Commentary, the publishers cannot refrain from expressing their pride and pleasure in being the means of laying before the religious public so important and valuable a work, complete. No pains or expense have been spared to render it in every respect worthy of patronage; and it may justly be said, that no work was ever issued in this country which more completely fulfilled all the promises of the original proposals than this. The number of pages in every volume except the last, exceeds the number stipulated for in the prospectus; while the Engravings are very much more numerous and expensive than was originally anticipated. The amount of matter comprised in the work is almost incredible. The pages are as long and nearly as wide as those of the common quarto Bibles, and the quantity of reading matter, in the whole work, (exclusive of the Supplement,) is equal to that in nearly seventy common octavos of 450 pages each. Printed in such a manner, the matter contained in the five volumes of the Commentary, would have cost the subscribers one hundred and seventy-five dollars, or about THIRTY-FIVE DOLLARS per volume! Or reverse the calculation; and the publishers have furnished subscribers with this great amount of valuable biblical matter, at the rate of less than twenty-five cents each for octavo volumes of 450 pages! A library, indeed, of the most valuable materials, equal to 70 octavo volumes, for fifteen dollars!! The expense of editing has been more than treble the original calculation; and the whole cost of 'getting up' the work (exclusive of paper, printing, and binding) has been about FIFTY THOUSAND DOLLARS.—In conclusion, the publishers return their thanks to those of the subscribers who have continued cheerfully to receive and pay for the successive volumes of the Commentary, and they trust that none such will ever lament having, by their names and patronage, aided in bringing before the American people so important a work, and one calculated to be so extensively useful in our land. It is, in fact, as the publishers believe, a national work, adapted to the times, and to the circumstances of the people of the United States; and one of the most stupendous literary enterprises ever undertaken in America. No man, surely, will ever repent having purchased the work for his own use, or regret to leave so rich a legacy, and so valuable an heirloom to his descendants.

The Supplementary, or sixth volume of the Commentary will be found an almost indispensable companion to the original work, and an invaluable aid to the Minister, Sabbath School Teacher, and every one who desires to study the Bible; and it is to be hoped, that every subscriber will make his set complete by adding this valuable volume.

EDITOR'S NOTICE. Having now, by the Divine blessing, been permitted to bring to a close this fifth volume, which, with the Supplement, will complete the work, that, six years ago, I entered upon with trembling; it is my heart's desire to bless and praise God for his great goodness experienced throughout it. To his glory, and the furtherance of his kingdom of love, righteousness, holiness, and peace, be this labor consecrated and devoted; and may He accept and deign to bless it, for the Redeemer's sake!

No alteration, of great moment, has been made in the arrangements for conducting this volume; but the same helpers have been with me, and their efficient and indispensable exertions appear on every page of it. To the sound judgment and orthodox heart of my invaluable friend, the Rev. Mr. HOADLY, and to the assiduity, care, and taste of my son, J. W. JENKS, M. A., the work, in all its parts, since their early connexion with it, is abundantly indebted. A few contributions of scattered notes have been made by others, and are acknowledged in their places, excepting some which were kindly sent by my friend, Rev. J. WARD, and received too late, and a dissertation by Rev. Mr. BARSTOV; for both which, however, I tender my sincere thanks.

Nothing but such a diligent comparison, as this work necessarily required, of the labors of HENRY and SCOTT, could have shown how greatly the latter was indebted to the former, especially in the Old Testament; and the lack of acknowledgment can be accounted for, and reconciled with principle, only by the consideration, that, possibly, if it had been made in every case where it was due, the work would have been less acceptable to persons of the 'establishment,' whom the writer was very desirous to influence favorably. In the last volume of the New Testament, the originality and force of Dr. SCOTT'S mind more peculiarly display themselves; and to this portion of his labors, probably, may be with most justice applied the well-known commendations of the present bishop of Calcutta; commendations in which generally I can join with great cordiality; holding, as I do, in most respects, the same theological views: yet I can by no means admit, that he is, at any moment, forgetful of his 'system.' On the contrary, no occasion is suffered to escape,—and it may be satisfactorily accounted for,—in which he does not evince his own peculiarities. For this, however, there is abundant occasion to be grateful to God; since, without question, the high and just popularity of the excellent and finished work of this venerable man, combined with its extensive circulation, has tended to produce more distinct tones of evangelical sentiment, and a greater degree of uniformity in it, than previously obtained.

The plan of re-editing, in this country, Henry's Exposition in an abridged form, originated with J. C. HOLBROOK, Esq., and was by him communicated to me. It was soon agreed to combine this with Scott's admirable work, as far as practicable, and to add illustrations from all available sources. To the accomplishment of this plan, brought out into its necessary details successively, Mr. HOLBROOK has devoted himself with unabating industry, talent, and perseverance, and a resolution to spare no needful expense, notwithstanding the overwhelming embarrassments of times unfavorable to literary enterprise. I had feared, that consequent disappointments, and loss of property, would have greatly retarded the appearance of the work, or compelled to its utter abandonment. But the formation of a stock company, under Mr. H.'s superintendence, has, in the good providence of God, scoured now to the Christian community among us its entire publication. It leaves the press with many prayers, I trust, for its usefulness; and the originator and conductor of the enterprise is not to be forgotten in them.

It may be necessary to observe, that, in the notes, illustrations, and original remarks, a considerable range of research has been indulged in, without any other restriction of names, or subjects, than the occasion, and the necessary limits of the work, required. From this cause one advantage, of no small moment, is anticipated,—the creation of a habit, in the readers, of making all their inquiries and acquisitions concur to the elucidation of the blessed Word of God, and the application of its salutary truths to the diversified character and wants of man, in his education to be useful here, and prepared for higher service and blessedness in eternity.

AN EXPOSITION OF THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES.

WE have seen the foundation of our holy religion laid in the history of our blessed Savior, its great Author, as related and left on record by four several inspired writers, who all agree, That Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God. Upon this Rock the Christian church is built; and how it began to be built thereon, comes here next to be related. I. This history looks back to the preceding Gospels; the promises there, are here made good; particularly the great promise of the descent of the Holy Ghost, and his wonderful operations, both on, and with the apostles, making the Word mighty which had been before comparatively preached in vain. The commission there granted to the apostles we here find executed, and the powers there lodged in them exerted in miracles wrought on the bodies, and much greater miracles on the minds of people, in pursuance of Christ's purposes and promises, which we had in the Gospels. The proofs of Christ's resurrection, which the Gospels closed with, are here abundantly corroborated, not only by the constant and undaunted testimony of those that conversed with Him after He rose, (who had all before deserted Him, and one of them denied Him,) but by the working of the Spirit with that testimony for the conversion of multitudes, according to the word of Christ, that his resurrection, the sign of the prophet Jonas, which was reserved to the last, should be the most convincing proof of his divine mission. II. It looks forward to the following epistles, introduces, and is a key to them, as the history of David is to David's Psalms.

The four Gospels showed us how the foundation of God's house was laid; this shows us how the superstructure began to be raised. 1. Among the Jews and Samaritans, which we have an account of in the former part of this book. 2. Among the Gentiles, which we have an account of in the latter part: from thence, and downward to our own day, we find the Christian church subsisting in a visible profession of faith in Christ, as the Son of God and Savior of the world, made by his baptized disciples, incorporated into religious societies, steadily meeting in religious assemblies, attending on the apostles' doctrine, and joining in prayer and breaking of bread, under the conduct and precedency of men that gave themselves to prayer and the ministry of the Word, and in a spiritual communion with all in every place that do likewise. Such a body as this there is now in the world, which we belong to: and in this book we find the rise and original of it, vastly different from the Jewish church, and erected on its ruins; but undeniably appearing to be of God, and not of man.*

Its penman was Luke, who, as Whitby shows, was, very probably, one of the 70 disciples; it should seem he wrote this history when with Paul at Rome, during his imprisonment there, for the history concludes with Paul's preaching there in his own hired house. Its title is, The Acts of the Apostles; of the holy Apostles, so the Greek copies generally. Rev. 18:20. One copy inscribes it, The Acts of the Apostles by Luke the Evangelist. It is the history of the apostles; yet here is in it the history of Stephen, Barnabas, and some other apostolical men, not of the 12. And of those that were apostles, the history of Peter and Paul only is here recorded; Peter the Apostle of the circumcision, and Paul the Apostle of the Gentiles, Gal. 2:7. But this suffices as a specimen of what the rest did in other places, pursuant to their commission, for they were none of them idle. † It is called their acts, or doings. The history is filled with their sermons and their sufferings; yet so much did they labor in their preaching, and so voluntarily did they expose themselves to sufferings, and such were their achievements by both, that they may very well be called their acts. ‡

Luke, undoubtedly, intending this book as an appendix to his Gospel, inscribes it likewise to Theophilus. (Pref. to Luke.) Indeed, the whole may be considered as one publication, in two parts: but the convenience of having the four Gospels together, seems to have induced Christians in early times to divide it, by inserting John's Gospel between these two parts. It was written (as may fairly be concluded) within 30 or 31 years after our Lord's crucifixion. But the circumstance which most of all demands our attention, and should raise our expectations respecting it, is this; it records the fulfilment of the ancient prophecies concerning the kingdom of the promised Messiah, and the manner in which it should be established in the world; and also of those predictions, or promises which our Lord gave to his disciples, 'while He was yet with them,' concerning the powers to be bestowed on them, the success of their labors, and their persecutions. (Notes, Mat. 10:16—23. 24:6—8. Lu. 10:17—20, v. 18. 21:12—19. Jn. 12:27—33, vv. 31, 32. 14:7—14, vv. 12, 25, 26. 15:17—21. 16:1—3, 7—13.) SCOTT.

'The Acts comprise a history of about 30 years, from the Savior's ascension, to Paul's arrival at Rome after his appeal to Cesar. . . The book being continued to the 2d yr. of Paul's imprisonment, could not have been written before A. D. 63; and as his death in 65 is not mentioned, was probably composed before. Hence Mich., Lard., Bens., Ros., Toml., and the generality of critics, date it in 63: to its genuineness and authenticity, the earlier Christian fathers bear unanimous testimony.' HORNE.

* It is fact, that the religion of Jesus the Nazarene, who expired on a cross at Jerusalem, 1800 years ago, was soon very extensively propagated among the nations; that it obtained a permanent establishment, which it preserves to this day; and that the prophets had foretold that this would be the case, as to the kingdom of the Messiah: but the book before us is the only history, which expressly relates the manner in which this religion was first promulgated.—Here we are informed, that 11 obscure men, whom Jesus had called to be his attendants and apostles, having continued with Him till his crucifixion, saw and conversed with Him after his resurrection, and afterwards beheld Him ascend from them towards heaven, † till a cloud received Him out of their sight. ‡ In a few days, having appointed one in the room of the 12th, who had betrayed his Lord and destroyed himself, and being accompanied with a small number of disciples, the Holy Spirit, according to the promise of their Lord, descended upon them in a most extraordinary manner, enabling them to speak divers languages, and work stupendous miracles; and in all respects qualifying them for their arduous undertaking. Accordingly, without further delay, within less than 2 months from the time when Jesus was crucified; and at Jerusalem, under the immediate notice of his crucifiers, they began boldly to declare, that He was risen from the dead, ascended into heaven, and exalted at the right hand of God; that He was the promised Messiah, 'the Prince of Life,' the Savior and Judge of the world, and as such entitled to all confidence, obedience, and adoration; and openly to charge the people, the priests, and the rulers, with murdering 'the Lord of glory.' They were themselves unarmed, and unprotected, except by a divine power; they possessed neither human learning, eloquence, nor influence: yet they had all the wisdom and the folly, the learning and the ignorance, the religion and the irreligion, with all the obstinate and varied prejudices, and corrupt passions and habits of the whole world to encounter; as well as the power of rulers and princes to oppose them: notwithstanding which, they became decidedly and permanently triumphant. They employed no weapons, but simple testimony to the facts which they had witnessed, cogent arguments, affectionate persuasions, holy, beneficent lives, fervent prayers, and patient sufferings, even unto death.—With the Jews they reasoned from the SS. of the O. T., and showed how exactly these had been fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth; and when they afterwards went among the Gentiles, they reasoned with them from such principles as they themselves acknowledged.—Proceeding in this manner, and everywhere attended by a divine power, both manifested in undeniable miracles, and by inwardly preparing men's hearts to receive the truth; they had such astonishing success, that many hundreds of thousands, if not millions, not only from among the Jews and proselytes, but also from the grossest and most licentious idolaters, became the avowed disciples of the crucified Jesus, and the devoted worshippers and servants of 'the one living and true God.' Thus, in 'the Acts of the Apostles,' there is given us the only history of the manner, in which the most extraordinary revolution that ever took place in the moral and religious state of the world was first begun: and if this account be true, the Gospel must be divine. Jerusalem, Cesarea, Antioch, and Ephesus, all great and celebrated cities, nay, Rome itself, the proud capital of the world, were among the places, in which the miracles are attested to have been wrought, and the success attained, in the full view of the vehement and powerful opposers who never ventured to deny the facts, though they could not account for them, without allowing the truth of the Gospel.—To suppose, that such a religion as Christianity, which directly opposes every corruption of the human heart, without making the least allowance, either to persons in the highest stations, or to its most zealous friends, could have prevailed in the world as it has, by such instruments and means, and in the face of such powerful opposition, without the power of God succeeding it; is to assume, without shadow of proof, a fact immensely more incredible, than any of the miracles recorded in Scripture, or all of them combined.

† We must not here expect a full and particular history of the labors and successes of the apostles and primitive evangelists: a select specimen alone is given. After the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, and the first successes and sufferings of the apostles, little is recorded in the Scripture concerning most of them. Indeed the names of more than half of them are never mentioned after the first ch.; and most of the ancient records and traditions of them are so mingled with fiction, as not to be entitled to implicit or indiscriminate credit. The events of several years of Paul are summed up in 2 or 3 chs. And though, after Luke the historian joined him, and became his faithful companion, (shown by his using 'we,' in the narrative,) he is somewhat more circumstantial; yet Paul's epistles prove his labors, persecutions, and successes far greater, and instructive to his converts far more particular, than a cursory reading of this history would lead us to suppose. At the same time, the remarkable coincidence, even in minute particulars, of the history and the epistles, is such, as could never have taken place, had not both been genuine. See Paley. See.

‡ Luke does not write a complete ecclesiastical history of the church for 30 yrs. nor of Paul's life, for he has wholly omitted what passed among the Jews after Paul's conversion, and is totally silent concerning the spread of Christianity in the E. and in Egypt, as well as the foundation of the church of Christ at Rome, Paul's journey into Arabia, and other interesting topics and labors. We shall perceive the historian had 2 objects in view:—1. To relate how the gifts of the Holy Spirit were communicated at Pentecost, and the subsequent miracles of the apostles, by which the truth of Christianity was confirmed. An authentic account of this matter was absolutely necessary, because Christ had often assured his disciples that they should receive the Holy Spirit: unbelievers, therefore, whether Jews or heathens, might have made objections to our religion, had not this been shown.—2. To deliver such accounts as proved the claim of the Gentiles to admission into the church of Christ,—a claim disputed by the Jews, especially at the time Luke wrote the Acts. Hence the relations, chs. 8, 10, 11.—3. Mich. too, thinks it probable, Luke might design only to record the facts he had either seen himself, or heard from eyewitnesses.—Dr. Benson, however, thinks the book was written, to show in its 3 parts, how the Gospel was propagated. I. Among the Jews only, from A. D. 33 to A. D. 41; this first part including ch. 2 to 12:2. II. Among the devout Gentiles, (proselytes of the gate,) and further among the Jews, A. D. 41 to 44. Acts, 10—12. III. Among the idolatrous Gentiles, and further among the 2 preceding classes, A. D. 44 to 63. Acts, chs. 13—28. Horne: whom see, (with Hug.) for Chronology of Acts; and for an Analysis. Comp. too, 'Sacred Chron.' Ed.

§ The book contains also a specimen of true believers, as illustrating the nature and effects of genuine Christianity: and it should be carefully noted, that, in every age, all those multitudes who are called Christians, yet bear no resemblance to this specimen, will be driven away as chaff, at the great decisive day: and that the more we are like these primitive believers, when 'great grace was upon them all,' the more evident it is, that we shall 'be numbered with them in glory everlasting.'—Some intimations are also given of the manner, in which the primitive church was constituted and governed, its ministers appointed, its ordinances administered; yet it can hardly be supposed, but that the eager disputants of all sects must feel considerably disappointed in this respect; and secretly regret, that more particular and explicit information has not been given on these subjects; but this the Lord for wise reasons has seen good to withhold. Scott. 'If a man wishes to learn how to preach well, he can probably acquire it nowhere else so readily as by giving himself to the prayerful and profound study of the specimens contained in this book. At the same time, we have here a view of the character of the true church of Christ. The simplicity of this church must strike every reader. Religion is represented as a work of the heart; the pure and proper effect of truth on the mind. It is free from pomp and splendor, and from costly and magnificent ceremonies. There is no apparatus to impress the senses, no splendor to dazzle, no external rite or parade adapted to draw the affections from the pure and spiritual worship of God. How unlike the pomp and parade of Pagan worship! How unlike the vain and pompous ceremonies which have since, alas! crept into no small part of the Christian church.' Barnes.

CHAP. I.

1 Christ preparing his apostles to the beholding of his ascension, gathereth them together into the mount Olivet, commandeth them to expect in Jerusalem the sending down of the Holy Ghost, promiseth after few days to send it: by virtue whereof they should be witnesses unto Him, even to the utmost parts of the earth. 9 After his ascension they are warned by two angels to depart, and to set their minds upon his second coming. 12 They accordingly return, and giving themselves to prayer, choose Matthias apostle in the place of Judas.

3 To whom also he shewed himself alive after his passion by many <sup>d</sup> infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God :

4 And, <sup>e</sup> being assembled together with them, commanded <sup>f</sup> them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith he, ye <sup>g</sup> have heard of me.

CHAP. I. The inspired historian begins his narrative of the Acts of the Apostles with a brief recapitulation of his gospel, or history of the life of Christ, inscribing this, as he had done that, to his friend Theophilus.

V. 1-5. It was usual with the ancients, both Christian and heathen writers, thus to inscribe their writings to some particular persons. But the directing of some of the books of the Scripture so, is an intimation to each of us to receive them as if directed to us in particular, to us by name, for our learning. His gospel he here called the former treatise, intending this for a continuation and confirmation of that: let not new sermons and new books make us forget old ones.

I. Christ both did and taught; v. 2. His doctrine was confirmed by his miracles, which proved Him a Teacher from God, John 3:2. Those are the best ministers, that both do and teach, whose lives are a constant sermon. His apostles were to carry on and continue what He began, Heb. 2:3.

NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1-3. The phrase, 'began both, &c.' simply means, what Jesus had done and taught, [comp. Gen. 9:20. Mark 6:7. &c.] from the beginning to the close of his public ministry.—The use of the word 'all,' in this connexion, when so many miracles and discourses of our Lord are recorded by the other evangelists, is a full demonstration, that arguments tending to establish universal conclusions, from this general term, must be precarious. (Jahn 1:6-9) —The expression, 'by the Holy Ghost,' may either refer to our Lord's choosing the apostles, or to his giving them commandments after his resurrection: but the latter seems to be intended; as He 'breathed on them, and bade them receive the Holy Ghost;' and as He then 'opened their understandings, that they might understand the Scriptures.' (Luke 24:44-49. Jahn 20:19-23, vv. 22, 23.) All those things which Jesus did and taught, in respect of his human nature, are ascribed to the Holy Spirit; as well as the endowments which He conferred on his disciples.—It is also stated, that Jesus 'showed Himself alive' to his apostles, after his death, by many signs, or evidences, which could not possibly deceive them. It is highly probable, that a great deal more [concerning the kingdom of God] passed between our Lord and his apostles, in the course of the 40 days preceding his ascension, than is anywhere recorded. Scott.

(1.) Treatise.] 'Logos: a narration, history, or a book of a history; so the best Gr. writers (see Welstein, &c.) use it.' Bloomf. Theophilus.] See Luke 1:3. All.] 'This often signifies indefinitely, a large portion or number, or a great part. Webster. It is so used Acts 13:10. 1 Tim. 1:16. Ja. 1:2. Mat. 23. 3:5. Acts 2:5. Rom. 11:26. Col. 1:6.' Barnes. It is a 'popular mode' of speaking, like the phrase, all-about, &c. Ed.

(2.) Through, &c.] 'Whatever was done after the atonement and resurrection of Jesus, after He had finished his great work, was to be regarded as under the peculiar influence and direction of the Holy Ghost.' Barnes. 'There has been much doubt on the construction, and consequently on the interpretation of this passage. Kuin, follows Beza, Heumann, Kypke, Mich., and Ros., who place a comma after "apostolais,"

II. The truth of Christ's resurrection is maintained and evidenced, v. 3. That part of what was related in the former treatise, was so material, that it was necessary to be on all occasions repeated.

1. The proofs were infallible, plain indications, both that He was alive, (He walked, talked, ate, drank with them,) and that it was He Himself, for He showed them, again and again, the marks of the wounds in his hands, and feet, and side; the utmost proof the thing was capable of, or required.

2. They were many, and often repeated; He was seen by them 40 days; not constantly, but frequently appearing to them, and bringing them by degrees to be fully satisfied of it, so as to do away all their sorrow for his departure. Christ's staying on earth so long after He was entered on his state of exaltation and glory, to confirm his disciples' faith, and comfort their hearts, was such an instance of condescension and compassion to believers, as may fully assure us, that we have a High Priest touched with our infirmities.

III. A general hint of the instructions He furnished his disciples, now He was about to leave them.

1. Concerning their work; Christ's choice is always attended with his charge. It was their receiving the Holy Ghost, that sealed their commission, John 20:22. He was not taken up till He had thus finished his work.

2. Concerning the doctrine they were to preach; the things pertaining to the kingdom of God; He let them more into the nature of it, as a kingdom of grace in this world; and of glory in the other; and opened to them that covenant, the great charter by which it is incorporated. This was intended to prepare them to receive the Holy Ghost, and to be one of the proofs of his resurrection, so it comes in here; the disciples, to whom He showed Himself alive, knew that it was He, not only by what He showed them, but by what He said to them. None but He could speak thus clearly, thus fully, of the things of the kingdom of God.

IV. A particular assurance, that they should now shortly receive the Holy Ghost, with orders to expect it, v. 4, 5. He being assembled together with them, probably in the interview at the mountain in Galilee, which He had appointed before his death; for there is mention of their coming together again, v. 6. to attend his ascension. Though ordered to Galilee, yet they must not continue there, but return to Jerusalem, and not depart thence.

1. The command to wait, was to raise their expectations of something great: in Jerusalem must the Spirit be first poured out, because Christ was to be as King upon the holy hill of Zion; and because the Ward of the Lord must go forth from Jerusalem. This favor done to Jerusalem, teaches us to forgive our enemies and persecutors.

2. His assurance that they shall not wait in vain. They had already been breathed upon with the Holy Ghost, John 20:22. but now they shall have larger measures of his gifts, graces, and comforts, and be baptized with them; where there seems to be an allusion to those O. T. promises of the pouring out of the Spirit, Joel 2:28. Is. 44:3.—32:15. 'Ye shall be cleansed and purified by the Holy Ghost, as the priests were baptized and washed with water, when consecrated to the sacred function. Ye shall be sanctified by the truth, as the Spirit shall lead you more and more into it, and your consciences purged by the witness of the Spirit, that ye may serve the living God in the apostleship. Ye shall hereby be more effectually than ever engaged to your Master, as Israel to Moses in the cloud, and in the sea, so that ye shall never, for fear of any sufferings, forsake Him again, as once you did.'

1st. The Spirit was given by promise, at this time the great promise, as that of the Messiah was before, Luke 1:72. and that of eternal life is now, 1 John 2:25. Temporal good is given by Providence, but the Spirit and spiritual blessings by promise, Gal. 3:18. not as the spirit of men, by a course of nature, Zech. 12:1. but by the Word of God. As Christ, so the Spirit, is received by faith.

2dly. It was the promise of the Father, of Christ's Father, owning his mission; our Father, who, if He give us the adoption of sons, will certainly give us the Spirit of adoption, Gal. 4:5, 6.

3dly. This promise of the Father they had heard from Christ many a time, especially in the farewell sermon a little before He died, wherein He assured them, again and again, that the Comforter should come.

You have not only heard it from Me, but you had it from John; when he turned you over to Me, he said, Mat. 3:11. I indeed baptize you with water, but He that comes after me, shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost. A great honor Christ now does to John, to make this great gift of the Spirit, now at hand, to be the accomplishment of his words.

Now this gift of the Holy Ghost thus promised, prophesied of, waited for, is what we find the apostles received in the next ch., for in that this promise had its full accomplishment; for it is here promised to be given transposing only the "hous," [whom.] This trajectio [transposition] is, he thinks, the easiest, and, (since in whatever way the words be taken, some trajectia must be admitted,) is, upon the whole, preferable. This punctuation is found in some MSS., and is confirmed by the Syr., Arabic, and Ethiop. vers. and Cyril. Nor is the transposition unusual, as 3:24. John 9:40. Comp. Cicero against Verres, 3:31. After all, however, the [Eng. vers.] seems most satisfactory, and, as being supported by the ancient Fathers, may deserve the preference. Bloomf.

(3.) Showed Himself.] The appearances of Christ that are distinctly noted in the N. T., are, (1.) To Mary Magdalene and the other Mary, Mat. 28:1-9. (2.) To the two near Emmaus, Lu. 24:15. (3.) To Simon Peter, Lu. 24:34. (4.) To 10 apostles, Lu. 24:36. Ju. 20:19. All these appearances were on the day of his resurrection. (5.) To 11 apostles, Ju. 20:26. (6.) To 7 apostles in Galilee, Ju. 21:4. (7.) To James, 1 Cor. 15:7; most probably in Jerusalem, and when He ordered all his apostles to assemble, as in Acts 1:4. See Bp. Pearce. (8.) When they were assembled, and Jesus led them out as far as Bethany, Lu. 24:50, whence He ascended: then He seems to have been seen by the 500, 1 Cor. 15:6. [Barnes makes out 13 appearances.] Forty.] At intervals during that period. Kingdom of God.] The Christian religion, the Christian dispensation, 'the church (so Schaeftgen) of the N. T. times, whose k. is Christ.' Bloomf. Passion.] 'I. e. suffering: so the Gr. is in 1 Pet. 1:11. 4:13.' Barnes.

V. 4-8. Notwithstanding all He had taught them, they still entertained some thoughts of a temporal kingdom: perhaps they supposed, the pouring out of the Holy Spirit would induce the nation, in general, to acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah; and that He would then perform, what they supposed to be the meaning of the ancient prophets in this respect. 3:19-21, v. 21. It is, however, not only difficult, but perhaps impossible, to delineate, with any tolerable precision, the state of the apostles' minds at this crisis; in which darkness and light, hopes and fears, carnal and spiritual views and expectations were blended so intimately, that almighty power alone could separate them. And this was

5 For John <sup>h</sup> truly baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy <sup>i</sup> Ghost not many days hence.

6 When they therefore were come together, they asked of him, saying, Lord, wilt <sup>j</sup> thou at this time restore <sup>k</sup> again the kingdom to Israel?

7 And he said unto them, It <sup>l</sup> is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power.

8 But ye shall receive <sup>m</sup> power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye <sup>n</sup> shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth.

9 And when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up; and a cloud received him out of their sight.

10 ¶ And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold, two <sup>o</sup> men stood by them in white apparel; now restore it to the Jewish nation, as far as it will submit to Thee as its king! Two things were amiss:

11 Which also said, Ye men <sup>p</sup> of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall <sup>q</sup> so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.

1. Their expectation of the thing itself, that Christ would restore [and perfect] the kingdom to Israel, i. e. make the nation of the Jews as great and considerable as it was in the days of David, Solomon, Asa, and Jehoshaphat; whereas Christ came to set up his own kingdom, and that a kingdom of heaven, not to restore the kingdom to Israel, an earthly kingdom. See how apt even good men are to place the happiness of the church too much in external pomp and power! How apt we are to retain what we have imbibed, and how hard it is to get over the prejudices of education! The disciples having early imbibed the notion, that the Messiah was to be a temporal prince, were slow to have any idea of his kingdom as spiritual. See also how naturally we are biassed in favor of our own people! They thought God would have no kingdom in the world, unless it were restored to Israel; whereas the kingdoms of this world were to become his, in whom He would be glorified, whether Israel sink or swim. See also how apt we are to misunderstand Scripture, and to understand that literally, which is spoken figuratively, and to expound Scripture by our schemes, whereas we ought to form our schemes by the Scriptures. But when the Spirit shall be poured out from on high, our mistakes will be rectified, as the apostles' soon after were.

2. Their inquiry concerning the time; they were inquisitive into what their Master had never directed or encouraged them to inquire into, and were impatient for the setting up of that kingdom, in which they promised themselves so great a share, and would anticipate the divine counsels. Christ had told them, that they should sit on thrones, Luke 22:30. and now nothing will serve but they must be in the throne immediately; whereas he that believeth, doth not make haste, but is satisfied that God's time is the best time.

II. Christ's check to this question, as a little before to Peter's concerning John, v. 7. Christ is now parting from them, and parts in love; yet He gives them this rebuke, which is intended for a caution to his church in all ages, to take heed of splitting on the rock which was fatal to our first parents,—an inordinate desire of forbidden knowledge, and intruding into things which we have not seen, because God has not shown. Buxtorf mentions a saying of the Rabbins concerning the coming of the Messiah; Perish the men who calculate the time!

III. He appoints them their work, and with authority assures them of an ability to go on with it, and of success in it, v. 8. If Christ make us servicable to his honor, in our own day and generation, let that be enough for us, and let not us perplex ourselves about times and seasons to come. Christ here tells them,

1. That their work should be honorable and glorious; Ye shall be witnesses, martyrs, unto Me. They shall proclaim him King, and confirm their testimony, not, as witnesses do, with an oath, but with the divine seal of miracles and supernatural gifts.

2. That their power for this work should be sufficient. They had not strength of their own for it, nor wisdom or courage enough; But ye shall receive the power of the Holy Ghost coming upon you, so it may be read, shall be animated and actuated by a better spirit than your own; ye shall have power to preach the Gospel, and to prove it out of the Scriptures of the O. T., which, when they were filled with the Holy Ghost, they did to admiration, ch. 18:28. 'and to confirm it both by miracles and by sufferings.'

3. That their influence should be great and very extensive; Ye shall be witnesses for Christ, and shall carry his cause, first, in Jerusalem, and thence throughout all Judea, where before ye have labored in vain. Thence ye shall proceed to Samaria, though at your first mission ye were forbidden to preach in any of the cities of the Samaritans. Your usefulness shall reach to the uttermost part of the earth, and ye shall be blessings to the whole world.

IV. Having left these instructions with them, He leaves them, v. 9. so we were told, Luke 24:50. and while they had their eye fixed on Him, receiving his blessing, He was gradually taken up, and a cloud received Him out of their sight. He went, not as Elijah, in a chariot and with horses of fire, but He rose to heaven, as He rose from the grave, purely by his own power; his body being now, as the bodies of the saints will be at the resurrection, a spiritual body, and raised in power and incorruption.

V. Two angels appeared to them, and delivered them a seasonable message from God. There was a world of angels ready to receive our Redeemer, now that He made his public entry into the Jerusalem above: these two, appear as two men in white apparel, bright and glistening; for they know, according to the duty of their place, that they are really serving Christ, when ministering to his servants on earth. We are told what they said,

1. To check their curiosity. Why stand ye gazing, as men frightened and perplexed, as men astonished and at their wits' end? Christ's disciples should never stand at a gaze, because they have a sure rule to go by, and a sure foundation to build upon.

2. To confirm their faith concerning Christ's second coming: which their Master had often told them of. When we stand gazing and trifling, the consideration of our Master's second coming should quicken and awaken us: and when we stand gazing and not many days hence. He does not tell them how many, because they must keep every day in a frame fit to receive it. Other Scriptures speak of the gift of the Holy Ghost, to ordinary believers, this speaks of that particular power which, by the Holy Ghost, the first preachers of the Gospel, and planters of the church, were endued with; enabling them infallibly to relate to that age, and record to posterity, the doctrine of Christ, and the proofs of it; so that by virtue of this promise, and the performance of it, we receive the N. T. as of divine inspiration, and venture our souls upon it.

V. 6—11. Here we have an account of Christ's ascension. Observe,

I. The question the disciples asked Him at this interview, 'Surely Thou wilt not at all restore the kingdom to the present rulers of Israel.' Or rather, 'Surely Thou wilt done, at once, and effectually, in most things, by the descent of the Holy Spirit: though in a few particulars, they were left, for some time longer, under a degree of error or prejudice.—The change wrought in the minds and hearts of the apostles, on the day of Pentecost, was as truly miraculous as the gift of tongues. They were no longer the same men; nay, in many respects, men of a widely different spirit and character; possessing an enlargement of mind, and a superiority to carnal prejudices, hopes, and fears, beyond what could have possibly been previously conceived.

(4.) Promise. 'Evangelian: the effects of divine power, i. e. the faculties and strength necessary to their office, or the divine power showing its efficacy in them, John 14:16, 17.'

(6.) 'At this time, is the point of their inquiry; to this solely, therefore does Christ answer.'

(8.) Uttermost. Commentators say, this expression must not be too much pressed; but the Japanese have traditions of a religion once made known among them of similar character to the Christian; and we have no proof that some, even, of those present did not carry the Gospel even to the farthest corners (then peopled) of America, Africa, and Oceania. It would be both curious and profitable to collect the dim recollections, in all these nations, of holy teachers coming among them from remote regions. The Mexicans and Peruvians have such traditions.

V. 9—12. The instructions and promises, which have been considered, seem to have been delivered, as our Lord was leading the disciples forth to that part of the mount of Olives, whence He ascended.—The place belonging to the village of Bethany, from which Jesus ascended, was about a mile from Jerusalem: this was called a sabbath-day's journey; probably, because it might generally be necessary to go so far on that day, in order to attend the service of the synagogue.

(11.) In like manner ] Among other reasons why Jesus should thus return, Barnes gives the following: 'The great transactions of redemption have been public, open, often grand. The apostasy was public, in the face of angels and the universe. Sin has been open, public, high-handed. Misery has been public, and has rolled its deep and turbid waves in the face of the universe. Death has been public; all worlds have seen the race cut down and moulder. The death of Jesus was public; the angels saw it; the heavens were clothed with mourning; the earth shook; and the dead arose. The angels have desired to look into these things, (1 Pet. 1:12.) and have felt an intense solicitude about men. Jesus was publicly whipped, cursed, crucified; and it is proper that He should publicly triumph; that all heaven rejoicing, and all hell at length humbled, should see his public victory. Hence He will come in the clouds, (emblem of sublimity.)—with angels,—with fire,—and will raise the dead, and exhibit to all the universe the amazing close of the scene of redemption. . . . These vs. present the most grand and wonderful events this world has ever known . . . consolation for the Christian . . . ceaseless alarm to the sinner.'

12 ¶ Then returned they unto Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet, which is from Jerusalem a sabbath-day's journey.

13 And when they were come in, they went up into an upper room, where abode both Peter, and James, and John, and Andrew, Philip, and Thomas, Bartholomew, and Matthew, James the son of Alpheus, and Simon Zelotes, and Judas the brother of James.

14 These all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication, with the women, and Mary the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren.

15 ¶ And in those days Peter stood up in the midst of the disciples, and said, (the number of the names together were about an hundred and twenty,) 16 Men and brethren, this scripture must needs have been fulfilled, which the Holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake before concerning Judas, which was guide to them that took Jesus.

17 For he was numbered with us, and had obtained part of this ministry.

18 Now this man purchased a field with the reward of iniquity; and falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out.

19 And it was known unto all the dwellers at Jerusalem; insomuch as that field is called in their proper tongue, Aceldama, that is to say, The field of blood.

trembling, the consideration of it should comfort and encourage us.

V. 12-14. We are here told,

1. From whence Christ ascended, v. 12. from that part of the mount of Olives, where the town of Bethany stood, Luke 24:50. There He began his sufferings, Luke 22:39. therefore, there He rolled away the reproach of them, by his glorious ascension, and thus showed that his passion and his ascension had the same reference and tendency. Thus would He enter on his kingdom in the sight of Jerusalem, and of those ungodly, ungrateful citizens of his, that would not have Him to reign over them. It was prophesied

(12.) 'A "sabbath-day's journey" was 2,000 cubits or paces, or 7½ stadia, Lu. 24:13. Ju. 11:18. This had been determined, not by Moses but by the Rabbins. See Lightf. The distance of Olivet is variously stated at 6, or 5 stadia; either might be correct, according to the point in Jerusalem, or in the mountain, reckoned from.' Bloomf.

V. 13, 14. Mary is mentioned in a very cursory manner, as one of the company who joined in prayer; but without any peculiar distinction, or the least appearance of her exercising authority over the apostles, or even of giving them counsel, or at all interfering in their measures.—Continued. 'The word signifies, to go on, in performing or enduring any thing, courageously, and with a certain invincible hardness and resolution of mind.' Beza. 'Pursued with great ardor and intentness of soul.' Doddridge.

(13.) Upper-room. Note, Jer. 22:13, 14. 'Epiphanius says, it was on Mt. Sion, and that a church was afterwards erected on the place where it stood.' Doddridge.

V. 15. Names. 'I. e. persons, men: (Rev. 3:4.) so used by Polybius, Ovid, Statius, Horace.' Bloomf. The Jews required 120 for a council, in any city, so some suppose the disciples took care to get that number together.

V. 16-18. It is most reasonable to suppose Peter was directed by a divine admonition, to take the lead on this occasion; and the whole transaction showed, how fully all concerned were satisfied, that he was sincerely and deeply penitent. In his address, he called the disciples 'Men and brethren.' Our Lord never thus addressed the people; and perhaps it implied an equality, not suitable to the dignity of his characof Him, Zeck. 14:4. That his feet shall stand on the mount of Olives, before Jerusalem, shall stand last there; and presently it follows, The mount of Olives shall cleave in two. This mount, is here said to be near Jerusalem, a sabbath-day's journey from it, i. e. a little way; some reckon it, 1000 paces; others, 2000 cubits; some 7 furlongs; others, 8. Bethany, indeed, was 15 furlongs from Jerusalem, John 11:18. but that part of the mount of Olives next to Jerusalem, whence Christ began to ride in triumph, was but 7 or 8. The Chal. par. on Ruth, 1. says, We are commanded to keep the sabbaths and the holy days, so as not to go above 2000 cubits; which they build on Josh. 3:4. and thus far it is a rule to us, not to journey on the Sabbath, any more than in order to the sabbath-work; and, as far as is necessary to that, we are not only allowed, but enjoined, 2 K. 4:23.

2. Whether the disciples returned. They came to Jerusalem, according to their Master's appointment; there they went up into an upper room, and there abode; not that they all lodged and dined in one room, but there they assembled every day, and spent time together in religious exercises, in expectation of the descent of the Spirit. It was said indeed, by the same historian, that they were continually in the temple, Luke 24:53. but that was in the courts of the temple, at the hours of prayer, where they could not be hindered from attending; but, it should seem, this upper room was in a private house.

3. Who the disciples were, that kept together. The eleven apostles, v. 13. and Mary the mother of our Lord, v. 14. It is the last time mention is made of her in the Scriptures. There were others, here said to be the brethren of our Lord, his kinsmen according to the flesh; and, to make up the 120, v. 15. we may suppose all or most of the 70 disciples, were with them, associates with the apostles, and employed as evangelists.

4. These all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication. It was now a time of trouble and danger with the disciples of Christ, they were as sheep in the midst of wolves; and, they had before them a great work, they were waiting also for the descent of the Spirit on them. The Spirit descended on our Savior when He was praying, Luke 3:21. Those are in the best frame to receive spiritual blessings, that are in a praying frame. Christ's promise now shortly to send the Holy Ghost, was not to supersede prayer, but to quicken and encourage it. God will be inquired of for promised mercies, and the nearer the performance seems to be, the more earnest we should be in prayer for it. Their accord intimates, they were together in holy love, and those who so keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, are best prepared to receive the comforts of the Holy Ghost. See Mat. 18:19.

V. 15-26. The apostles were ordained

12, with an eye to the twelve tribes of Israel, descended from the twelve patriarchs, Rev. 12:1. Mat. 19:28. Care was taken, before the descent of the Spirit, to fill up the vacancy, occasioned by Judas' sin and ruin, which now we have an account of the doing of; our Lord Jesus, probably, having given directions about it, among other things which He spake pertaining to the kingdom of God.

1. The house consisted of about an hundred and twenty names, that is, persons; some think, men only, distinguished from the women. Lightfoot reckons the 11 apostles, the 70 disciples, and about 39 more, all of Christ's own kindred, country, and con-course; and that these were a sort of synod, or congregation of ministers, a standing presbytery, ch. 4:23. to whom none of the rest durst join themselves, ch. 5:13. and that they continued together, till the persecution at Stephen's death dispersed them all but the apostles, ch. 8:1. but he thinks that, beside these, many hundreds in Jerusalem, if not thousands, at this time, believed; and we read of many that believed on Him there, but durst not confess Him; therefore I cannot think, as he does, that they were now formed into distinct congregations, for the preaching of the Word, and other acts of worship; nor that there was any thing of that till after the pouring out of the Spirit, and the conversions in the following ch. Here was the beginning of the Christian church.

2. The speaker was Peter, who had been, and still was, the most forward man; therefore notice is taken of his forwardness and zeal, to show that he had perfectly recovered the ground he lost by denying his Master; and Peter being designed to be the apostle of the circumcision, while the sacred story stays among the Jews, he is still brought in, as afterward, when it comes to speak of the Gentiles, it keeps to the story of Paul.

(1.) His account of the vacancy made by the death of Judas, is very particular, and, as became one that Christ had breathed upon, he notices the fulfilling of the Scriptures in it.

He lost his money shamefully enough, v. 18. his life more shamefully. We were told, Mat. 27:5. that he went away in despair, and was suffocated; so the word signifies there, and no more; here it is added, that, being strangled, or choked with grief and horror, he fell headlong, fell on his face, so Dr. Hammond, and partly with the swelling of his own breast, and partly with the violence of the fall, he burst asunder in the midst, so that all his bowels tumbled out. The suffocating Matthew relates, would make him swell till he burst, which Peter relates. He burst asunder with a great noise, so Dr. Edwards, which was heard by the neighbors, and so, as it follows, it came to be known, v. 19. His bowels gushed out; Luke writes like a physician, understanding all the entrails of the middle and lower ventricle.

ter: but the apostles frequently did, in speaking to the Jews, as well as Christians, yet never in addressing the Gentiles: and it seems to imply, that they recognised a two-fold relation to them, as men of the same nature descended from Adam, and as brethren of the same favored family descended from Abraham.

(16.) 'While David [Ps. 41:9, 10, so Wolf, Eckerman, &c., 69:25. 109:8, so Bloomf., Dodd., &c.] prophesied of the calamities which should befall his persecutors, it was revealed to him, by the Holy Spirit, that the enemies and murderers of the Messiah should inherit those curses in all their terror, and yet be more miserable than the persons on whom they were more immediately to fall. This fact is asserted in these words, as what was revealed, by the same Spirit, to Peter.' Dodd. Pl.

So 2 K. 5:26. Possessed by being buried in it, seems too forced; and the fact wants confirmation.' Bloomf. 'An expression similar to "he purchased repentance dearly," &c.' Dr. A. C. Kuin., Ros., Heinrich, Dr. A. C. &c., make vs. 18, 19. a parenthesis of Luke's, not Peter's.

V. 19. This seems a parenthesis, not of the apostle, but of the historian.—It is remarkable, that he does not say, in our, but their proper tongue, and this, I think, shows that the writer was not a Hebrew, but either a Hellenist, or a Gentile. Pref. to Luke. Mat. 27: 6-10, v. 8. Some think, that Judas also was buried in this field; if so, he bought a

CHAP. II.

1 The apostles, filled with the Holy Ghost, and speaking divers languages, are admired by some, and derided by others. 14 Whom Peter disproving, and shewing that the apostles spake by the power of the Holy Ghost, that Jesus was risen from the dead, ascended into heaven, had poured down the same Holy Ghost, and was the Messiah, a man known to them to be approved of God by his miracles, wonders, and signs, and not crucified without his determinate counsel, and foreknowledge : 37 he baptizeth a great number that were converted. 41 Who afterwards devoutly and charitably converse together : the apostles working many miracles, and God daily increasing his church.

PRACT. OBS. Let us remember, that all instruction should be reduced to practice; and that ministers should begin to do, and then to teach, that their example may illustrate, confirm, and adorn their doctrine. We do not indeed expect the miraculous powers of the Holy Spirit; but we must experience his purifying baptism, or we never can serve God, or be made meet for the inheritance of heaven. But it behooves us to leave 'secret things to the Lord, to whom they belong;' and to submit to his wisdom, in all the dispensations of his providence and grace. It is enough, that He has engaged to give his people strength adequate to their trials and services: that, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, they may, in one way or other, be witnesses for Christ on earth; while in heaven He manages their concerns with the most perfect wisdom, truth, and love.—A little company, united in love, exemplary in their conduct, fervent in prayer, and prudently zealous in

V. 23—26. As Jesus had personally appointed the other apostles, many expositors have argued, that this prayer was immediately addressed to Him; and the language favors the supposition. Matthias, some suppose to have been the same with Nathanael, because both their names signify 'the gift of God;' but this is very uncertain. It is remarkable, that Matthias is never mentioned in Scripture, except on this occasion, but Barsabas is, 15:22—35, vr. 22, 32. The whole account, when compared

(2.) The public notice taken of this. It was known to all the dwellers in Jerusalem, known as a remarkable judgment of God on him that betrayed his Master, v. 19. known to be true, incontestably so, and every body spoke of it; one would think this should have awakened those to repentance, that had had any hand in the death of Christ, when they saw him that had the first hand, thus made an example. But their hearts were hardened, and as to those of them that were to be softened, it must be done by the Word, and the Spirit working with it. One proof of the notoriety of the thing mentioned, the field purchased with Judas' money, was called Aceldama,—the field of blood, because it was bought with the price of blood, which perpetuated the infamy, not only of him that sold that innocent precious blood, but of them that bought it too. Look how they will answer it, when God shall make inquisition for blood.

(3.) Let none be surprised, or stumble at it, that this should be the exit of one of the twelve, for David had foretold not only his sin, (which Christ had noticed, John 13:18. from Ps. 41:9.) but also his punishment, Ps. 69:25. Perhaps Judas had some habitation of his own at Jerusalem, which, upon this, every body was afraid to live in, and so it became desolate, [people detesting the very place where the suicide lived and died.] The substitution of another in his room, is quoted from Ps. 109:8. With this quotation, Peter very aptly introduces the following proposal. God will not suffer any purpose of his to be frustrated, any commission of his to be vacated, or any word of his to be undone, for the miscarriages of them that are intrusted therewith. Judas is hanged, but his bishopric is not lost, and Christ's cause shall never be lost for want of witnesses.

(4.) The substitute, v. 21, 22. must be one of these men, &c. the 70 disciples, a witness with us of his resurrection. By this, it appears, that others of the disciples were with the 11 when Christ appeared to them, else they could not have been witnesses with them, as competent witnesses as they of his resurrection. The great thing which the apostles were to attest to the world, was, Christ's resurrection, for that was the great proof of his being the Messiah, and the foundation of our hope in Him. See what the apostles were ordained to, not to a secular dignity and dominion, but to preach Christ, and the power of his resurrection.

The nomination of the person to succeed Judas.

1. Two, who were known to have been Christ's constant attendants, and men of great integrity, were set up as candidates for the place, v. 23. They appointed two; i.e. the hundred and twenty did so, for to them Peter spake, and not to the eleven. Of neither of the two do we read elsewhere, except this Joseph be the same with that Jesus who is called Justus, whom Paul speaks of, Col. 4:11. and who is said to be of the circumcision, a native Jew, as this was; and who was a fellow-worker with Paul unto the kingdom of God, and a comfort to him. Some think this Joseph, is he that is called Joses, Mark 6:3. the brother of James the less, Mark 15:40. and was called Joses the just, as another person was called James the just. Some confound this with that Joses mentioned Acts 4:36. But that was of Cyprus, this of Galilee; and, it should seem, to distinguish them, that was called Barnabas,—a son of consolation; this Barsabas,—a son of the oath. These two were, both of them, such worthy men, and so well qualified for the office, that they could not tell which of them was fitter, but all agreed it must be one of these two. They appeal to God, (as the Searcher of hearts,) by the lot, v. 26. Matthias was not ordained by the imposition of hands, as presbyters were, for he was chosen by lot, which was the act of God; and therefore as he must be baptized, so he must be ordained, by the Holy Ghost, as they were all, not many days after.

CHAP. II. V. 1—4. Between the promise of the Spirit and his coming, there intervened but a few days; during these, the apostles, though under orders to preach, were yet silent. We have here an account of the descent of the Holy Ghost. Observe, I. When and where; which is particularly noted for greater certainty.

I. When the day of pentecost was fully come. There seems a reference to the manner of expression in the institution of this feast, Lev. 23:15. Ye shall count 7 sabbaths complete, from the day of the offering of the first-fruits, the next but one after the passover, the 16th of Abib, which was the day Christ rose. This day was fully come, i.e. the night preceding, with a part of the day, promoting the cause of Christ, by every mean in their power, will generally increase with rapidity.—The crimes and awful end of some ministers, who have been high in rank and reputation in the church, should by no means lead men to despise that sacred calling: but such instances loudly require others, 'to look to themselves,' to their motives and intentions, as well as to their doctrine and moral conduct.—But when mercenary and ungodly men are removed; we should beseech the Great Searcher of hearts, to fill their places in the church, with such ministers as have known Christ, and are capable of being witnesses for Him, and of declaring to others the efficacy of his sufferings, and 'the power of his resurrection.' Indeed, in every thing, when we have gone as far as we can, 'according to the wisdom given' to us, we should, in one way or other, refer the decision to the Lord. SCOTT.

with the surprising blindness of the disciples to the true meaning of the prophecies, before the resurrection of Christ, illustrates the evangelist's words, 'Then opened He their understandings, to understand the Scripture.' Luke 24:44—49, v. 44; for there is a constant recurrence to the sacred oracles, and a clear and sound interpretation of the passages adduced.—It is wonderful, that any person should have referred to this narrative, in the argument concerning the choice of ministers; when the case was most evidently extraordinary, and one which could never again occur: and when the 11 apostles, with a number of the 70 disciples, probably formed the far greater part of the company present. Sc.

'Grotius' account seems probable, that they put their lots into two urns, one of which contained the names of Joseph and Matthias, and the other a blank and the word apostle. In drawing these out, the blank came up with the name of Joseph, and the lot on which was written the word apostle came up with the name of Matthias.' Burder, Beza, and Bloomf. think the decision was made by throwing dice. Io.

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1. The word 'Pentecost' implies, that this was the fiftieth day; i.e. from the second day of unleavened bread, whence 'the feast of the ingathering' of the harvest was computed.—Different opinions are maintained, concerning the persons assembled on this occasion; whether the apostles only, or the whole company of disciples; but the language of the sacred writer obviously implies the pouring out of the Spirit, on not the apostles only, but on all was fully past. (1.) The Holy Ghost came down at the time of a solemn feast, because there was then a great concourse of people to Jerusalem from all parts of the country, and of proselytes from other countries, which would make it the more public, and the fame of it to be spread the sooner and further, contributing much to propagate the Gospel into all nations. (2.) This feast was kept in remembrance of the giving of the law on mt. Sinai, whence the incorporating of the Jewish church was to be dated, which Lightfoot reckons to be just 1447 years before. Fitly, therefore, is the Holy Ghost given at that feast, in fire and in tongues, for the promulgation of the evangelical law, not to one nation, but to every creature. (3.) This feast happened on the first day of the week; which was an additional honor put on that day, and a confirmation of it to be the Christian Sabbath, the day the Lord hath made, to be a standing memorial in his church of those two great blessings,—the resurrection of Christ, and the pouring out of the Spirit. This serves not only to justify us in observing that day under the style and title of the Lord's day, but to direct us, in sanctifying it, to give God praise particularly for those two great blessings; every Lord's day in the year, I think, there should be a full and particular notice taken in our prayers and praises of these two, as there is by some churches of the one, once a year, on Easter-day, and of the other, once a year, on Whit-sunday. Oh! that we may do it with suitable affections.

2. It was when they were all with one accord in one place, we are not told, particularly, whether in the temple, Luke 24:53. or in their own upper room. But it was at Jerusalem, because it had been the place God chose to put his name there; the prophecy was, that from hence the Word of the Lord should go forth to all nations, Is. 2:3. and it was now the place of the general rendezvous of all devout people; there God had promised to meet them, and bless them, here therefore He meets them with this blessing of blessings. This teaches us not to fall out with places, nor conceive prejudices against them.

Here they were with one accord. We cannot forget how often, while their Master was with them, there were strifes among them, which should be the greatest; but now we hear no more of these; what they had received already of the Holy Ghost, when Christ breathed on them, had in a good measure rectified the mistakes on which those contests were grounded, and had disposed them to holy love. They had prayed more together of late than usual, ch. I:14. and that made them love one another better. By his grace He thus prepared them for the gift of the Holy Ghost. Would we have the Spirit poured out upon us from on high? Let us be all of one accord, and, notwithstanding variety of sentiments and interests, as, no doubt, there was among those disciples, let us agree to love one another; for where brethren dwell together in unity, there the Lord commands his blessing.

II. How the Holy Ghost came.

1. Here is an audible summons to awaken their expectations, v. 1. a sudden, unexpected sound from heaven, Rev. 6:1. the sound of a wind, for the way of the Spirit is like that of the wind, John 3:8. Ez. 37:9. It was a rushing, mighty wind; it came not only with a great noise, but with great force, as if it would bear down all before it. This was to signify the powerful influences and operations of the Spirit of God on the minds of men, and thereby on the world, that they should be mighty through God to the casting down of imaginations. It filled not only the room, but all the house, where they were sitting. Probably, it alarmed the whole city, but, to show that it was supernatural, presently fixed on that particular house; as some think the wind that was sent to arrest Jonah, affected only the ship that he was in, Jon. 1:4. and as the wise men's star stood over the house where the child was. This would direct the people who observed it, whither to go, to inquire the meaning of it. This wind filling the house, would strike an awe on the disciples, and help to put them into a very serious, reverend, and composed frame, to receive the Holy Ghost. Thus the rough convictions of the Spirit make way for his gentle comforts.

2. A visible sign of the gift they were to receive, cloven tongues, like as of fire; v. 3. and it sat, not they, those cloven tongues, but He, the Spirit, signified thereby, rested on each of them, as He is said to rest on the prophets of old. Or, as Hammond describes it, 'An appearance of something like flaming fire, [a lambent flame,] lighting on every one of them, which divided asunder, and so formed the resemblance of tongues, with that part of them that was next their heads, divided or cloven.' (1.) The outward sensible sign, was to confirm the faith of the disciples themselves, and convince others. (2.) The sign was fire, that John Baptist's saying concerning Christ might be fulfilled, He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire; with the Holy Ghost, as with fire. Ezekiel's mission was confirmed by a vision of turning coals of fire, ch. 1:13. and Isaiah's by a coal of fire touching his lips, ch. 6:7. The Spirit, like fire, melts the heart, separates and burns up the dross, and kindles pious and devout affections in the soul, in which, as in the fire upon the altar, the spiritual sacrifices are offered up. This is that fire Christ came to send on the earth. Luke 12:49. (3.) This fire appeared in cloven tongues.

The operations of the Spirit were many; that of speaking with divers tongues was one, and was singled out to be the first indication of the gift of the Holy Ghost, and to that this sign had a reference. (4.) This fire sat upon them for some time, to show the constant residence of the Holy Ghost with them. The prophetic gifts of old were conferred sparingly, and but at some times, but the disciples of Christ had the gifts of the Spirit always with them; though the sign, we may suppose, soon disappeared.

III. The immediate effect.

1. They were all filled with the Holy Ghost, more plentifully and powerfully than before; filled with the graces of the Spirit, and more than ever under his sanctifying influences, were now holy, heavenly, spiritual, more weaned from this world, and better acquainted with the other; were more filled with the comforts of the Spirit; rejoiced more than ever in the love of Christ, and the hope of heaven, and in it all their griefs and fears were swallowed up. They were also, for the proof of this, filled with the gifts of the Holy Ghost, which is especially meant here; they were endued with miraculous powers for the furtherance of the Gospel. It seems evident to me, that not the 12 apostles only, but all the 120 disciples, were filled with the Holy Ghost alike at this time; all the 70 disciples, who were apostolical men, and employed in the same work, and all the rest too that were to preach the Gospel; for it is said, expressly, Eph. 4:8, 11. When Christ ascended on high, which refers to this, v. 23. He gave gifts unto men, not only some apostles, such were the twelve; but some prophets, and some evangelists, such were many of the 70 disciples, itinerant preachers, and some pastors and teachers settled in particular churches, as we may suppose some of these afterward were. The all, here, must refer to the all that were together, ch. 1:14, 15.—v. 1.

2. They began to speak with other tongues, beside their native language, though they had never learned any other. They spake not matters of common conversation, but the Word of God, and the praises of his name, substantial, weighty sayings, worthy to be had in remembrance, so the Greek. Probably not only one was enabled to speak one language, and another another, but every one to speak divers languages, as he should have occasion. And they spoke, not here and there a word of another tongue, stammeringly, in broken sentences; but spake it as readily, properly, and elegantly, as if it had been their mother-tongue. They spake not from any previous thought or meditation, but as the Spirit gave them utterance; He furnished them with the matter as well as the language. Now this was, (1.) A very great miracle, it was a miracle on the mind, for in the mind words are framed. They had not only never learned these languages, but, for aught that appears, had never so much as heard these languages spoken, or had any idea of them. They were neither scholars nor travellers; nor the disciples, which would form a more exact fulfilment of Joel's prophecy (1:2); and it is plain that others, besides the apostles, were filled with the Holy Ghost; at a very early period. (6, 3, 5, 8.) As afterwards, miraculous powers, and the gift of languages, were conferred on others, by the laying on of the hands of the apostles; so without this, the gift of tongues was now conferred on converts in general. Indeed, either the apostles assembled alone, as if for this special purpose, of which no intimation is given; or else the whole company partook of the blessing; and this certainly accords to the tradition of the church in ancient times.

V. 2, 3. The shape of the mitre, worn by bishops, is by some thought to have been derived from the supposed form of these divided tongues; but if they sat on every one present, (as the original determines,) and others besides the apostles were present, the ground of this distinction fails. Indeed, it is more likely, that there appeared several divisions in the tongues, than merely two; as the former would be a more exact emblem of the gift of speaking divers languages conferred at the same time. Id.

(2.) Strong wind, loud and repeated peals of thunder, convulsions of lightning, and lambent flames resting on those who were objects of the Deity's regard, are all employed by them [the Greeks, Romans, &c.] to point out the mode in which their gods were reported to make their will known to their votaries. Every thing of this kind was probably borrowed from the account given by Moses, of the appearance on Mount Sinai; [comp. too, Gen. 3:24. 15:17.] for traditions of this event were carried through almost every part of the habitable world, partly by the expelled Canaanites, partly by the Greek sages, travelling through Asiatic countries, [comp. Townsend's Arrang. notes on Dan.] in quest of philosophic truth; and partly by means of the Gr. vers. of the Sept., made nearly 500 B. C.

(3.) Cloven. Rather, distributed, see Markland; so the Vulg.; dispersita Vales. tr. dividing themselves. Ros., &c. tr. discursantes, running hither and thither. Supposing the opinion of the later Jews, (see Schoettgen,) to have been entertained by the earlier, it is not unreasonable to suppose, that God would vouchsafe to use a symbol accordant with the notions of that age, and therefore intelligible to all. Storr urges strong objections to the manner of accounting for this by some Germans, as Kuin., Hermann, Eichhorn, &c. Mich., Ros., Hezel, Paulus, Kuin. refer to the electric fluid. Wetstein (see his citations) observes, that the ancients believed the presence of the Deity to be indicated by fire, and that a flame burning from the head was accounted a sign or symbol of Divine favor; and that a little tongue of fire, or a radiant head, indicated the sanctity of those on whom it was found. Ep.

4 And they were all <sup>d</sup> filled with the Holy Ghost, and began <sup>e</sup> to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance.

5 And there were dwelling at Jerusalem Jews, devout men, out of every nation under heaven.

6 Now <sup>f</sup> when this was noised abroad, the multitude came together, and were <sup>e</sup> confounded, because that every man heard them speak in his own language.

7 And they were all amazed and marvelled, saying one to another, Behold, are not all these which speak <sup>h</sup> Galileans?

8 And how hear we every man in our own tongue, wherein we were born?

9 Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Judea, and Cappadocia, in Pontus, and Asia,

10 Phrygia, and Pamphylia, in Egypt, and in the parts of Libya about Cyrene, and strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes, 11 Cretes and Arabians, we do hear them speak in our tongues <sup>i</sup> the wonderful works of God.

12 And they were all amazed, and were in doubt, saying one to another, <sup>j</sup> What meaneth this?

13 Others mocking, said, These men are full of new wine.

14 ¶ But Peter, standing up with the eleven, lifted up his voice, and said unto them, Ye men of Judea, and all ye that dwell at Jerusalem, be this known unto you, and hearken to my words :

d c. 1:5. e Ma. 16:17. c. 10:46. f when this voice was male. g or, troubled in mind. h c. 1:11. i 1 Co. 12:10, 23. j c. 17:20.

had had any opportunity of learning languages, either by books or conversation. (2.) A very proper, needful, and serviceable miracle. The language the disciples spake, was Syriae, a dialect of the Hebrew; so that it was necessary that they should be endued with the gift, both for the understanding of the original Hebrew of the O. T. in which it was written, and of the original Greek of the N. T., in which it was to be written. But that was not all; they were commissioned to preach the Gospel to every creature, to disciple all nations. But here is an insuperable difficulty at the threshold; How shall they master the several languages so, as to speak intelligibly to all nations? It will be the work of a man's life to learn their languages. Therefore, to prove that Christ could give authority to preach to the nations, He gives ability to preach to them in their own language. And it should seem, that this was the accomplishment of that promise which Christ made to his disciples, John 14:12. Greater works than these shall ye do. For this may well be reckoned, all things considered, a greater work than the miraculous cures Christ wrought: Christ Himself did not speak with other tongues, nor did He enable his disciples to do it, while He was with them; but it was the first effect of the pouring out of the Spirit on them. And Abp. Tillotson thinks it probable, that if the conversion of infidels to Christianity were now sincerely and vigorously attempted, by men of honest minds, God would extraordinarily countenance such an attempt with all fitting assistance, as He did the first publication of the Gospel.

V. 5—13. We have here an account of the public notice taken of this extraordinary gift, with which the disciples were all on a sudden endued. Observe,

I. The great concourse of people now at Jerusalem. [The religious centre of the world, as London is the commercial, and Paris the literary.] It should seem, there were more than usual at the feast of pentecost. The expression, out of every nation, is hyperbolic, denoting, that there were some from most of the then known parts of the world.

1. All were either Jews originally, dispersed into those countries, v. 9, 11. or proselytes to the Jewish religion, but natives of those countries. Whitby observes, that the Jewish writers about this time, as Philo and Josephus, speak of the Jews as dwelling everywhere through the whole earth; and that there is not a people upon earth among whom some Jews do not inhabit.

2. What brought them all together to Jerusalem at this time was, a general expectation of the appearing of the Messiah; Daniel's weeks were just now expired, the sceptre was departed from Judah, and it was then generally thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear, Luke 19:11. This brought the most zealous and devout to Jerusalem, to sojourn there, that they might early share in the blessings of Messiah's kingdom.

II. Their amazement when they heard the disciples speak in their own tongues. The Parthians hear one of them speak their language, the Medes hear another of them speak theirs; and so of the rest, v. 11. Probably they spake of Christ, and redemption by Him, and the grace of the Gospel; these are indeed the great things of God, which will be for ever marvellous in our eyes. It was strange, and kind as strange, and helped to engage their affections, as a plain indication of the favor intended to the Gentiles, and that the knowledge and worship of God should no longer be confined to the Jews; and this is to us a plain intimation of the mind and will of God, that the sacred records of God's wonderful works should be preserved by all nations in their own tongue; that the Scriptures should be read, and public worship performed, in the vulgar languages of the nations.

III. The scorn some natives of Judea and Jerusalem made of it, probably the Scribes and Pharisees, and chief priests, who always resisted the Holy Ghost, v. 13. Not that they were so absurd, as to think that wine would enable men to speak languages they never learned; but these, being native Jews, knew not, as the others did, that these were really the languages of other nations, and therefore took what they said to be gibberish and nonsense, such as drunkards, those fools in Israel, sometimes talk. As when they resolved not to believe the finger of the Spirit in Christ's miracles, they turned it off with this, 'He casteth out devils by compact with the prince of the devils;' so when they resolved not to believe the voice of the Spirit in the apostles' preaching, they turned it off with this, These men are full of new wine.

V. 14—36. We have here the first-fruits of the Spirit in Peter's sermon, directed, not to those of other nations in a strange language, but to the Jews in the vulgar language, even to them that mocked, for he begins with the notice of that, v. 15. and addresses his discourse, v. 14. to the men of Judea and inhabitants of Jerusalem; but we have reason enough to think, that the other disciples continued to speak to those who understood them, in the languages of their respective countries, the wonderful works of God. And it was not by Peter's preaching only, but that of all, or most, of the 120, that 3000 souls were that day converted, and added to the church; but Peter's sermon only is recorded, to be an evidence that he was thoroughly reconverted, and restored to the Divine favor; he that had sneakingly denied Christ, now as courageously confesses Him.

I. His account of the miraculous effusion of the Spirit, is designed to awaken them all to embrace the faith of Christ, and to join themselves to his church. Two things he resolves it into,—the fulfilling of the Scripture, and the fruit of Christ's resurrection and ascension, and, consequently, the proof of both.

1. It was the accomplishment of the prophecies of the Old Test., which related to the kingdom of the Messiah. He specifies, Joel, ch. 2:28. It is observable, that though Peter was filled with the Holy Ghost, and spake with tongues as the Spirit gave him utterance, yet he did not set aside the Scriptures, nor think himself above them; nay, much of his discourse is quotation out of the O. T., to which he appeals, and with which he proves what he says. Observe, (1.) The text Peter quotes, v. 17—21. refers to the last days, the times of the Gospel, therefore called the last days, because the dispensation of God's kingdom among men, which the Gospel sets up, is the last dispensation of divine grace, to the end of time. Or, in the last days, i. e. a great while after the ceasing of prophecy in the O. T. church. Or, in the day immediately preceding the destruction of the Jewish nation, in the last

V. 4. A more stupendous miracle than this can scarcely be imagined; as every one must perceive, who carefully considers the subject; and recollects with what difficulty an adult person acquires the accurate knowledge and pronunciation even of one language, so as to speak it with propriety, and without hesitation.—The diversity of languages introduced by the power of God, as a judgment on the presumptuous and rebellious builders at Babel, has always been the great obstacle to the diffusion of useful knowledge, and of true religion. SCOTT.

V. 5. The phrase, 'every nation under heaven,' is general, not universal, and the interpretation of it, which the subject absolutely requires, should render us cautious of deducing conclusions, and attempting to prove doctrines, from single expressions, at least not more energetic; especially when clear testimonies of Scripture must be explained, differently than their obvious meaning implies, to establish such conclusions. SCOTT.

(5.) Devout.] Eulabeis: never used in the N. T. for proselytes. It means men of integrity, piety, as Simeon, Luke 2:25. Every.] Hyperbolic; as that of Xen. "he killed all, and took a few alive." Philo, too, makes king Agrippa say to the Jews, "There is no nation in the world where a part of you is not to be found." BLOOMF.

V. 6—11. The Hebrew, or the Syriac, was generally used. From the different regions afterwards mentioned, it is computed, that seven or eight distinct languages, and many more different dialects of the same language, must have been thus spoken, that each of this company might hear his native tongue.—The strangers of Rome, mean native Jews, and persons proselyted to their religion, who generally resided at Rome, but then sojourned as strangers at Jerusalem.—(9) The peculiar dialect of the Galileans no longer was perceived by the inhabitants of Judea. (7.) Galileans.] Was the name thus early given to the sect? ED. V. 13. New.] I. e. sweet: it could not at that season have been new. DR. A. CLARKE.

V. 14—21. It may here be observed, that the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost was no more than the beginning of the accomplishment of this prophecy.—The word 'prophecy' may denote, not only the fluency of the persons in speaking of divine things, for the instruction of others, as the term is sometimes used; but also their predicting future events, especially those concerning the approaching ruin of the unbelieving Jewish nation.—The quotation, though in general made in the words of the Sept., varies from that version, and from the 17 And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out <sup>m</sup> of my Spirit upon all flesh : and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams :

18 And on my servants and on my hand-maidens I will pour out in those days of my Spirit ; and they <sup>n</sup> shall prophesy :

19 And I will shew wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath ; blood, and fire, and vapor of smoke :

20 The <sup>o</sup> sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come :

21 And it shall come to pass, that whosoever <sup>p</sup> shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved.

days of that people, just before that great and notable day of the Lord, spoken of, v. 20. [1.] There should be a more plentiful and extensive effusion of the Spirit of grace from on high than had ever yet been. The prophets of the O. T. had been filled with the Holy Ghost, and it was said of the people of Israel, that God gave them his good Spirit to instruct them, Neh. 9:20. But now the Spirit shall be poured out, not only on the Jews, but on all flesh, Gentiles as well as Jews; though yet Peter himself did not understand it so, as appears, ch. 11:17. Or, on all flesh, i. e. on some of all ranks and conditions of men. The Jewish doctors taught, that the Spirit came only on wise and rich men, and of the seed of Israel! [2.] The Spirit should be in them a Spirit of prophecy; by the Spirit, they should be enabled to foretell things to come, and to preach the Gospel to every creature. This power shall be given without distinction of sex, age, or outward condition, v. 18. or, in general, men and women, whom God calls his servants and his handmaids. The mention of the daughters, v. 17. and the handmaidens, v. 18. would make one think the women noticed, ch. 1:14. received the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost, as well as the men, ch. 21:9. and Paul, finding abundance of the gifts both of tongues and prophecy in the church of Corinth, saw it needful to prohibit women's use of those gifts in public, 1 Cor. 14:26, 34. [3.] One great thing they should prophesy of, should be the judgments coming on the Jewish nation, the chief thing that Christ Himself had foretold, Mat. 24. at his entrance into Jerusalem, Luke 19:41. and when He was going to die, Luke 23:29. and these judgments were to be brought on them, to punish them for their contempt of the Gospel, and their opposition to it, though it came to them thus proved. Josephus speaks of prodigies that preceded the Jewish wars, terrible thunders, lightnings, and earthquakes; a fiery comet hung over the city a year, and a flaming sword was seen pointing down upon it; a light shone on the temple and the altar at midnight, as if it had been noon-day. Lightfoot gives another sense of these presages. The blood of the Son of God, the fire of the Holy Ghost now appearing, the vapor of the smoke in which Christ ascended, the sun darkened, and the moon made blood, at the time of Christ's passion, were all loud warnings given to that unbelieving people, to prepare for the judgments coming upon them. Or, it may be applied, and very fitly, to the previous judgments themselves, by which that desolation was brought on. The blood points at the wars of the Jews with the neighboring nations, with the Samaritans, Syrians, and Greeks, in which abundance of blood was shed, as there was also in their civil wars, and the struggles of the seditious, (as they called them,) which were very bloody; there was no peace to him that went out, or to him that came in. The fire and vapor of smoke, here foretold, literally came to pass, in the burning of their cities, and towns, and synagogues, and temple at last. And this turning of the sun into darkness, and the moon into blood, speaks the dissolution of their government, civil and sacred, and the extinguishing of all their lights. Lastly, The signal preservation of the Lord's people is here promised, v. 21. (2.) He applies this prophecy to the present event, v. 16; it is the accomplishment of it, the full accomplishment of it: and so this Spirit of grace, the Advocate, or Comforter, that was given now, according to the promise, will, according to the same promise, continue with the church on earth to the end, and will work all its works in it and for it, and every member of it, ordinary and extraordinary, by the means of the scriptures and the ministry.

2. It was the gift of Christ, and the product and proof of his resurrection and ascension. From this gift of the Holy Ghost, he takes occasion to preach unto them Jesus; and this part of his sermon he introduces with another solemn preface, v. 22. See what a stress Peter lays on Christ's miracles! The matter of fact was not to be denied; 'They were done in the midst of you, in the midst of your country, your city, your solemn assemblies; I appeal to yourselves. The inference from them cannot be disputed; the reasoning is as strong as the evidence; if He did those miracles, certainly God approved Him, declared Him to be, what He declared Himself to be, the Son of God, and the Savior of the world; for the God of truth would never set his seal to a lie.'

They were witnesses of his death and sufferings also, but a few weeks ago; and this was the greatest miracle of all, that a Man approved of God, should thus seem to be abandoned of Him; and a Man thus approved among the people, and in the midst of them,

Heb. text, in nearly the same particulars. Instead of 'afterward,' or 'after these things,' we here read, 'in the last days;' the order of the clauses in v. 17. is changed; 'and they shall prophesy,' at the end of the 18th, is added; as is 'above,' and 'beneath,' in the 19th. The Sept. has 'notable,' or illustrious, instead of terrible, which is here retained. —The conclusion of the prophecy is omitted.

(14.) The eleven stood as witnessing to Peter's account. Ed. (15.) Third.] 'I. e. nine o'clock, the hour of prayer, previous to which the Jews scarcely ever eat or drank.' Dr. A. C. 'None who regarded religion did so. Lightf. quotes from Berachoth, "It is not lawful for a man to taste any thing before he shall have prayed his prayer." So Jos. says, the Sabbath assembly was not usually dismissed to breakfast till the sixth hour, i. e. after the prayers appropriated to that hour. Even the Gentiles accounted it disgraceful to get drunk in the day time. See Plant., Scæva, Ælian, Cic.' Bloomf.

(16-18.) Peter quotes neither the Heb. nor Sept., but from memory. Bloomf. (18.) And on, &c.] 'Rather, Ye, further: i. e. in other nations, also, my servants [in all nations and times] shall have the same gifts. This [important promise, thus expressed by the peculiar copulative kai &c] shows, that the most inconsiderable things in the scriptures are not to be neglected.' Markland. Ed.

(19.) Blood, fire, smoke, &c. denote war, which causes them; and, perhaps, calamitous times in general, political, civil, social, and domestic. 'It was an opinion common to Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans, that, by prodigies of the kind here mentioned (19, 20), were portended public calamities, and the ruin of estates.' Bloomf. Vapor of Smoke.] 'Smoke the densest.' By fire may more correctly be understood, ignited meteors, sulphurous and inflammable bodies, which burn and shine; and by smoke, thick and black vapors, which ascend from the earth, and obscure the light of the sun and moon, so (Kuiv.) that they receive that rubicund color, (blood,) which is usually observed to precede earthquakes.' Bloomf. Dr. A. C. refers v. 20. to the darkness of the sun and redness of the moon, during an eclipse of the sun; and v. 18. to war, devastations with fire, dagger, and sword. See Daddr. Id.

V. 22-24. 'In Scripture, that is said to be done by "the determinate counsel of God," which is done according to what He had written and declared in his Word; all predictions concerning things future, being declarations and determinations that they shall come to pass. (Mat. 26:24. Luke 22:22.) ... This only doth suppose, that God can foresee and foretell, what man, not hindered by Him, but left to his own inclinations, will do. And if that foresight hath any influence on the will, to make the action necessary, then ... all our actions must be necessary.' Whitby. Did this learned writer suppose, that, according to the doctrine of Calvinists, the foresight, or even the decree, of God has any influence on the will or free agency of man? If either he, or others, who have brought the same objections, suppose this, they are very blamably ignorant of the doctrine which they would confute.—God foresees and foretells, what 'man left to his inclinations will do;' and God determines to leave him to his inclinations. The permission is enough in such a case; but to determine, by preventing grace, to make the sinner willing to submit, believe, and obey, requires a positive interposition of a divine and new-creating power; which none deserves, or, left entirely to himself, desires, and which God bestows or withholdeth, 'according to the counsel of his own will.'—Again, such texts constrain both the above cited learned writers (Hammond as well as Whitby) to allow, that the event was certainly foreseen, and could not but take place; though the persons concerned were under no coercion, and acted according to the lusts of their own hearts. But did God certainly foresee this, as his own all-wise determination and decree; or as something independent on his decree, which could neither be altered nor prevented? Notes, 4 23-28, v. 28. Mat. 26:21-24. Luke 22:21-25.—'The pains of death' would introduce 'the pains of hell,' to sinful man. But the sinless Savior, as our Surety, endured the former, till He could say, 'It is finished;' and having done so, it was impossible that He should be holden under the power of the latter; or that any of his believing people should be subjected to them. Scott.

(23.) Foreknowledge.] Bloomf. contends, with Krebs, that the context requires prognasis, tr. foreknowledge, to be tr. decree, counsel, as in 1 Pet. 1:2. Christ's sufferings not depending so much on any pre-science as on the divine decrees. 'This signification of prognasis is not only confirmed by the usage of the Heb., but the Gr. For the Hebrews use yad, as the Greeks do gnōnai, in the sense of (by a metonymy of cause for effect) decree, appoint. So Herod., 7:5, 4. Philo, 966 B. See Elsner and Loesner.' Bloomf. 'Though the awful subject of God's foreknowledge, no finite mind can comprehend, yet it is possible so to understand what relates to us in it, as to avoid the extremes of presumption or despondency. God's foreknowledge is spoken of in reference to us, not to Himself. To omniscience there can be neither fore-

25 For David speaketh <sup>z</sup> concerning him, I foresaw the Lord always before my face, for he is on my right hand, that I should not be moved :

26 Therefore did my heart rejoice, and my tongue was glad ; moreover also my flesh shall rest in hope :

27 Because thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thy Holy One to see corruption.

28 Thou hast made known to me the ways of life ; thou shalt make me full of joy with thy countenance.

29 Men and brethren, <sup>v</sup> let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day.

30 Therefore being <sup>z</sup> a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn <sup>a</sup> with an oath <sup>b</sup> to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne ;

31 He seeing this <sup>c</sup> before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption.

32 This <sup>d</sup> Jesus hath God raised up, whereof <sup>e</sup> we all are witnesses.

33 Therefore, being by the right hand of God exalted, and having <sup>e</sup> received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth <sup>b</sup> this, which ye now see and hear.

34 For David is not ascended into the heavens : but he saith himself, The Lord <sup>i</sup> said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, therefore he insists most largely on. 1. He describes his resurrection ; God loosed the bands of death,—the sorrows of death ; the word is used for travailing pains ; and some think, it signifies the trouble and agony of his soul, in which it was exceeding sorrowful, even to the death ; from these pains and sorrows of soul, this travail of soul, the Father loosed Him, when at his death, He said, It is finished. Thus Dr. Goodwin understands it : Lightfoot gives another sense of it, alluding to his having broken the power of death, and destroyed its pangs on his own people. But most refer this to the resurrection of Christ's body. And death, says Mr. Baxter, as a separation between soul and body, is by privation a penal state, though not dolorous by positive evil. But Hammond shows, that the Sept., and from them the apostle here, use the word for cords and bands, as Ps. 18: 4. to which the metaphor of loosing and being held best agrees. 2. He attests the truth of his resurrection, v. 32. 3. Because the Scripture had said, that He must rise again, before He saw corruption, therefore it was impossible that He should be holden by death and the grave ; for David speaks of his being raised, so it comes in, v. 25. The Scripture he refers to, is Ps. 16: 8—11. which, though in part applicable to David as a saint, yet refers chiefly to Christ, of whom David was a type, and shows us,

(1.) The constant regard our Lord Jesus had to his Father, in his whole undertaking. I foresaw the Lord before Me continually, John 13: 31, 32. 17: 4, 5. (2.) The assurance He had of his Father's presence and power going along with Him. He is on my right hand : this was an article of the covenant of redemption, Ps. 89: 21. (3.) The cheerfulness with which our Lord Jesus went on in his work, notwithstanding the sorrows He was to pass through. 'Being satisfied that the good pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in my hand, therefore doth my heart rejoice, and my tongue is glad, and the thought of my sorrow is as nothing to Me.' (4.) The pleasing prospect He had of the happy issue of his death and sufferings ; He was putting off the body, but my flesh shall rest ; the grave shall be to the body, while there, a bed of sweet repose ; it shall rest in hope, that Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell ; what follows is the matter of his hope, or assurance rather : that the soul shall not continue in a state of separation from the body ; for that would be the continuance of death's triumph over Him who was, in truth, a Conqueror over death : that the body shall lie but a little while in the grave ; not to see corruption ; therefore it must return to life, on, or before, the third day after death. This was typified by the law concerning the sacrifices, that no part of the flesh of the sacrifices which was to be eaten, should be kept till the third day, for fear it should see corruption, and begin to putrefy, Lev. 7: 15—18. That his death and sufferings should be, not to Him only, but to all his, an inlet to the blessed immortality. 'Thou hast made known to Me the ways of life, and by Me made them known to the world, and laid them open.' That all his sorrows and sufferings should end in perfect and perpetual felicity. Thou shalt make Me full of joy with thy countenance. The reward set before Him, was, joy, a fulness of joy ; and the smiles with which the Father received Him, when, at his ascension, He was brought to the Ancient of days, filled Him with joy unspeakable : and that is the joy of our Lord, into which all his shall enter, and in which they shall be for ever happy.

III. Here is Peter's comment on this text, especially so much of it as relates to the resurrection of Christ, v. 29. David is here called a patriarch, because he was the father of the royal family, and a man of great note in his generation, and whose name and memory were justly very precious. Now we must consider, that, as he could not say of himself, (for he died, and was buried, and his sepulchre remained when Peter spake, his bones and ashes in it, nobody ever pretending he had risen,) that he should not see corruption ; it was plain he did see corruption. Paul urges this, ch. 13: 35—37. Comp. 1 K. 2: 2. Therefore certainly he spake it as a prophet, with an eye to the Messiah, whose sufferings the prophets testified beforehand, and with them the glory that should follow ; so did David in that Ps., as Peter here plainly shows.

1. David knew that the Messiah should descend from his loins, v. 30. that God had sworn to him. He promised him a son, the throne of whose kingdom should be established for ever, 2 S. 7: 12. And it is said, Ps. 132: 11. God swore it in truth unto David. When Jesus was born, it was promised, that the Lord God would give Him the throne of his father David, Luke 1: 32. And all Israel knew that the Messiah was to be the Son of David, i. e. that, according to the flesh, He should be so by his human nature ; for according to the Spirit, and by his divine nature, He was to be David's Lord. This David kept in view, in penning his Psalms.

2. Christ being the Fruit of his loins, and, consequently, in his loins when he penned that Ps., if what he says, as in his own person, be not applicable to himself, (as plainly it is not,) we must conclude it points to that Son of his that was then in his loins, in whom his family and kingdom were to have their perfection and perpetuity ; therefore, when he says, that his soul should not be left in its separate state, nor his flesh see corruption, without doubt he must be understood to speak of the resurrection of Christ, v. 31. And as Christ died, so He rose again, according to the Scriptures ; and that He did so, we are witnesses. Further, as David did not rise from the dead, so neither did he ascend into the heavens, bodily, as Christ did, v. 34.

should be thus abandoned by them too ! But both these mysteries are here explained, v. 23. Neither God's designing it from eternity, nor his bringing good out of it to eternity, would in the least excuse their sin ; for it was their voluntary act and deed, from a principle morally evil ; it was justly looked upon as a national act, because done both by the vote of the great council, and by the voice of the great crowd, the majority.

II. Christ's resurrection effectually wiped away the reproach of his death, v. 24. This knowledge nor after-knowledge : nothing can be future to God, He lives in all we call futurity ; nothing past, because He equally exists in all past time ; past, present, and future can have no relation to God, who exists in an infinite, indivisible, and eternal now. . . . Because God can do all things, it does not follow that He must ; because He can know all things, that He must. What God has ordained as absolutely certain, He knows as absolutely certain ; what He has ordained as contingent, (i. e. such things as his infinite wisdom has thought proper to poise on the possibility of being, or not being, leaving it to the will of intelligent beings to turn the scale,) that He knows or foreknows as contingent. To deny this, would involve the most palpable contradictions, the most monstrous absurdities, making every act, good or evil, God's own act, confounding all distinctions of right and wrong, virtue and vice, guilt and innocence ! And, to prove that when he spake of the resurrection, he meant it of Christ, he observes, that when in another Ps. he speaks of the next step of his exaltation, he plainly shows that he spake of another person, and such another as was his Lord, Ps. 110:1. The Lord said unto my Lord, when He had raised Him from the dead, Sit Thou at my right hand, in the highest dignity and dominion there; be thou intrusted with the administration of the kingdom, both of providence and grace; sit there as King, until I make thy foes either thy friends or thy footstool, v. 35.

IV. We now come to the application of this discourse concerning the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ.

1. This explains the meaning of the present wonderful effusion of the Spirit in those extraordinary gifts, as some had asked, v. 12. What meaneth it? This Jesus being exalted to the right hand of God; so some, to sit there; by the right hand, we read it, by God's power and authority; it comes all to one; and having received of the Father, to whom He is ascended, the promise of the Holy Ghost, He hath given what He received, Ps. 68:18. and hath shed forth this which you now see and hear; for the Holy Ghost was to be given when Jesus was glorified, and not before, John 7:39. Now this which you see and hear is from the Holy Ghost, whose coming is an evidence that Jesus is exalted, and that He has received this gift from the Father, to confer it on the church, which plainly ified Jesus was indeed the promised Messiah, and that He was actually risen, ascended, and glorified. When the Jews were convinced of this, and induced to believe on Him in that character; they would readily learn from Scripture, and from further instructions, the spiritual nature of his kingdom and salvation, the intent of his sufferings and death, and the various doctrines of his religion.

V. 37-40. The apostle's arguments were invincibly conclusive, and his application most highly interesting; though in other respects his discourse was peculiarly plain and simple. But if we duly consider the complicated evidence of our Lord's doctrine and miracles, and the obstinate unbelief of the Jews notwithstanding; we shall perceive, that neither Peter's words, nor yet the miracles which the people witnessed, would have produced those effects which followed, had not the Holy Spirit also been communicated, to remove the veil of pride, prejudice, and sinful affections from their minds. 'The Comforter being come, He convinced them of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment.' John 16:8-11. For 'the promise,' both the general promise respecting the Messiah, and the blessings of his kingdom, as made to Abraham their father, Gen. 12:1-3. 17:7, 8. and the particular promise of the Spirit quoted from Joel, 16-21. was made, or proposed, 'to them and to their speaks Him to be the Mediator, or middle Person between God and the church. The gift of the Holy Ghost was a performance of divine promises already made, here called the promise of the Holy Ghost; also, a pledge of all Divine favors further intended; what you now see and hear, is but an earnest of greater things.

2. This proves, what you are all bound to believe, that Christ Jesus is the true Messiah and Savior of the world; this he closes his sermon with, as the conclusion of the whole matter, v. 26. Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that this truth has now received its full confirmation, and we our full commission to publish it; for they were charged to tell no man that He was Jesus the Christ, till after his resurrection, Mat. 16:20. 17:9. This is the great truth of the Gospel which we are to believe, that that same Jesus, the very same that was crucified at Jerusalem, is He to whom we owe allegiance, and from whom we are to expect protection, as Lord and Christ.

V. 37-41. We have seen the wonderful effect of the pouring out of the Spirit, in its influence on the preachers of the Gospel. We are now to see another blessed fruit of it, in its influence on the hearers of the Gospel. Let us see the method of it.

I. They were startled, and convinced, and put upon a serious inquiry, v. 37. Having patiently heard Peter out, they were pricked to the heart, or in the heart, and, under a deep concern and perplexity, applied themselves to the preacher with this question, What shall we do? It was very strange such impressions should be made on such hard hearts all of a sudden! Yet, when they heard this plain scriptural sermon, they were much affected with it. 1. It put them in pain; Peter, charging the death of Christ upon them, as accessories, awakened their consciences, and the reflection they now made upon it, pierced them, as they had pierced Christ. Those that are truly sorry for their sins, and ashamed of them, and afraid of the consequences of them, are pricked to the heart. 2. It put them on inquiry. Ministers are spiritual physicians, they should be advised with, as here, by those whose consciences are wounded; and it is good for people to be free and familiar with those ministers, as men and their brethren, who deal for their souls as for their own. Those that are convinced of sin, would gladly know the way to peace and pardon, ch. 9: 6. 16:39.

II. Peter and the apostles direct them what they must do, and what in so doing they might expect, v. 38, 39. 1. Repent; this was the same duty John the Baptist and Christ had preached, and now the Spirit is poured out, it is still insisted on; Repent, repent. 2. Be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, i. e. firmly believe the doctrine of Christ, and submit to his grace and government; and make an open, solemn profession of this, and come under an engagement to abide by it, by submitting to the ordinance of baptism; be proselyted to Christ and to his holy religion, and renounce your infidelity.' They must be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ. They believed in the Father and the Holy Ghost, speaking by the prophets; but they must also believe in Jesus, that He is the Christ, the Messiah, promised to the fathers; 'Take Jesus for your King, and by baptism swear allegiance to Him; take Him for your Prophet, and hear Him; take Him for your Priest, to make atonement for you;' which seems peculiarly intended here; for they must be baptized in his name for the remission of sins, on the score of his righteousness. 3. This is pressed on each particular person; there is grace enough in Christ, be ye ever so many, and grace suited to the case of every one. Israel of old were baptized unto Moses in the camp, the whole body together, when they passed through the cloud and sea, 1 Cor. 10:1, 2. for the covenant of peculiarity was national; but now every one of you, distinctly, must be baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, and transact for himself in this great affair. See Col. 1:28.

2. He encourages them to take that course: (1.) 'It shall be for the remission of sins. Repent, and be baptized into the faith of Christ, and in truth you shall be justified, which you could never be by the law of Moses.' (2.) 'You shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost as well as we; for it is designed for a general blessing; some shall receive these external gifts, and each, if sincere in your faith and repentance, his internal graces and comforts; shall be sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise.' (3.) 'Your children shall still have, as they have had, an interest in the covenant, and a title to the external seal of it.' v. 39. The promise was very express, Is. 44:3. 59:21. Gen. 17:7. Now it is proper for an Israelite, when he is by baptism to come into a new dispensation of this covenant, to ask, 'What must be done with my children? Must they be thrown out, or taken in with me?' 'Taken in,' says Peter, 'by all means; for the promise, that great promise, of God's being to you a God, is as much to you and to your children now as ever.' (4.) 'Though the promise is still extended to your children as it has been, yet it is not, as it has been, confined to you and them, but the benefit of it is designed for all that are afar off;' we may add, and their children, for the blessing of Abraham comes on the Gentiles, through Jesus Christ, Gal. 3:14. Rom. 9:4. even on as many particular persons in each nation, as God shall call effectually into the fellowship of Jesus Christ.

III. These directions are followed with a needful caution, v. 40. The unbelieving Jews were an untoward generation, perverse and obstinate, they walked contrary to God and man, 1. Thess. 2:15. wedded to sin and marked for ruin. Now as to them, Save, i. e. separate yourselves, distinguish yourselves, from this untoward generation.

children; and not to those present only, but to all, however dispersed, whom God should call by his Gospel. The promise, as made to Abraham, included also his posterity; and that of the new covenant did the same to those who should be interested in it; and the language here records with this. Jer. 32:39-41. Rom. 11:11-21. 1 Cor. 7:10-14. The male descendants of Abraham were circumcised, as included in the promise, and as a part of the visible church; and this passage may intimate, that the infant-offspring of Christians, being also included in the promise, and in the covenant of their parents, and being a part of the visible church, should be admitted to baptism, which is the outward sign of the same spiritual blessings, as circumcision was. Gen. 17:9-12. S. (33.) Gift, &c.] 'Comp. v. 17. i. e., the effects of divine grace, a full and accurate knowledge of divine things, a fervent and constant striving after holiness, a most ardent desire to profess and propagate the doctrine of Christ.'

(39.) All afar off.] 'Peter seems to have understood Gentiles, [so Æcum., Bloomf., &c.] but (comp. Acts 10.) not till they had passed over to the Jewish religion.' KUIX. 'The Spirit of God, by which he spoke, had doubtless the calling of the Gentiles, in view.' Dr. A. C., Henry, Scott. Since Peter knew not of this calling of the Gentiles, he could only mean the dispersed of Israel: but the Spirit of God might have a further view.' Doddr. 'The phrase is equally applicable to those who have been afar off from God, by their sins, and their evil affections.' Barnes.

41 ¶ Then they that gladly received his word were baptized: and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls.

42 And they continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers.

43 And fear came upon every soul: and many wonders and signs were done by the apostles.

44 And all that believed were together, and had all things common;

45 And sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need.

Be not rebellious like this rebellious house; partake not their sins, that you share not their plagues. To separate from wicked people, is the only way to save ourselves from them; we may thereby expose ourselves to their rage and enmity, but it is better to have the trouble of swimming against their stream than the danger of being carried down it. Those that repent, and give themselves to Jesus, must evidence their sincerity by breaking off all intimate society with wicked people.

IV. The happy success and issue, v. 41. The Spirit wrought with the Word, and did wonders by it. These, that had many of them been eyewitnesses of the death of Christ, and the attendant prodigies, unwrought upon, were yet wrought upon by the preaching of the Word, for that is the power of God unto salvation.

1. They received the Word; admitted its conviction, accepted its offers. 2. They gladly received it; though humbling to them, and likely to expose them to the enmity of their countrymen. 3. They were baptized; believing with the heart, they made confession with the mouth, and enrolled themselves among the disciples of Christ by that sacred rite and ceremony which He had instituted. And though Peter had said, 'Be baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus,' yet we have reason to think that, in baptiz-

V. 41. As it is highly improbable, that there should have been none of John's disciples in this large company; we may fairly infer, that Christ's baptism was not precisely the same institution with John's; and that from this time, at least, John's disciples were baptized, when they were admitted into the Christian Church, according to the form appointed by our Lord after his resurrection. 19:5, 6. Mat. 3:5, 6, 23:19, 20. John 3:22-24. As so great a number were baptized on this occasion, and as they were not by the river Jordan 'where was much water,' or near to any other river; but in the midst of a populous city, crowded also with strangers, it is at least highly probable, that they were not baptized by immersion: especially seeing the baptism of the Holy Ghost, represented by it, is constantly, and in several places of the chapter, spoken of, as 'poured out' upon them. (See on 33.) SCOTT. Received. 'The Gr. apodechesthai, as applied to things, denotes to receive, assent to, approve, admit, follow the authority of, &c. So Xen., Eurip. See Kypke, &c. Baptizel. In the earlier ages of Christianity, those who acknowledged Jesus to be the Messiah were received, by this solemn rite, into the Christian Church; so that a fuller instruction did not precede, but follow baptism.' BLOOMER. 'Lightf. has well remarked, that the Gentiles who received the Christian doctrine, were baptized in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; the Jewish converts only in the name of the Lord Jesus.' Dr. A. C. '[This] was the true model of a revival of religion, and a perpetual demonstration, that such scenes as have characterized our own age and nation especially, are strictly in accordance with the spirit of the N. T.—And it was especially proper there should be given, by an inspired man, a record of a true revival of religion. The human mind, as all experience shows, is prone to enthusiasm and fanaticism; and men might be disposed to pervert the Gospel to scenes of wild-fire, disorder, and tumult. That the Gospel would produce excitement, was well known to its Author. It was well, therefore, that there should be some record to which the church might always appeal, as an infallible account of the proper effects of the Gospel; some inspired standard, to which might be brought all excitements on the subject of religion. If they are in accordance with the first triumphs of the Gospel, they are genuine; if not, they are false.' BARNES.

V. 42, 43. The conversion of this great multitude was sudden; yet their profession was not transient or wavering. SCOTT.

(42.) Breaking of Bread. Breaking of bread was 'that act which preceded a feast or meat: and which was performed by the master of the house when he pronounced the blessing: what we would call grace before meat.' See on Mat. 26:26. Dr. A. C. 'The Gr. phrases tr.

ing them, the whole form Christ prescribed was used in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Those that receive the Christian covenant, ought to receive the Christian baptism. 4. Hereby there were added to the disciples about 3000 souls that same day. The conversion of these 3000 with these words, was a greater work than the feeding of 4000 or 5000 with a few loaves. They who are joined to Christ, are added to the disciples of Christ. When we take God for our God, we must take his people to be ours.

V. 42—47. In these vs. we have the history of the truly primitive church, of the first days of it, its state of infancy indeed, but, like that, the state of its greatest innocence.

1. They kept close to holy ordinances, and abounded in all instances of piety and devotion; for Christianity, admitted in the power of it, will dispose the soul to communion with God, in all those ways wherein He has appointed us to meet Him, and promised to meet us. 1. They were diligent and constant in their attendance on the preaching of the Word: continued in the apostles' doctrine; or, as it may be read, continued constant to the apostles' teaching or instructions. 2. They kept up the communion of saints, v. 42, 46; not only had a mutual affection, but a great deal of mutual conversation; they were much together. They were concerned for one another, sympathized with one another, and heartily espoused one another's interests. They had fellowship with one another in religious worship; the temple was their place of rendezvous: and though they met with the Jews in the courts of the temple, yet the Christians kept together by themselves, and were unanimous in their separate devotions. 3. They frequently joined in the ordinance of the Lord's supper; they kept up this memorial of the death of Christ, because it was an institution of Christ, to be transmitted to the succeeding ages of the church. They broke bread from house to house,—house by house; not in the temple, for the eucharist was peculiar to the Christian institutes, and therefore they administered that ordinance in private houses, choosing such houses of the converted Christians as were convenient, to which the neighbors resorted. 4. They continued in prayer, after the Spirit was poured out, as well as before, for prayer will never be superseded till it comes to be swallowed up in everlasting praise. Breaking of bread comes in between the Word and prayer, for it has reference to both, and is a help to both. The Lord's supper is a sermon to the eye, and a confirmation of God's Word to us; and it is an encouragement to our prayers, and a solemn expression of the ascent of our souls to God. 5. They abounded in thanksgiving; were continually praising God, v. 47. They that have received the gift of the Holy Ghost, will be much in praise.

II. They were loving one to another, and very kind; their charity was as eminent as their piety, and their joining in holy ordinances knit their hearts, and very much endeared them to one another.

1. They had frequent meetings for Christian converse, v. 44. All that believed, were together; not all those thousands in one place; but, as Lightfoot explains it, different companies or congregations, according to their languages, nations, or other references. They thus expressed and increased their mutual love. 2. They had all things common: perhaps common tables, or, there was such a concern for one another, and such a readiness to help one another, as there was occasion, that it might be said, They had all things common, according to the law of friendship; one wanted not what another had, for he might have it for the asking. 3. They were very cheerful, and very generous in the use of what they had; a great deal of religion appeared in their common meals; they did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart. None have such cause to be cheerful as good Christians have; it is pity, but that they should always have hearts to be so. It made them very liberal to their poor brethren, and enlarged their hearts in charity. They did eat their meat with singleness of heart,—with liberality of heart; so some; they bid the poor welcome to their table, not grudgingly, but with all the hearty freedom imaginable. It becomes Christians to be open-hearted and open-handed, and in every good work to sow plentifully, as those on whom God hath sowed plentifully, and who hope to reap so. 4. They raised a fund for charity, v. 45. This was to destroy, not property, break bread and breaking of bread, in the N. T. are not only used to denote breaking of bread, breaking it to pieces and giving it to others, (see Is. 58:7. Jer. 16:6. Luke 24:30, 35. Mat. 14:19.) but are likewise so used as to denote the meal itself, and the common partaking of the food. Hence, also, "to break bread" is used of the Lord's supper in 1 Cor. 10:16. Er., Schmid, Beza, &c., understand, a common meal; but this is proved false by the words, "doctrine" and "prayer," associated; and thus are enumerated rather the parts of divine worship in the assembly of Jerusalem. The Syr. tr. the Lord's supper, and artos [bread] elsewhere r. lamb, (as in Acts 20:7.) he has here expressed by Eucharist. So some Fathers, and many recent interpreters, as Heuman, Lightf., Suicer, Schoettgen, and Wolf. But in v. 45, the subject treated of is plainly common meals, nor is there any sufficient reason why the words, "breaking bread" should there be taken in any other sense than the "breaking of bread" in this passage. I therefore do not hesitate to assent to Limborch, Mosheim, Barkey, Hansen, and others, who take the expression here, and at Acts 20:7. to denote common sacred meals, called agape [love-feasts,] to which the richer Christians contributed, for the use and relief of the poorer brethren, and which used to precede the celebration of the Lord's supper. See 1 Cor. 11:16. &c. Kuin. So Bloomer, 'Doddr., Casaubon, Grot., and Wolf, think a common meal is meant.'

V. 44—47. The same disposition [i. e., of liberality and charity] ought always to prevail: yet it is evident, that the same way of expressing it is not required, nor would it be in general expedient. The minds of the new converts were occupied almost entirely with the important concerns of eternal salvation; and as numbers of them were far from home, and probably had not many secular affairs to attend on; they daily continued, in the most harmonious manner, to meet together in the courts of the temple for the worship of God, and in the houses of believers, one after another, as they had opportunity; where they hospitably entertained each other, as well as joined in sacred ordinances. What a lovely exhibition of the effects of genuine Christianity, when applied and blessed by the Spirit of God! What excellent and what happy characters does it form! SCOTT.

(44, 45.) 'I incline to Whitby, Wolf, Heuman, Kuin., Heinrich, &c., that the words here are not to be too much pressed, not to be interpreted of an absolute community of goods; since it does not follow because the richer Christians, for the purpose of relieving the necessities of their poorer brethren, sold part of their goods, that they gave up all, and had no property in their own hands, and could not afterwards sell it. That

46 And they, continuing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart, 47 Praising God, and having favor with all the people. And the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved.

CHAP. III.

<sup>1</sup> Peter, preaching to the people that came to see a lame man restored to his feet, <sup>12</sup> professeth the cure not to have been wrought by his or John's own power, or holiness, but by God, and his Son Jesus, and through faith in his name; <sup>13</sup> withal reprehending them for crucifying Jesus. <sup>17</sup> Which because they did, through ignorance, and that thereby were fulfilled God's determinate counsel, and the scriptures. <sup>19</sup> he exhorteth them by repentance and faith to seek remission of their sins, and salvation in the same Jesus.

NOW Peter and John went up together into the temple at the hour of prayer, being the ninth hour.

as Mr. Baxter says, but selfishness. Herein, probably, they had an eye to the command Christ gave to the rich man, as a test of his sincerity, Sell that thou hast, and give to the poor. Not that this was intended for an example, to be a constant binding rule, as if all Christians in all places and ages were bound to sell their estates, and give away the money in charity. For Paul, after this, often spake of the distinction of rich and poor, and Christ hath said, that the poor we have always with us, and shall have, and the rich must be always doing them good out of the issues of their estates, which they disable themselves to do, if they sell them, and give all away at once. But here the case was extraordinary. (1.) They were under no obligation of a divine command to do this, as appears by what PRACT. OBS. Delays as to the performance of God's promises, till the appointed time is 'fully come,' are peculiarly advantageous to those, who wait on Him in patient faith, and fervent, persevering prayer. When a company of believers are 'of one heart,' thus to seek and hope for 'the pouring out of his Holy Spirit,' a revival of true religion may reasonably, but confidently, be expected; for the promise stands sure, that 'our heavenly Father will give his Holy Spirit to them that ask Him.' (Jer. 32:39-41. Luke 11:5-13, v. 13.) We cannot explain the manner of his operation; but we may perceive, that with invincible power He bears down all the opposition of pride and worldly lusts and prejudices, as 'with a rushing mighty wind,' and changes the heart like a vehement fire. We do not expect such miraculous powers, as were communicated to the apostles on the day of Pentecost; yet we share the benefit of them; both in the demonstrative evidence thus given to the truth of the Gospel, and in the infallible declaration, which they have authenticated and transmitted to us, concerning the way in which we may be saved.—The remarkable pouring out of the Spirit, even in his ordinary influences and operations, will always produce a this power of sale was left them, and was voluntary, is clear from the story of Ananias and Sapphira, 5:4. Thus also, the words of 4:32. plainly indicate, that only the use of the possessions was common, not the possessions themselves. "It clearly appears, (says Kuin,) that there were those among the Christians that had property and kept it. Thus 12:12. one Mary had houses of her own at Jerusalem. Nor do we find in the Epistles any vestige of there having been a community of property in the rest of the Christian societies. Nay, we find that there were rich and poor. By the admonition of the apostles, money, indeed, was collected for the use of the poor, (1 Cor. 16:1.) and contributed on the Lord's day. They therefore had retained their possessions. Moreover, in 1 Thess. 4:11. the apostle exhorts the Christians to provide for their support by the labor of their hands; and in 2 Thess. 3:7, and 12. he urges this by his own example. See also 1 Eph. 4:23. Acts 9:36. 11:29. Thus the words, 'and they had all things common,' are to be taken in a popular sense, and nearly as the old adage 'all things are common among friends.'" Kuin. BLOOF. The Ed., however, thinks that a common reader of this passage, (44, 45, and it seems to be properly tr.) would understand, and correctly, a community of goods, in the broadest sense. So have some of our missionaries practised. Ep.

(47.) Church.] See in Mat. 16:18. 'Ekklesia: to the assembly of the followers of Christ. The word church [in the Gr.] properly means those who are called out, and is applied to Christians as being called out, or separated from the world. It is used but 3 times in the gospels, Mat.

Peter said to Ananias, ch. 5:4. Was it not in thine own power? But it was a very commendable instance of their raisedness above the world, their contempt of it, their assurance of another world, their love to their brethren, their compassion to the poor, and their great zeal for encouraging Christianity, and nursing it in its infancy. Our rule is, to give according as God hath blessed us; yet in such an extraordinary case as this, those are to be praised, who give beyond their power, 2. Cor. 8:3. (2.) They were Jews that did this, and they who believed Christ, must believe that the Jewish nation should shortly be destroyed, and an end put to the possession of estates and goods in it, and, in the belief of that, they sold them for the present service of Christ and his church.*

III. God owned them, and gave them signal tokens of his presence with them, v. 43. Many wonders and signs were done by the apostles, of divers sorts, which confirmed their doctrine, and incontrovertibly proved that it was from God. And more yet, the Lord added to the church daily. It is God's work to add souls to the church; and a great comfort both to ministers and Christians.

IV. The people were influenced by it; the standers by, spectators. 1. They feared them, and had a veneration [mixed with admiration] for them, v. 43. every soul, i. e., very many who saw the wonders and signs done by the apostles, and were afraid, lest their not being respected, as they should be, would bring de-olation on their nation. The common people stood in awe of them, as Herod feared John. Fear came upon every soul; and the souls of people were strangely influenced by their awful preaching and living. 2. Far the greater part of the common people favored them, though there were those that despised and hated them, surely the Pharisees and chief priests did. Undissembled piety and charity will command respect; and cheerfulness in serving God will recommend religion to those that are without. Some read it, They had charity to all the people; they did not confine their charity to those of their own community, but it was catholic and extensive; and this recommended them very much. 3. They fell over to them. Some or other daily, though not so many as the first day; and they were such as should be saved. Those that God has designed for eternal salvation, shall one time or other be effectually brought to Christ; and those that are brought to Christ, are added to the church in a holy covenant by baptism, and in holy communion by other ordinances.

CHAP. III. In this ch. we have a miracle, (but one, of the many, 2:43.) and a sermon: the miracle wrought to make way for the sermon, and the sermon to explain the miracle, and to sow the ground which by it was broken up. The former part of the discourse opens the wound, the latter applies the remedy.

V. 1-11. Peter and John, [whose diverse qualities made them the complement of each other, and so helps-meet,] seem to have had a peculiar intimacy after Christ's resurrection more than before, John 20:2. The reason of which, (if I may conjecture,) might be, that John was more compassionate to Peter on his fall and repentance, than any other of the apostles were, and more solicitous to restore him in the spirit of meekness; which made him very dear to Peter ever after: and it was a good evidence of Peter's acceptance with God, on his repentance, that Christ's favorite was made his bosom-friend.

Their miracle was in the temple, whither Peter and John went up together, because it was the place of concourse; and we may suppose it within the compass of the days of the pentecost. However, it was at the hour of prayer, one of the hours of public worship; these, among the Jews, were three, the ninth hour, i. e., 3 o'clock in the afternoon; also at 9 o'clock in the morning, and 12 at noon, other two. See Ps. 55:17. Dan. 6:10. It is of use for private Christians so far to have their hours of prayer as may serve, though not to bind, yet to remind, conscience; every thing is beautiful in its season.

The patient was a poor lame beggar (probably paralytic, v. 7.) at the temple-gate. He would not have been laid daily there, if measure of the same effects, as this extraordinary communication did. To suppose that, now Christianity is publicly professed among us, and we have no longer need of the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, we therefore do not want his sanctifying operations; is as unreasonable, as it would be to argue from the present improved state of agriculture, that the influences of the sun and rain are become unnecessary: and the state of those congregations, where such notions are maintained, too plainly show the real tendency of them. If Peter and Paul should come again on earth to preach the Gospel, and to confirm their doctrine with the most undeniable miracles; no saving effects would follow, except the Holy Spirit were given to render the Word successful. It should also be noticed, as the evident doctrine of the sacred oracles, that when God so remarkably pours out his Spirit, in abundance of spiritual gifts and graces, on numbers of every rank and station, as to effect a great revival of true religion; it may also be expected, that He will remarkably punish those, who persist in neglecting and despising his great salvation. NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1-11. The events in this ch. and that which follows, seem to have occurred soon after those which have been considered. The apostles and primitive believers generally attended the temple-worship at the hours of prayer; of which the 3d and 9th, or 9 o'clock in the morning and 3 in the afternoon, when the morning and evening sacrifices were offered with burning of incense, were the chief. The two apostles Peter and John seem, however, on this occasion to have gone up to the temple apart from the others; perhaps to seek an opportunity of preaching to the people, as well as to offer their supplications before God. The Beautiful gate of the temple was erected by Herod the Great: it was above 15 yards high, and about 8 yards wide, being formed of Corinthian brass, with the most exquisite workmanship. [50 cubits high, its doors 40 c., adorned more than the other

3 Who seeing Peter and John about to go into the temple, asked an alms.

4 And Peter, fastening his eyes upon him, with John, said, Look on us.

5 And he gave heed unto them, expecting to receive something of them.

6 Then Peter said, Silver and gold have I none; but such as I have give I thee: In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth rise up and walk.

7 And he took him by the right hand, and lifted him up: and immediately his feet and ankle bones received strength.

8 And he, leaping up, stood, and walked, and entered with them into the temple, walking, and leaping, and praising God.

9 And all the people saw him walking, and praising God:

10 And they knew that it was he which sat for alms at the Beautiful gate of the temple: and they were filled with wonder and amazement at that which had happened unto him.

11 And as the lame man which was healed held Peter and John, all the people ran together unto them in the porch that is called Solomon's, greatly wondering.

12 ¶ And when Peter saw it, he answered unto the people, Ye men of Israel, why marvel ye at this? or why look ye so earnestly on us, as though by our own power or holiness we had made this man to walk?

he had not been used to meet with daily supplies there. Our prayers and our alms should go together; Cornelius' did, ch. 10: 4. Objects of charity should be in a particular manner welcome to us, when we go up to the temple to pray.

Peter, instead of turning from him, as many do from objects of charity, turned to him, nay, fastened his eyes upon him, v. 4. John did so too. The man justly thought this gave him cause to expect he should receive something from them, v. 5. But Peter said, Silver and gold have I none. The apostles were very poor, had but just enough for themselves, and no overplus. Peter and John had abundance of money laid at their feet, but that was appropriated to the maintenance of the poor of the church, and they would not convert any of it to their own use, nor dispose of it otherwise than according to the intention of the donors. Public trusts ought to be strictly and faithfully observed.

8, with richer and thicker plates of silver and gold. Jos., in Dr. A. C.] It is supposed to have separated the court of the Gentiles from the inner court. [The text of Jos. is by no means clear. Dr. A. C.] The purpose of the apostles to work a miracle in this man's behalf, seems to have arisen from an immediate divine suggestion to their mind. The circumstances attending this miracle need no comment. There is not the least probability in the tradition of the Jews, that this very portico was built by Solomon, and was spared by the Chaldeans, when they burnt the rest of the temple. Scorr. 'A portico 400 c. long, built by Solomon, on the E. side of the outer court, was left standing by Herod.' See Jos. Ed.

Yet Peter goes far beyond his highest expectations. Those who are poor in the world, may yet be rich, very rich, in spiritual gifts, graces, and comforts; certainly there is that which we are capable of receiving, which is infinitely better than silver and gold; the merchandise and gain of it better, Job 28:12, &c. Prov. 3:14, &c. The cure of his disease would enable him to work for his living, so that he should not need to beg any more; nay, he would have to give to them that needed, and it is more blessed to give than to receive. Those may be, and ought to be, otherwise charitable and helpful to the poor, who have not wherewithal to give in charity. As every one has received the gift, so let him minister it.

Let us now see how the cure was wrought.

Peter bids him rise up and walk; which would have been a banter, if he had not premised, in the name of Jesus of Nazareth. He bids the cripple rise up and walk; which does not prove that he had power in himself to do it, but proves (if he attempt to rise and walk, and, in a sense of his own impotency, depend on a divine power to enable him to do it) that he shall be enabled; and by rising and walking he must evidence, that that power has wrought upon him; and then let him take the comfort, and let God have the praise. Thus it is in the healing of our souls, that are spiritually impotent. If we set ourselves to do what we can, God has promised his grace to enable us to do what we cannot: and by that promise we partake of a new nature; and that grace shall not be in vain; it was not here; his feet and ankle-bones received strength; which they had not done, if he had not attempted to rise, and been helped up; he does his part, and Peter does his, and yet it is Christ that does all.

He leaped up; did not stool up, with fear and trembling, as weak people do when they begin to recover strength; but started up; as one refreshed with sleep, boldly, and with great agility, and as one that questioned not his own strength. He held Peter and John, v. 11. We need not ask why. I believe he scarcely knew himself: but it was in a transport of grateful joy; he would have them stay with him, while he published to all about him what God had done for him by them. Those whom God hath healed, love his instruments, and see the need of their further help. He went into the temple, not only to offer up his praises and thanksgivings to God, but to hear more from the apostles of that Jesus in whose name he had been healed. Those that have experienced the power of Christ, should earnestly desire to grow in their acquaintance with Christ. Here was that Scripture fulfilled, Is. 35:6. Then shall the lame man leap as a hart. Now that this man was newly cured, he was in this excess of joy and thankfulness. All true converts walk, and praise God; but perhaps young converts leap more in his praises.

See how the people, that were eyewitnesses of this miracle, were influenced by it.

I. They were entirely satisfied in the truth of the miracle, and had nothing to object against it, v. 10. They all knew the man; and for that reason he was chosen to be the vessel of this mercy. Now they were not so perverse as to make any doubt whether he was the same man, as the Pharisees had questioned concerning the blind man that Christ cured, John 9:11. They now saw him walking and praising God, v. 9. perhaps noticed a change in his mind; for he was now as loud in praising God, as he used to be in begging. The best evidence that it was a complete cure, was, that he praised God for it. Mercies are then perfected, when they are sanctified. 2. They were filled with wonder and amazement, v. 10. greatly wondering, v. 11. in an ecstasy. There seems to be this effect of the pouring out of the Spirit, that the people, at least those in Jerusalem, were more affected with the miracles the apostles wrought than with those of Christ Himself; and this was in order to the miracles answering their end. 3. They gathered about Peter and John; some, only to gratify their curiosity with the sight of men that had such power; others, with a desire to hear them preach, concluding that their doctrine must needs be of divine original, which thus had a divine ratification. They flocked to them in Solomon's porch, a part of the court of the Gentiles, where Solomon had built the outer porch of the temple. Or, it was some cloisters or piazzas, Herod had erected on the same foundation on which Solomon had built that stately porch [or propylon?] that bore his name. Here the people met, to see this great sight.

V. 12—26. We have here the sermon Peter preached after he had cured the lame man.

I. He humbly disclaims the honor of the miracle, as not due to them, who were only the ministers of Christ, or instruments in his hand. Christ had done such things many a time, and they had not duly regarded it, or been affected with it; why marvel now; and give so much of the praise to them? Why look so earnestly on us? Useful men must see to it, that they be very humble.

II. He preaches Christ to them; that was his business, that he might lead them into obedience to Christ.

I. He preaches Christ, as the true Messiah, promised to the fathers, v. 13. for, He is Jesus the Son of God; they had lately condemned Christ as a blasphemer, for saying, He was the Son of God, yet Peter avows it; He is his Son Jesus; to Him, dear as a Son; to us, Jesus a Savior. God hath glorified Him, in raising Him up to be King, Priest, and Prophet, of his church; He hath glorified Him as the God of our fathers, whom he names with respect, for they were great names with the men of Israel, and justly, the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob. God sent Him into the world, pursuant to the promises to those patriarchs, that in their seed the families of the earth should be blessed, and the covenant with them, that God would be a God to them, and their seed. The apostles call the patriarchs their fathers, and God the God of those patriarchs, from whom the Jews were descended; to intimate to them, that they had no evil design on the

(5) Expecting, &c.] 'For it was a constant custom for all who entered the temple, to carry money with them for the treasury, or poor, or both.' In many parts of the E. no superior is approached without a gift, comp. Ex. 23:15. and in 'Catholic' and Oriental countries the doors of houses of worship are still places of alms. Martial mentions the custom, too, among the Gentiles. Ed.

V. 12—16. Holiness. (12) 'Here is a plain evidence of the variation of the Roman doctrine from that of the apostles, assisted by the Holy Ghost: for the apostles here plainly disclaim any excellency or piety in them, which might make them worthy to be God's instruments, above any others, in working such miracles; but the catechism of the council of Trent plainly declares, that God confers on us many benefits by the merits of the saints; and Lorinus, on the place, declares, that innumerable histories, and the practice of the church, show that the merits of the saints are prevalent for the working of miracles.' Whitby. —Through faith, &c.] Some expositors interpret this of the faith which the lame man exercised in the name of Jesus; and the probability that he had heard and seen Christ Himself, as well as the piety which apparently accompanied his gratitude to Peter and John for his 13 The God of Abraham and of Isaac, and of Jacob, the God of our fathers, hath glorified his Son Jesus; whom ye delivered up, and denied him in the presence of Pilate, when he was determined to let him go.

14 But ye denied the Holy One and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted unto you;

15 And killed the Prince of life, whom God hath raised from the dead; whereof we are witnesses.

16 And his name, through faith in his name, hath made this man strong, whom ye see and know: yea, the faith which is by him hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all.

17 And now, brethren, I wot that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers.

18 But those things, which God before had shewed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer, he hath so fulfilled.

19 Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord;

Jewish nation, but were well-wishers to it; and the Gospel they preached, was the revelation of the mind and will of the God of Abraham. See ch. 26: 7, 22. Luke 1: 72, 73.

2. He charges them flat and plain with the murder of this Jesus, as he had done before, mentioning the circumstances of the ease, and aggravating their guilt, v. 13-15. Particularly, the holiness and justice of the Lord Jesus, which are something more than his innocency, were a great aggravation of the sin. Observe, also, the antithesis: 'You preserved a murderer, a destroyer of life; and destroyed the Savior, the Author of life.'

3. He attests his resurrection as before, ch. 2: 32. and ascribes the cure to the power of Christ, v. 16. He repeats it again, The faith which is by Him hath given him this soundness. Here, he appeals to themselves concerning the truth of the miracle; the man was not acquainted with Peter and John before, and they knew him to be a cure, favors the opinion that he was a believer. Yet it does not appear that he previously expected a cure; and the texts referred to, will, I think, convince the attentive reader, that the faith of the apostles was intended. (Mat. 21:21,22. Mark 11:20-26) [Faith always receives, never gives. Dr. A. C.] This was designed to show, that Jesus was risen; that He was indeed the Messiah, and as such honored by the God of Abraham; and that the apostles were his servants and witnesses.—Every reflecting person must observe the very great difference, which there was in the manner of our Lord's working his miracles, and that of his apostles. His language was that of omnipotence and sovereignty, 'I will, be thou clean;' 'Peace, be still;' 'Damsel, arise.' Nor did He ever, except in the case of Lazarus, which has been considered, even appeal by prayer to his Father, or give the least intimation of any power exerted, except what was inherent in Himself. He never hesitated to receive the greatest honor, which was rendered on these occasions; He never cautioned any man against supposing that He wrought miracles by 'his own power, and to manifest his own glory.' (John 2:6-11, v. 11.) But the apostles wrought their miracles expressly 'in his name,' and by faith in Him: they were afraid of receiving any honor to themselves, except as the undeserving instruments in the hands of Jesus: they referred all the honor to their Lord: and they never mentioned the Father; except to show, that the God of Abraham was fulfilling in 'his Son Jesus,' the promises made to the patriarchs, and was determined to glorify in every way that Person, whom the Jews had treated with contempt and indignity. No satisfactory reason ever was, or ever can be, given of this manifest difference; but by allowing that Jesus knew cripple from a child. The miracle was wrought publicly, and they had liberty to examine it immediately, and may yet. The cure was complete, perfect soundness. It was done by the name of Christ, not merely by naming it as a spell or charin, but by us as professors and preachers of his name, by virtue of a commission and instructions received from Him, and a power He has invested us with: a power of Christ is fetched in, through faith in his name, a confidence in Him, a dependence on Him, a believing application to Him, and expectation from Him, even that faith which is by Him, which is of his working, not of ourselves, but the gift of Christ, and for his sake, that He may have the glory of it; for He is both the Author and Finisher of our faith. Lightfoot suggests, that faith is twice named in this v., because of the apostles' faith in doing this miracle, and the cripple's faith in receiving it; but I suppose it relates chiefly, if not only, to the former. By this true and just account of the miracle, Peter both confirmed the great gospel-truth they were to preach to the world,—that Jesus Christ is the Fountain of all power and grace, and the great Healer and Savior; and recommended the great gospel-duty of faith in Him, as the only way of benefit by Him. It explains, likewise, the great gospel-mystery of our salvation by Christ; it is his name that justifies us, that glorious name of his, The Lord, our Righteousness; but we, in particular, are justified by that name through faith in it, applying it to ourselves. Thus does Peter faithfully preach unto them Jesus, and Him crucified.

III. He does all he can to convince them, yet is careful not to drive them to despair. The guilt was very great, but,

1. He mollifies their crime, by a candid imputation of it to their ignorance, and by calling them brethren, v. 17. This was the language of Peter's clarity, and teaches us to make the best of those whom we desire to make better. Perhaps some of the rulers, and people, did therein rebel against the light and convictions of their own consciences, and did it through malice; but the generality went down the stream, and did it through ignorance; as Paul persecuted the church, 1 Tim. 1: 13.

2. He mollifies the effect of their crime,—the death of the Prince of life; this sounds very dreadful, but it was according to the Scriptures, v. 18. whose predictions, though they did not necessitate their sin, yet did necessitate his sufferings; so He Himself saith, Thus it is written, and thus it behooved Christ to suffer. You did it through ignorance, may be taken in this sense, 'You fulfilled the Scripture, and did not know it. God was fulfilling the Scripture, when you were gratifying your own passions.' It was not only determined in the secret counsel of God, but declared to the world many ages before, by the mouth and pen of the prophets, that Christ should suffer, in order to the accomplishment of his undertaking; and it was God Himself that showed it by them, who will see that his words be made good. Now, though this is no extenuation at all of their sin, in hating and persecuting Christ to the death, yet it was an encouragement to them to repent, and hope for mercy on their repentance; not only because in general God's gracious designs were carried on by it, but because in particular the death and sufferings of Christ were for the remission of sins, and the ground of that display of mercy which he now encouraged them to hope for.

IV. To apply his sermon, he exhorts them all to turn Christians, and assures them it would be unspeakably for their advantage for ever.

1. They must believe. (1.) That Jesus Christ is the promised Seed, that Seed of Abraham according to the flesh, in which, God had told Abraham, all the kindreds of the earth should be blessed, v. 25. Gen. 12: 3. and not the families of Israel only; all have some benefits by Him, and some have all benefits. (2.) That Jesus Christ is a Prophet, that Prophet like unto Moses, which God had promised to raise up to them from among their brethren, v. 22. This refers to Deut. 18. Christ is a Prophet; in Him all divine revelation centres; He is a Prophet, like unto Moses, a Favorite of Heaven, more intimately acquainted with the divine counsel, and more familiarly conversed with, than any other prophets. He was a Deliverer of his people, and their Guide, a Prince and a Lawgiver, the Builder of the true tabernacle, as Moses was of the typical one. [Christ, like Moses, was the introducer of a new dispensation.] Moses was murmured against by Israel, defied by Pharaoh, yet God owned him, and ratified his commission. Moses was a pattern of meekness and patience, so is Christ. Moses died by the Word of the Lord, so did Christ. There was no prophet like unto Moses, Num. 12: 6, 7. Deut. 34: 10. but a greater than Moses is here where Christ is. He is a Prophet of God's raising up; He took not this honor of Himself, but was called of God to it. He was raised up unto Israel in the first place; He executed this office in his own person, among them only; they had the first offer of divine grace; therefore, He was raised up from among them; of them, as concerning the flesh, Christ came; which, as it was a great honor done to them, so it was both an obligation on them, and an encouragement to them, to embrace Him. The O. T. church was blessed with many prophets, a constant succession of prophets for many ages, which is here noticed, v. 24. but those servants being abused, last of all God sent them his Son who had been in his bosom. (3.) That times of refreshing will come from the presence

Himself to be 'One with the Father' and co-equal to Him; and that the apostles were conscious, that they were weak and sinful men, who depended on Jesus alone for every thing.—His name, &c.] His power accompanying the use of 'his name,' with 'faith in his name,' even 'the faith that is by Him,' effected the cure. SCOTT.

(16.) 'And it is by faith in his name that He hath strengthened this poor man, whom you see here before you, and know to have been unable from his birth to walk: [Tea.] I repeat it, it is his name, and the faith which is centred in Him, and which derives its efficacy from his power, that has given,' &c. Doddr., adopting the pointing of Heinsius. Ed.

V. 17. Wot.] 'From the Anglo-Saxon witan, to know.' Dr. A. C. V. 19-21. The words [The times of refreshing, &c.] may be rendered, perhaps more clearly, 'That seasons of refreshment may come [so Tertullian, Heinsius, Lightf., De Dien, Raphaelius, Doddr., Dr. A. C., &c.] from the presence of the Lord; and that He may send Jesus Christ, who hath been before preached unto you, &c.'—'Divine refreshment would no doubt immediately mingle itself with the sense of pardon, and eternal happiness would at length certainly succeed. But the following elapse seems to intimate, that Peter apprehended, that the conversion of the Jews as a people, would be attended with some extraordinary scene of prosperity and joy, and open a speedy way to Christ's descent from heaven, in order to "the restitution of all things." Vitrina agrees in this interpretation.' Doddr. The prophets in general predicted, not only glorious times to the church, under the reign of the Messiah, but to the nation of Israel when converted to Him. (Marg. Ref. y.) That

20 And he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you :

21 Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.

22 For Moses truly said unto the fathers, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me ; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you.

23 And it shall come to pass, that every soul, which will not hear that prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people.

of the Lord, v. 19. and that they will be the times of the restitution of all things, v. 21. There is a future state, another life after this; those times will come from the presence of the Lord, from his glorious appearance at that day, his coming at the end of time. The absence of the Lord occasions many of the securities of sinners, and the distrusts of saints; but his presence is hastening on, which will for ever silence both. Some understand this of a state on this side the end of time; but it is rather to be understood of that end of all things, which God hath spoken of by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began; for this is that which Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of, Jude 14. and the temporal judgments, which the other prophets foretold, were typical of that which the apostle calls the eternal judgment. This is more clearly and plainly revealed in the N. T. than it had been before, and all that receive the Gospel have an expectation of it. With this will come the nation had long been harassed and oppressed in various ways, and was at the time, when Peter spoke, under the Roman yoke, which was extremely galling; and the wickedness of the rulers and people, in crucifying the Messiah, might seem to have filled up the measure of their national guilt, and ripened them for destruction. But as Jesus, after his resurrection, had directed his apostles to 'preach repentance and remission of sins in his name to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem;' Luke 24:44-49, v. 47.) and as the success of their first attempt had been so signal, and they had hitherto met with no opposition; it is probable, they expected that Christ would soon 'restore the kingdom to Israel,' having first brought the nation in general to repent and believe in Him; (1:4-8.) and would afterwards, by their means, bring the other nations to embrace the religion of Israel, and so, as proselytes, to seek admission into the kingdom of the Messiah. Then, perhaps, they expected that Jesus would return again from heaven, set up a triumphant kingdom on earth; and, destroying all obstinate enemies, would introduce those glorious days, which all the prophets had foretold.—It is undeniable, that the apostles, for a considerable time after the day of Pentecost, did not clearly understand many things, relating to the calling of the Gentiles, the rejection of the Jews, and the fulfilment of the prophecies. (2:14-21, 10:9-16, 44-48, 11:1-18, 15:1-21, Mat. 24:3.) Their minds were enlightened, and their prejudices dissipated; rapidly indeed, yet gradually, and as their present circumstances and duties required. Thus the ancient prophets were inspired to foretel as much, as it was proper should at the time be known; yet they did not immediately, or certainly, know the meaning of their own predictions; (1 Pet. 1:10-12.) and the apostles and primitive Christians after the event understood them far more clearly, than the prophets themselves had done. In like manner, after the conversion of Cornelius, and the council at Jerusalem, Christians in general would understand Peter's words, concerning the 'pouring out of the Spirit on all flesh,' more distinctly than he did when he uttered them; and after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the abolishing of the Mosaic dispensation, the surviving Christians would more exactly perceive the meaning of the words before us, than Peter himself did at the time. Our Lord had told the apostles: 'It is not for you to know the times and the seasons, which the Father had put in his own power,' (1:7.) and there is ground to believe, that this, in many respects, was not clearly revealed to them, but left to be discovered by the event. (2:14-21.) Had the nation of Israel, as a body, embraced the Gospel, 'the times of refreshment would have come from the presence of the Lord;' and when the nation shall thus turn to their long rejected Messiah, those times will come. But the prophets who foretold these events, predicted also a national rejection of the Messiah, and dreadful desolations to the people, with long-continued dispersions. It was not, however, necessary, that the Holy Spirit should, on this occasion, make known 'the times and seasons' of these dispensations; and, without such an immediate revelation, the apostle might expect that these happy times for his nation were at hand. Even to the end of the N. T., such an obscurity is left on these subjects, that diverse opinions still prevail, in respect of the reign of Christ during the millennium, whether it is to be personal or spiritual; (Rev. 20:4-6.) and his times of refreshing, v. 19. of consolation to the Lord's people, like a cool shade to those that have borne the burden and heat of the day. All Christians look for a rest that remains for the people of God, after the toils of their present state, and, with the prospect of that, they are borne up under their present sufferings, and carried on in their present services.

2. He tells them they must, (1.) Repent, bethink themselves of what they have done amiss, return to their right mind, admit a second thought, and submit to the convictions of it; they must begin anew. (2.) Be converted, face about, return to the Lord their God, from whom they had revolted. It is not enough to repent of sin, but we must be converted from it, and not return to it again. They must not only exchange the profession of Judaism for that of Christianity, but the power and dominion of a carnal, worldly, sensual mind, for that of holy, heavenly, and divine principles and affections. (3.) Hear Christ, the great Prophet; attend his dictates, receive his doctrine, submit to his government. Hear Him with a divine faith, as prophets should be heard, that come with a divine commission: in all things; 'let his laws govern all your actions, and his counsels determine all your submissions.'

A good reason is here given, why we should be observant of, and obedient to, the Word of Christ; for it is at our peril if we turn a deaf ear to his call, and a stiff neck to his yoke, v. 23. The destruction of the city and nation, by war and famine, was threatened for slighting the prophets of the O. T.; but the destruction of the soul, a spiritual and eternal destruction, is threatened for slighting Christ, this great Prophet.

3. He tells them what they might expect. (1.) Pardon of their sins; this is always spoken of as the great privilege of all those that embrace the Gospel, v. 19. This intimates, that when God forgives sin, He remembers it no more against the sinner; it is forgotten, as that which is blotted out; all the bitter things written against the sinner, Job 13:26. are wiped out, as it were with a sponge; it is the cancelling of a bond, the vacating of a judgment; but if no repentance, no remission. The most comfortable fruit of the forgiveness of our sins will be when the times of refreshing shall come; the comfort will be complete, when the pardon shall be allowed in open court, and our justification published before angels and men; when, whom He justified, them He glorifies, Rom. 3:30. During these times of toil and conflict, we cannot have that full satisfaction of our pardon, and in it, that we shall have when the refreshing times come, which shall wipe away all tears. (2.) The comfort of Christ's coming, v. 20, 21. 'He shall send Jesus Christ, the same Jesus, the very same which before was preached unto you; for you must not expect another dispensation, another Gospel, but the continuance and completion of this; some way or other Jesus shall be seen to you.' It is agreeable to a state of trial and probation, that the glorified Redeemer should be out of sight, because we must live by that faith in Him, which is the evidence of things not seen: because He must be believed on in the world, He must be received up into glory. Hammond reads it, Who must receive the heavens, that is, who must receive the glory and power of the upper world; He must reign till all be made subject to Him, 1 Cor. 15:25. Ps. 75:2. Yet it is promised, that He shall be sent to all that repent, and are converted, v. 20. 'He shall send Jesus Christ, who was preached to you, both before and since his resurrection, and you shall have his spiritual presence, the comfort of his being sent. He shall send Him to destroy Jerusalem, and the nation of unbelieving Jews, and to deliver his ministers and people from them, and that shall be a time of refreshing, which you shall share in.' Then had the churches rest; so Hammond. He shall send Him to judge the world, at the end of time, and then you shall lift up your heads with joy, knowing coming to set up his kingdom all over the earth, has been very generally, even by diligent expositors and other learned writers, confounded with his coming to judge the world: and in various other particulars this obscurity and inaccuracy is found. Now, that which was to be obscurely foretold, a prophet or apostle might but obscurely foresee: and the historian merely records the apostle's discourse.

Blotted out.] The ancients marked on wax tablets, [with a metal pointed at one end and flat at the other], and erased by closing up the marks with the flat part; this is the proper meaning of the Gr., here. The metaphor is in Is. 43:23. 2 Mac. 43:23. is from creditors crossing out their debtors' accounts when discharged, Col. 2, &c. It is an image frequent in the Rabbins; so Valck., Kuin. But the primary sense is to wipe off, for as ateiphō, means to besmear with oil, ewateiphō means the contrary, to wipe off the oil. &c. There is the same metaphor in the Latin delere and Heb. mehh. Bloomf. Dr. A. C. thinks the phrase may refer to Num. 5:23. Most of the ink used in the E. is made without a mordant, and so is wiped off the pasteboard, parchment, board, leaf, or ivory, with a sponge. See Horne, and note, end of Ez. The climate of Judea is said to be too hot for the use of wax. Ed. Refreshing.] 'Anapsyche; properly, cooling after being heated; metaphorically, refreshment, rest, and this, to an Oriental, [who, as a traveller remarks, thinks it very strange one should move when he can remain still,] is an image of felicity, and is perpetually so used in the SS. The days of the Messiah, then, from the presence, i. e., caused by the will, direction, of God, are meant here.' Bloomf.

Doddr. (John 5:45-47.) The general meaning of the passage is here compendiously given; but it is not a quotation, properly speaking, either from the Sept., or the Heb.; between which there is no material difference.

24 Yea, and all the prophets from Samuel, and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days.

that your redemption draws nigh. It seems to refer to this, for till then the heavens must receive Him, v. 21. As God's counsels from eternity, so his predictions from the beginning of time, had a reference to the transactions of the last day, when the mystery of God shall be finished, as He had declared to his servants the prophets, Rev. 10:7.

PRACT. OBS. 'Happy are those whose souls are so formed for devotion, that the proper returning seasons of it, whether public or private, are always welcome! Doubly delightful that friendship, which, like this of Peter and John, is endeared, not only by taking sweet counsel together, but by going to the house of God in company.' Ps. 55:14. DODDR.

The stated seasons of communion with God, and opportunities of doing good, will be welcomed with alacrity, proportioned to the degree in which we are 'spiritually minded;' for the carnal mind alone complains of the tediousness and too frequent returns of these sacred services; as sickly persons even loathe the sight of the food, which the healthy relish and enjoy. Poverty and simplicity, and contempt of filthy lucre, in the ministers of Christ, are far better proofs of integrity, than affluence, splendor, and luxury: and, while the Lord employs others as his stewards, in dispensing wealth to relieve the necessities of their brethren; it should not grieve the 'steward of the mysteries of God,' if he be constrained to say to the expecting poor, 'Silver and gold I have none, but such as I have I give unto thee.' If we would attempt to good purpose the healing of men's souls, we must go forth in the name and power of Jesus Christ; calling on helpless sinners to arise, and walk in the way of holiness, by faith in Him. SCOTT.

'Happy the minister whose heart is thus intent upon all opportunities of doing good, as these holy apostles were! Happy that faithful servant, who, like them, arrogates nothing to himself, but centers the praise of

V. 24—26. It is not necessary to prove, that predictions concerning Christ are found in the writings of every one of the prophets, for the words imply a general, not a universal, proposition: yet Jonah and Nahum alone appear to be exceptions; for Obdiah certainly is not. The book of Jonah is a history, not a prophecy; and he was a remarkable type of Christ. That of Nahum, is 'the burden of Nineveh,' and relates expressly as a prophecy to no other subject. This ch. furnishes additional and very striking views of the admirable spirit, which actuated and fully possessed the apostles, after the day of Pentecost. Behold their moderation and their piety, still gladly taking part in the Jewish worship (1); their simplicity, perfectly willing to be and to pass for poor men (6); their tenderness to the afflicted; (6, 7.) their indifference to themselves, and zeal for their Divine Master; (12, 13, &c.) their boldness; (13—15.) yet, withal, their candor (17); and their affectionate compassion for souls. (19, 25, 26.)—What do we want, as Christians or as ministers, but to be formed to such blessed tempers as these, thus happily blended together? And by what means were the apostles formed to them, but by the influence of that same Spirit, who is so firmly promised, and even urgently offered, to 'every one' that asks his [18] to Christ. They, as Israelites, were, above any other, God's favorite nation, and the favors God bestowed on them were such as had a reference to the Messiah, and his kingdom; Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant. A double privilege! They were the children, that is, the disciples, of the prophets, as children at school; of that people, from among whom the prophets were raised up, and to whom all prophets were sent, Amos, 2: 11. All the inspired writers, both of the Old and N. T. were of the seed of Abraham; and to them were committed the oracles of God, Rom. 3: 2. Their government was constituted by prophecy, i. e. by divine revelation; and by it their affairs were for many ages very much managed, Hos. 12: 13. Those of the latter ages of the church, when prophecy had ceased, might yet be fitly called the children of the prophets, because they heard, though they did not know, the voices of the prophets, which were read in their synagogues every sabbath-day, Acts 13: 27. Now this should quicken them to embrace Christ, and they might hope to be accepted of Him; for their own prophets had foretold, that this grace should be brought unto them at the revelation of Jesus Christ, 1 Pet. 1: 13. and therefore ought not to be neglected by them, nor should be denied to them. We may apply it particularly to ministers' children, who, if they plead that effectually with themselves, as an inducement to be faithful and forward in religion, may comfortably plead it with God, and hope that the children of God's servants shall continue. They were the children, i. e. the heirs, of the covenant which God made with our fathers, as children in the family. All the kindreds of the earth were blessed in having a church for Christ among them; and those that were the seed of Abraham, according to the flesh, stood fairest for this privilege. They had the first offer of the grace of the N. T. an encouragement to hope, that, if they did repent, and were converted, He should be yet further sent for their comfort, v. 20. He shall send Jesus Christ, for to you first He hath sent Him, v. 26. The personal ministry of Christ, as that of the prophets, was confined to the Jews; He was not then sent, but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and He forbade the disciples He then sent forth, to go any further. After his resurrection, He was to be preached indeed to all nations, but they must begin at Jerusalem, Luke 24: 47. And when they went to other nations, they first preached to the Jews they found therein. 'Therefore, do your part; repent, and be converted, because Christ is ready to do his, in turning you from your iniquities, and so blessing you.'

CHAP. IV. V. 1—4. Surely the Scribes and Pharisees, and chief priests, were so confounded at first with the pouring out of the Spirit, that they were for a time struck dumb! But their forces rally again, and here we have an encounter between them and the apostles; for from the beginning the Gospel met with opposition. Let Christ's servants be ever so resolute, Satan's agents will be spiteful; and therefore, let Satan's agents be ever so spiteful, Christ's servants ought to be resolute.

I. Peter and John went on in their work, and not in vain. They spake to all within hearing, v. 1. What they said, concerned all, and they spake it openly and publicly. This doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, was verified in Jesus; this they proved, they preached it as their warrant for what they did. It is secured also by Christ to all believers. The resurrection of the dead includes all the happiness of the future state; this they preached through Jesus Christ, attainable through Him, Phil. 3: 10, 11. and Him only. They meddled not with matters of state, but preached to people heaven as their end, and Christ as their Way. See ch. 17: 18.

The hearers cheerfully received it, v. 4. not all, perhaps not the most, yet many, to the number of about 5000, over and above 3000 we read of before. Though the preachers were persecuted, the Word prevailed; for sometimes the church's suffering days have been her growing days; the days of her infancy were so.

II. The chief priests and their party, (always sworn enemies to Christ and his Gospel, as jealous for their priesthood as Cæsar for his monarchy,) now made head against them, and did what they could to crush them; but their hearts were not changed. The captain of the temple, is sup-all in Him who is the great Source from whom every good and perfect gift proceeds! Happy the man who is himself willing to be forgotten and overlooked, that God may be remembered and owned!

'May ["this Jesus of Nazareth"] strengthen the feeble power of fallen nature, while we are attempting to raise men up; and may spiritual health and vigor, when restored, be improved in God's service and thankful acknowledgments.—We are not to wonder, that, as the name of Jesus, their great Deliverer, is incomparably precious to all that truly believe, such have also some peculiarly tender friendships for the persons by whose means He has wrought this good work upon them. May many such friendships be formed now, and be perfected in glory!' DODDR.

Let not sinners imagine, that religion calls them to be uneasy and unhappy; but rather that it kindly offers to guide them to true felicity. Let none suppose that they can be happy, by continuing in sin; when God declares, that the blessing consists in being 'turned from their iniquities.' Let none think that they understand and believe the Gospel, who seek deliverance only from the punishment of sin, but do not expect happiness by salvation from sin itself; and let none expect to be turned effectually from their constitutional or customary iniquities, except by believing in Christ the Son of God, being 'found in Him,' 'who of God is made to' all believers, 'Wisdom, and Righteousness, and Sanctification, and Redemption.' SCOTT.

presence?—This also repels the suspicion of enthusiasm. Where is the wnywardness or self-sufficiency of an enthusiast? On the contrary, moderation, candor, and modesty, are united with most decided courage, and most fervent zeal, in the conduct of the apostles. SCOTT.

4 Howbeit, many ° of them which heard the word believed; and the number of the men was about five thousand.

5 ¶ And it came to pass on the morrow, that their rulers, and elders, and scribes,

6 And Annas <sup>d</sup> the high priest, and Caiaphas, and John, and Alexander, and as many as were of the kindred of the high priest, were gathered together at Jerusalem.

7 And when they had set them in the midst, they asked, By <sup>e</sup> what power, or by what name, have ye done this ?

8 Then Peter, filled <sup>f</sup> with the Holy Ghost, said unto them, Ye rulers of the people, and elders of Israel,

9 If we this day be examined of the good deed done to the impotent man, by what means he is made whole ;

posed to be a Roman officer, governor of the garrison placed in the tower of Antonia, for the guard of the temple: so that still here were both Jews and Gentiles confederate against Christ. The Sadducees also were zealous against them, who denied the being of spirits, and the future state. 'One would wonder (saith Mr. Baxter) what should make such brutists, as the Sadducees were, such furious silencers and persecutors. If there is no life to come, what harm can other men's hopes of it do them? But in depraved souls all faculties are vitiated. A blind mind has a malignant heart and a cruel hand, to this day.'

It grieved these, both that the gospel-doctrine was preached, and so publicly, so boldly, and that the people were so ready to hear it: for they thought, when they had put Christ to such an ignominious death, his disciples would ever after be ashamed and afraid to own Him, and the people would have invincible prejudices against his doctrine, Ps. 112:10. It grieved them that the apostles preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead. The Sadducees opposed that doctrine, and could not bear to hear of a future state, to hear it so well attested. The chief priests, though they professed to believe the resurrection of the dead against the Sadducees, yet they would rather give up that important article than have it preached and proved to be through Jesus.

They, i. e. their servants and officers, laid hands on them, and put them in hold, committed them to the custody of the proper officer until the next day; they could not examine them now, for it was even-tide, and yet would defer it no longer than till next day. See how God trains up his servants for sufferings by degrees, and by less trials prepares them for greater; now they resist unto bonds only, but afterwards to blood.

V. 5—14. We have here the trial of Peter and John. Preaching Jesus Christ, and working a miracle in his name, this is charged upon them as a crime.

I. Here is the court set; an extraordinary court, it should seem, called on purpose on this occasion. The judges were the rulers, elders, and Scribes, v. 5. The Scribes were men of learning, who came to dispute, and hoped to confound them. The rulers and elders were men in power, who, if they could not answer, thought they could silence them. The names of some of the most considerable; Annas, president of the Sanhedrim, and Caiaphas, the high priest, (though Annas is here called so,) and father of the house of judgment. It should seem, that Annas and Caiaphas executed the high priest's office alternately, year for year; they two were most active against Christ; then Caiaphas was high priest, now Annas was. John is supposed to be the son of Annas; and Alexander is mentioned by Josephus, as a man that made a figure at that time. There were others likewise that were of the kindred of the high priest, who, having dependence on him, and expectations from him, would be sure to say as he said, and vote with him against the apostles. Great relations, and not good, have been a snare to many.

II. The prisoners are arraigned, v. 7.

1. They are brought to the bar; set in the midst, for the Sanhedrim sat in a circle, and they who had anything to do in the court, stood or sat in the midst of them, Luke 2:46. so Lightfoot. Thus the Scripture was fulfilled, Ps. 22:16. Ps. 118:12. They were seated on every side.

2. The question they asked them, was the same they had asked their Master, Mat. 21:23. 'Who commissioned you to preach such a doctrine as this, and empowered you to work such a miracle as this? You have no warrant or license from us, and therefore are accountable to us whence you have your warrant.' Some think this question was grounded on a fond conceit, that the very naming of some names might do wonders, as ch. 19:13. The Jewish exorcists used the name of Jesus. Now they would know what name they used in their cure; they knew very well, v. 2. yet they ask them, to tease them, and try if they could get anything out of them that looked criminal.

III. Their plea, not so much to clear and secure themselves, as to advance the name and honor of their Master. The apostles, with a holy negligence of their own preservation, set themselves to preach Christ, as He had directed them to do in such a case, and then Christ made good to them his promise, that the Holy Ghost should give them in that same hour what they should speak. Christ's faithful advocates shall never want instructions, Mark 13:11. The plea is a solemn declaration,

I. That what they did was in the name of Jesus Christ, which was a direct answer to the question the court asked them, v. 9, 10. 'Now if we be reckoned with for this good deed, we have no reason to be ashamed, 1 Pet. 2:29. ch. 4:14, 16. Let them be ashamed, who bring us into trouble for it.' He transfers all the praise and glory of that good deed to Jesus Christ. He charges it on the judges themselves, that they had been the murderers of this Jesus. Peter will miss no occasion to convince them of sin. He attests the resurrection of Christ as the strongest testimony for Him, and against his persecutors. He tells them, that God raised Him from the dead, and they could not for shame answer him with that foolish suggestion, that they palmed on the people, that his disciples came by night and stole Him away. He commands all manner of persons, from the highest to the lowest, to notice it at their peril; 'Be it known to you all, all here present, all the people of Israel, wherever dispersed; as the Lord God of gods knows, so Israel shall know, all Israel, that wonders are wrought in the name of Jesus, not by repeating it as a charm, but believing in it as a divine revelation of grace and goodwill to men.'

2. That the name of this Jesus, by the authority of which they acted, is that name alone by which men can be saved. He passes from this particular instance to show, that it is not a particular sect, a party, that is designed to be set up by the doctrine they preached, and the miracle they wrought, as the sects of the philosophers, and those among the Jews; but it is a sacred and divine institution that is hereby ratified and confirmed, and which all people are highly concerned to submit to, and come into the measures of. It is not an indifferent thing, but of an absolute necessity, that people believe in this name, and call upon it; we are obliged to it, in duty to God, and in compliance with his designs, v. 11. Probably, Peter chose to use this quotation, because Christ had Himself used it in answer to the demand of the chief priests and the elders concerning his authority, not long before, Mat. 21:42. Scripture is a tried weapon in our spiritual conflicts; let us therefore stick to it. We are undone if we do not take shelter in this name; for we cannot be saved but by Jesus Christ, and if we be not eternally saved, we are eternally undone, v. 12. Neither is there salvation in any other. There is no other religion in the world, no,

V. 4. Some think, that 5000 were converted on this occasion; but it rather seems, that this number was then completed; for it is not likely, that any one day should be honored with greater success, than that on which the Holy Spirit first descended: nor do the words convey that idea to the mind, but rather that 'the number became about 5000;' yet they imply, that the women and children were not included. SCOTT.—'But andron [tr. men] may mean either virorum, or hominum.' Bloomf., who, with Camerarius, Pisc., Doddr., Ros., and Kuin., includes the 5000.

V. 5—12. Caiaphas seems to have performed the ordinary functions of the high priesthood, and Annas to have had the greater influence and authority in the council. [It seems most probable, that Annas was the vicar or deputy of Caiaphas the high priest, and was also, by courtesy, styled high priest.] Bloomf. 'The kindred of the high priest,' must have been different persons from the heads of the 24 courses; as many of these were no more his kindred, than all the other priests were; i. e. they were descended from Aaron, either by Eleazar, or Ithamar.—Some learned men have labored to prove, that healing, or the cure of bodily disorders, is meant in the concluding v.; and not eternal salvation; because the same original word in some instances signifies healing. In fact, it denotes deliverance, whether from disease, slavery, death, or damnation; and the context must fix the meaning. But in this place, the miracle of the man who had been healed, was merely adduced as a proof that Jesus was risen from the dead, and was consequently the Messiah, the Son of God, and the only Savior for sinners. The apostles, the rulers, and audience, did not want miraculous cures of bodily diseases; but they all needed a Savior and salvation: the name of Jesus is given to men of every age and nation, as that by which alone believers are saved from the wrath to come, and 'with an everlasting salvation;' not from bodily sickness and temporal death. [See, too, Doddr.] Indeed, every reader must perceive, what energy there was in the address to the consciences of these persecutors, according to the obvious interpretation of it; and how this vain criticism enervates it, and causes all its spirit and vigor to evaporate.—The insertion of you, in quoting the prophecy (11) was very pointed. It was saying to each of them, 'Thou art the man.'—(11) This is the stone, &c.] Nearly from the Sept., which agrees with the Heb. Ps. 118:22.

SCOTT.—(6.) 'John might be (as Lightf. thinks) the celebrated Rabbi, Joehanan Ben Zaccai, of the Talmud, a scholar of Hillel.' Doddr. 'Alexander is thought by Pearson, Krebs, Doddr., and Mangey, to have been brother to the celebrated Philo Judæus, frequently mentioned by Jos.' Bloomf. Kindred, &c.] 'Luke mentions this to show how powerful were their enemies.' Ros., Kuin.

(7.) Name, &c.] 'The Jewish exorcists then cast out devils, and healed dangerous disorders, not merely by the use of medicines, but by employing various formulas of incantation, as, for instance, the name of Solomon, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, or God.' KUIN. (10.) Stand here.] 'They had, it seems, sent for the man.' IN.

11 This is the stone <sup>b</sup> which was set at nought of you builders, which is become the head of the corner.

12 Neither is their salvation in any other: for <sup>i</sup> there is none other <sup>j</sup> name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved.

13 ¶ Now when they saw the boldness of Peter and John, and perceived that they were <sup>k</sup> unlearned and ignorant men, they marvelled; and they took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus.

14 And beholding the man which was healed standing with them, they could say nothing <sup>l</sup> against it.

15 But when they had commanded them to go aside out of the council, they conferred among themselves, 16 Saying, <sup>m</sup> What shall we do to these men? for that indeed a notable miracle hath been done by them <sup>n</sup> is manifest to all them that dwell in Jerusalem; and we cannot deny <sup>o</sup> it.

17 But that it spread no farther among the people, let us straitly threaten them, that <sup>p</sup> they speak henceforth to no man in this name.

18 And they called them, and commanded them not to speak at all nor teach in the name of Jesus.

19 But Peter and John answered and said unto them, Whether it be right in the sight of God to <sup>q</sup> hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye.

20 For <sup>r</sup> we cannot but speak the things which <sup>s</sup> we have seen and heard.

21 So when they had further threatened them, they let them go, finding nothing how they might punish them, because <sup>t</sup> of the people: for all men glorified God for that which was done.

not that delivered by Moses, by which salvation can be had for those that do not now come into this, at the preaching of it. So Dr. Hammond. Observe here, Our salvation is our chief concern, and that is not in ourselves, nor can be obtained by any merit or strength of our own; we can destroy ourselves, but we cannot save ourselves. How far those who have not the knowledge of Christ, nor any actual faith in Him, yet live up to the light they have, may find favor with God, it is not our business to determine. But this we know, that, whatever saving favor such may receive, it is on the account of Christ, and for his sake only; so that still there is no salvation in any other.

I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known Me. Is. 45:4.

IV. The stand the court was put to, v. 13, 14. Now was fulfilled that promise Christ made, that He would give them a mouth and wisdom, such as all their adversaries should not be able to gainsay or resist.

1. They could not deny the cure of the lame man to be both a good deed and a miracle; he was there, standing with Peter and John, ready to attest the cure, if there was occasion, and they had nothing to say against it, v. 14. either to disprove or disparage it.

2. They could not, with all their pomp and power, face down Peter and John; this was a miracle not inferior to the cure of the lame man, considering both what cruel, bloody enemies these priests had been to the name of Christ, and considering what cowardly, faint-hearted advocates those disciples had lately been for Him, Peter particularly; yet now they see the boldness of Peter and John, v. 13. Probably, there was something extraordinary and very surprising in their looks, something majestic in their foreheads, sparkling in their eyes, and commanding, if not terrifying, in their voice. They set their faces like a flint, as the prophet, Is. 50:7. Ez. 3:8. The courage of Christ's faithful confessors has often been the confusion of their cruel persecutors. Now,

(1.) We are here told what increased their wonder; They perceived that they were unlearned and ignorant men: they inquired either of themselves or others, and found that they were of mean extraction, born in Galilee, bred fishermen, and not at the feet of any of the Rabbins, nay, perhaps, talk to them on any point in natural philosophy, mathematics, or politics, and you will find they know nothing of the matter; and yet speak to them of the Messiah and his kingdom, and they speak with so much clearness, evidence, and assurance, so pertinently, and so fluently, and are so ready in the Scriptures of the O. T. relating to it, that the most learned judge on the bench is not able to answer them, or to enter the lists with them. They were ignorant men,—private men, (so, perhaps, the Gr.) that had not any public character or employment; therefore they wondered they should have such high pretensions.

(2.) We are told what made their wonder in a great measure to cease; they took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus; they themselves had seen them with Him in the temple, and now recollected it, or some informed them of it. And now they knew what to impute their boldness to; nay, their boldness in divine things was enough to show with whom they had had their education. Those that have been with Jesus, in converse and communion, have been attending on his Word, praying in his name, and celebrating the memorials of his death and resurrection, should conduct themselves, in every thing, so that those who converse with them may take knowledge of them, that they have been with Jesus. And that makes them so holy, and heavenly, and spiritual, and cheerful; that has raised them so much above this world, and filled them with another. One may know that they have been in the mount, by the shining of their faces.

V. 15—22. We have here the issue of the trial.

I. The consultation and resolution of the court, and their proceeding thereupon.

1. The prisoners were ordered to withdraw, v. 15. the court were willing enough to get clear of them, and not willing they should hear the acknowledgments extorted from them.

2. A debate arose; they conferred among themselves. The question was, What shall we do to these men, v. 16. When men will not be persuaded to do what they should do, no marvel they are ever and anon at a loss what to do. The truths of Christ, if men would but entertain them as they should, would give them no manner of trouble or uneasiness; but if they hold them, or imprison them, in unrighteousness, Rom. 1:18. they will find them a burdensome stone, that they will not know what to do with, Zech. 12:3.

3. They came at last to a resolution, in two things. (1.) That it was not safe to punish the apostles for what they had done; they stood now in as much awe as they had formerly, when they durst not lay hands on Christ for fear of the people; for it was a notable miracle, a known miracle, known to have been done in Christ's name, and in proof of his doctrine; this was an opinion universally received, and the miracle being wrought at the gate of the temple, universal notice was taken of it; and they themselves, with all the craft and all the front they had, could not deny it to be a true miracle; every body would have booted at them if they had. They could easily deny it to their own consciences, but not to the world. The proofs of the Gospel were undeniable. Even those that were not persuaded by it to believe in Christ, were yet so affected with it as a mercy to a poor man, and an honor to their country, that they could not but praise God for it; even natural religion taught them to do that. And if the priests had punished Peter and John, for that for which all men glorified God, they would have lost all their interest in the people, and been abandoned as enemies both to God and man. Thus, therefore, their wrath shall be made to praise God, and the remainder thereof shall be restrained. (2.) That it is necessary to silence them for the future, v. 17, 18. God will have the knowledge of Christ spread all the world over, but the chief priests would have it spread no further, which He that sits in heaven laughs at. There is not a greater service done to the devil's kingdom, than the silencing of faithful ministers, and the putting them under a bushel that are the lights of the world. Christ had not only charged them to preach the Gospel to every creature, but had promised to bear them out in it, and reward them for it. Now these priests not only forbid them to preach the Gospel, but threaten to punish it as a heinous crime; but those who know how to put a just value on Christ's promises, know how to put a just contempt on the world's threatenings, though they be of slaughter; ch. 9:1.

II. The courageous resolution of the prisoners to go on in their work, notwithstanding, v. 19, 20. Peter and John needed not confer together, to know one another's minds, (for they were both actuated by one and the same Spirit,) but agree presently in the (11.) The head of the corner, to which the whole building owes its strength, its union, and its beauty.

V. 15—22. Ignorant.] Idiotai: opposed to the learned, it means illiterate; to persons of rank, the low; to persons in office, private and plebeian persons, as here. Bloomf. But it is true, that the apostles were, before this body, idiotai in all these senses. Ep.—Unlearned and ignorant.] This, for three centuries, was the objection against the professors of Christianity: . . . yet it is a great confirmation of the Christian faith; and shows, as Justin Martyr well observes, that it was not of human, but divine original; and that being with Jesus was sufficient to make the ignorant and unlearned wise. Whitby.—The instantaneous recovery of one born a cripple, and now more than 40 years old, was a most astonishing effect of divine power!—Not only the energetic and conclusive discourses of the apostles are admirable; but the “meekness of wisdom,” united with firmness, which distinguish all their replies;—

replies often made to persons, whose presence must have been suited to damn men of their station and their habits. They never shrink, and they are never disrespectful. They refuse to comply with the injunctions of their hostile superiors no further, than they feel themselves compelled to it by the imperious sense of duty. Their coolness, and self-possession, in the presence of persecutors, is not that affected and ostentatious, and of course irritating coolness, which some have displayed; whose conduct seemed to say, “See how indifferent we are to you! how much we are your superiors! In fact, how much we despise you!” This invites persecution; whereas the apostles always declined and avoided it, if they could.—This smiling, self-complacent coolness may be as very a working of corrupt nature, as fleeing from the cross; and not a much more difficult working, in certain circumstances. It lives upon its own admiration, and the admiration which it expects from by-standers; food which will support nothing that “belongs to the Spirit.”—It should 22 For the man was above forty years old, on whom this miracle of healing was shewed.

23 ¶ And being let go, they went to their own company, and reported all that the chief priests and elders had said unto them.

24 And when they heard that, they lifted up their voice to God with one accord, and said, Lord, thou art God, which hast made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all that in them is :

25 Who by the mouth of thy servant David hast said, Why did the heathen rage, and the people imagine vain things ?

26 The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together against the Lord, and against his Christ.

28 For to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done.

same sentiments, and jointly put in the answer; and justify themselves in still preaching on with two things.

1. The command of God; Here they appeal to a settled and acknowledged maxim in the law of nature, that if men's commands and God's interfere, God's commands must take place. It is a rule in the common law of England, that if any statute be made contrary to the law of God, it is null and void. Nothing can be more absurd than to hearken unto weak and fallible men, that are fellow-creatures and fellow-subjects, more than unto a God that is infinitely wise and holy, our Creator and sovereign Lord, and the Judge to whom we are all accountable.

2. The convictions of their consciences; they could not but speak, and speak publicly, those things which they had seen and heard. Like Elihu, they were full of this matter, and the Spirit within them constrained them, they must be remembered, that this was the first time the apostles were called to encounter opponents armed with power.—(13) Took knowledge.] If John was 'the disciple known to the high priest;' this language concerning him, as well as Peter, would scarcely have been used. SCOTT.

V. 23—23. It is generally supposed, that the company, to which the apostles returned, consisted of the 120 persons before mentioned, who probably were assembled to pray in their behalf.—The language, used in applying this prophecy to Jesus, may refer to his immaculate conception by the Holy Spirit. Thus He received his human nature perfectly holy: and the unction of the same Spirit preserved that holiness, in full perfection, through all the temptations and trials of his life and death.—'The truth is clear, that God decreed that these things should be done; although He decreed not that the Jews should do them; but only permitted them to do what He foresaw they would, if they were thus permitted.' Hammond It is then clear, that God, foreseeing this, decreed to permit them.—'As Peter and Paul, by calling the Jews to repentance for this sin, in crucifying the Lord of life, do evidence, that their sin was not the less, because they did by it fulfil the counsel of God's holy will, and kind intentions to mankind; so they consequently evidence, that God's foreknowledge and determination of a thing future, does not impair the liberty of men's wills in the accomplishment of it; as all the ancient fathers have declared in this particular.' Whitby.—[Comp. on 2:23.] 'We must not consider their work, who were wicked murderers, and profane enemies of the truth; but the work of God, which they fulfilled, without thinking of any such thing. This distinction, rightly observed, will satisfy all moderate men, that they should never separate the counsel and decree of God, from his decreeing foreknowledge; and yet that they should fix all the blame of crimes on second causes, on the devil, for instance, and man. Thus God hard-speak, that they might be refreshed, Job 32: 18, 20. They felt the influence of it on themselves; and those speak the doctrine of Christ best, that have felt the power of it, and tasted the sweetness of it, and have themselves been deeply affected with it; it is as a fire in their bones, Jer. 20:9. They know the importance of it to others; they look with concern on perishing souls, and know they cannot escape eternal ruin but by Jesus Christ, therefore they will be faithful to them, warning them and showing them the right way. They are things which we have seen and heard, and, therefore, are fully assured of ourselves; and things which we only have seen and heard: and, therefore, if we do not publish them, who will? Who can? Knowing the favor, as well as the terror of the Lord, we persuade men; for the love of Christ, and the love of souls constrain us, 2 Cor. 5:11, 14.

III. The discharge of the prisoners, v. 21. They further threatened them, and thought that they frightened them, as they often did others, John 9:22. and then let them go.

V. 23—31. I. Peter and John's return to their brethren, the apostles and ministers, and, perhaps some private Christians, v. 23. met together, and praying for them, as ch. 12:12. Though God had highly honored them, in calling them out to be his witnesses, and enabling them to acquit themselves so well, yet they were not puffed up thereby; and no advancement, in gifts or usefulness, should make us think ourselves above either the duties or the privileges of the communion of saints. Though their enemies had severely threatened them, yet they went to their own company, and feared not the wrath of their rulers. They were men in a public station, and must seek not so much their own personal satisfaction, as the public good.

II. They related all that had passed to them, 1. That they might know what to expect both from men and from God, in the progress of their work; from men, they might expect every thing terrifying, but from God every thing encouraging; thus the brethren in the Lord would wax confident through their bonds, and their experiences, as Phil. 1:14. 2. That they might have it recorded in the history of the church, for the benefit of posterity, particularly for the confirmation of our faith, touching the resurrection of Christ. These apostles told the chief priests, to their faces, that God had raised up Jesus from the dead, and though they were a body of them together, they had not the confidence to deny it, but, in the silliest and most sneaking manner imaginable, bid the apostles not tell any body of it. 3. That they might now join them in prayers and praises. We should therefore communicate to our brethren the providences of God that relate to us, and our experience of his presence with us, that they may assist us in our acknowledgment of God therein.

III. Their address to God on this occasion with one accord, v. 24. Not that they all said the same words at the same time, but one in the name of the rest lifted up his voice to God, and the rest joined with him, with one mind, so the word signifies; their hearts went along with him, and so though but one spake, they all prayed; for thoughts are words to God. Moses cried unto God, when we find not a word said. Now, in this solemn address, we have,

1. Their adoration of God as the Creator of the world, v. 24. It is very proper to begin our prayers, as well as our creed, with the acknowledgment of this, that God is the Father almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible. Though the apostles were at this time full of the mystery of the world's redemption, yet they do not forget or overlook the history of the world's creation; for the Christian religion was intended to confirm and improve, not to eclipse or justle out, the truths and dictates of natural religion.

2. Their reconciling themselves to the present dispensations of Providence, by reflecting on those Scriptures in the O. T. which foretold, that the kingdom of the Messiah would meet with such opposition as this at its first setting up in the world, v. 25, 26. What is done against Christ, God takes as done against Himself. Christianity was not only destitute of the advantages of the support of kings and rulers, but was opposed and fought against by them, yet it made its way.

3. What was foretold we see fulfilled, v. 27, 28. Herod and Pilate, the two Roman governors, with the Gentiles, the Roman soldiers under their command, and with the people of Israel, the rulers of the Jews and the mob under their influence, were gathered together in a confederacy against the Holy Child Jesus, whom Thou hast anointed. But herein they do that which thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done. In the height of his glory He is the Lamb of God, and the Child Jesus. The word signifies both a son and a servant. He was the Son of God; yet in the work of redemption He acted as his Father's Servant, Is. 42:1. It was He whom God anointed, and thence He was called the Lord's Christ, v. 26. And this comes in as a reason why they set themselves against Him, because God had anointed Him, and they were resolved not to resign, much less to submit to Him. David was envied by Saul, because he was the Lord's anointed. Now the God that anointed Christ, determined what should be done to Him, pursuant to that anointing; He was anointed to be a Savior, therefore it was determined He should be a Sacrifice, to make 30 By stretching forth thine hand to heal; and that <sup>2</sup>signs and wonders may be done by the name of thy holy child Jesus.

31 ¶ And when they had prayed, <sup>a</sup> the place was shaken where they were assembled together; and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and <sup>b</sup> they spake the word of God with boldness.

32 And the multitude of them that believed were of one <sup>c</sup> heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but <sup>d</sup> they had all things common.

33 And with great power <sup>e</sup> gave the apostles witness <sup>f</sup> of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus: and great grace <sup>g</sup> was upon them all.

34 Neither was there any among them that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, atonement for sin; He must die, therefore, He must be slain, yet not by his own hands; therefore, God wisely determined before by what hands it should be done; it must be by the hands of those who will treat Him as a criminal and malefactor, therefore not by the hands either of angels or good men, but of sinners, as Job, ch. 16: 11. Hammond makes this phrase, of God's hand determining it, to be an allusion to the high priest's casting lots upon the two goats on the day of atonement, Lev. 16: 8. Prov. 16: 33. Or, if I may offer a conjecture, it may be meant, not of God's acting hand, but his writing hand, as Job, 13: 26. Dan. 10: 31. Ps. 40: 7. And God's serving his own purposes by what they did, was no excuse for their malice and wickedness, any more than God's making the blood of the martyrs the seal of the church, extenuated the guilt of their bloody persecutors. Sin is not the less evil for God's bringing good out of it, but He is by that the more glorified, and will be so, when the mystery of God shall be finished.

4. Their petition with reference to the case at this time. (1.) That God would now take cognizance of the malice of their enemies, v. 29. There is an emphasis on the now, to intimate, that then is God's time to appear for his people, when the power of their enemies is most daring and threatening. They refer themselves to God, like Hezekiah, Is. 37: 17. (2.) That God, by his grace, would keep up their spirits, and animate them to go on cheerfully with their work. In threatening times, our care should not be so much, that troubles may be prevented, as that 'would stretch forth his hand,' not to perform miracles of vengeance, as many wrought by Moses were; nor yet to defend them; but to 'heal:' for love to the bodies and souls of men had supplanted their selfish passions, and meliorated their zeal, since the time when they desired permission to call down fire from heaven on the Samaritans.—Some expositors have thought, that this prayer was immediately addressed to the Holy Spirit; but this is not evident; and, indeed, there are few passages of Scripture, in which the Holy Spirit is expressly prayed to, personally, separately, and distinctly: perhaps, as prayer is presented both by and for the Holy Spirit, it may be the less proper to address it to Him, except as one with the Father and with the Son, in the unity of the Godhead.

(31.) Doddr. thinks some visible symbol of the Spirit's descent was seen, and Benson, that the cloven tongues fell on them again;—this (Bloomf. judiciously remarks) 'is being wise above what is written, and such temerity [seldom, indeed, chargeable to Doddr.] is carefully to be avoided, since it may lead, according to the temper of mind it meets with, as well to superstition as to skepticism.'

V. 32—35. 'And great grace was upon them all.' Some interpret this of the great favor shown the Christians, by the people in general; but the phrase is different from that before used. The special favor of God manifested to them; and the powerful effects of his sanctifying grace, in forming them to be such holy, lovely, and happy characters, we may be enabled to go on with cheerfulness and resolution in our work and duty, whatever troubles we may meet with. Observe, Those that are sent on God's errands, ought to deliver their message with boldness, with all boldness, with all liberty of speech. God is to be sought unto, and may be depended upon, for this ability. And are they daring, that fight against Christ? For shame, let not us be sneaking, that are for Him. (3.) That God would still give them power to work miracles for the confirmation of the doctrine they preached. Nothing imboldens faithful ministers more in their work, than the tokens of God's presence with them, and a divine power going along with them. They pray, that God would stretch forth his hand to heal, both the bodies and souls of men; that signs and wonders might be done by the name of the holy Child Jesus, which would be convincing to the people, and confounding to the enemies. Christ had promised them a power to work miracles, for the proof of their commission, Mark 16: 17, 18, yet they must pray for it; and, though they had it, must pray for its continuance. Christ Himself must ask, and it shall be given Him. Observe, It is the honor of Christ they aim at in this request.

IV. God's gracions answer,—not in word, but in power: there was a strong, mighty wind, such as that when the Spirit was poured out upon them, ch. 2: 1, 2. which shook the house, which was now their house of prayer. This was to show them what reason they had to fear God more, and then they would fear man less. God gave them greater degrees of his Spirit, which was the thing they prayed for. Those that were endued habitually with the powers of the Holy Ghost, had yet occasion for fresh supplies of the Spirit, according as the various occurrences of their service were; at the bar, v. 3. and now in the pulpit; which teaches us to live in an actual dependence on the grace of God, according as the duty of every day requires. As in the providence of God, so in the grace of God, we not only in general live, and have our being, but move in every particular action, ch. 17: 28. We have here an instance of the performance of that promise, that God will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him, Luke 11: 13. and also of the improvement of that gift, which is required of all on whom it is bestowed; have it and use it, use it, and have more. Talents must be traded with, not buried. When they find the Lord God help them by his Spirit, they know they shall not be confounded, Is. 50: 7.

V. 32—37. We have a general idea, and a very beautiful one, of the spirit and state of this truly primitive church; it is a view of that age of infancy and innocence.

I. The disciples loved one another dearly, v. 32. and there was no such thing as discord or division among them. Observe here,

1. Multitudes believed, even in Jerusalem, 3000 on one day, and 5000 on another, beside those added daily; and, no doubt, all were baptized, and made profession of the faith; for the same Spirit that endued the apostles with courage to preach the faith of Christ, endued them with courage to confess it. The increase of the church is its glory.

2. All were of one heart, and of one soul. Though of different ages, tempers, and conditions, before they believed, and perfect strangers to one another, yet, when they met in Christ, they were intimately acquainted. This was the blessed fruit of Christ's dying precept to his disciples, to love one another, and his dying prayer for them, that they all might be one. We have reason to think they divided themselves into several congregations, or worshipping assemblies, according as their dwellings were, under their respective ministers; and yet that occasioned no jealousy or uneasiness; for they were all of one heart, and one soul, notwithstanding; and loved those of other congregations, as truly as those of their own. Thus it was then, and we may not despair of seeing it so again, when the Spirit shall be poured out upon us from on high.

II. The ministers went on in their work with great vigor and success, v. 33. The doctrine they preached, was, the resurrection of Christ: a matter of fact, which served not only for the confirmation of the truth of Christ's holy religion, but, being duly explained and illustrated, with the proper inferences from it, served for a summary of all the duties, privileges, and comforts, of Christians. The resurrection of Christ, rightly understood and improved, will let us into the great mysteries of religion.

By the great power, wherewith the apostles attested the resurrection, may be meant, 1. The great vigor, spirit, and courage, with which they published and avowed this doctrine; Or, 2. The miracles they wrought to confirm their doctrine.

III. The beauty of the Lord our God shone upon them, and all their performances; Great grace upon all the apostles, on all the believers; grace that had something great in it, magnificent and very extraordinary. Some think it includes the favor they were in with the people.

IV. They were very liberal to the poor, and dead to this world. This was as great an evidence of the grace of God in them as any other, and recommended them as much to the esteem of the people.

1. They insisted not on property, which even children seem to have a sense of, and a jealousy for, and which worldly people triumph in, as Laban, Gen. 31: 43. and Nabal, 1 S. 25: 11. These believers were so taken up with the hopes of an inheritance in the other world, that this was as nothing to them, v. 32. They did not take away property, but were indifferent to it. They did not call what they had, their own, in a way of boasting of it, or trusting in it; they had, in affection, forsaken all for Christ, and were continually expecting to be stripped of all for their adherence to Him. No man said what he had was his own,—his peculiar; for he was seen to be especially intended.—The language used, concerning the liberal communication of all the property of the more affluent, with their poor brethren, who were thus exempted from all want; and of their confidence in the disinterested faithfulness of the apostles, is suited, as by a specimen, to show, what Christianity would effect, in meliorating the condition of mankind, if universally and cordially embraced. [See 'Mammon,' by Harris.]

(33.) Grace.] 'Rather: and they were in great favor with the people; gained by their mutual love, harmony, and liberality to the poor.' Bloomf., as Kuin., Grot., Casaubon, Pearce, Ros., Beza, Pricens, Heumann, Whitby, and Doddr. understand favor of God; Bengel, the favor of God and man.

ready to distribute, willing to communicate ; what he had to spare from himself and family, his poor neighbors were welcome to. They that had estates, were not solicitous to lay up, but very willing to lay out, and would straiten themselves to help their brethren. No marvel that they were of one heart and soul, when they sat so loose to the wealth of this world ; for mine and thine are the great make-baits. Men's holding their own, and grasping at more than their own, are the rise of wars and fightings.

2. They abounded in charity, so that, in effect, they had all things common ; for, v. 34. there was not any among them that lacked, but care was taken for their supply. The Gospel hath laid all things common, not so that the poor are allowed to rob the rich, but so that the rich are appointed to relieve the poor.

3. They did many of them sell their estates, to raise a fund for charity, v. 34. Lightfoot computes, that this was the year of jubilee in the Jewish nation, the 50th year, the 28th since they settled in Canaan, 1400 years

PRACT. OBS. The zeal of avowed infidels to make proselytes, and their unwillingness that others should believe a future state of retributions, seem at first sight unaccountable : for if this be a delusion, it can do men no harm ; if their sentiments be true, they can do no good. But the honor of being thought wiser than others, and qualified to undeceive a deluded multitude, has abundant charms for the vain-glorious mind. Moreover, infidels have their misgivings, and firmly believe their own reasonings only in proportion as others seem convinced by them : when therefore contrary doctrines are taught with confidence and success ; they are secretly alarmed, lest after all they should find themselves mistaken.—The harmless and useful servants of God have often been indicted as criminals, for 'their work and labor of love,'* when profligates [gamblers, duellists, and other murderers] have escaped with impunity ; and ungodly priests and elders, and their connexions, have commonly been most forward in these prosecutions. Nay, to this day, instances

The tribe had no inheritance with the others, Num. 18:20. 23:24. but this did not hinder any Levite from holding lands in Judca, either by purchase, gift, or in right of his wife. Josephus, a Levite, and a priest too, speaks of his lands about Jerusalem. See Pearce. Ed.

NOTES. CHAP. V. V. 1—11. This apparent severity, on two detected hypocrites, was real mercy to numbers : and a Divine attestation to the apostles' integrity and veracity, fully intelligible by their enemies. God would never have inflicted such a judgment, at their word, on inferior dissemblers, if their testimony to the resurrection of Jesus had been a deception : and it showed that they [above being influenced by motives of gain themselves] would not connive at iniquity in those of their own party, or for the sake of their private interest, or that of the society.—Many expositors suppose, that Ananias had made a vow, (either publicly or secretly,) to give his estate for the support of the Christian cause ; and that sacrilege was the crime, for which he was visited : but the history never mentions this. He had, from corrupt mo-ago, so that what was sold that year being not to return till the next jubilee, lands then took a good price, and so the sale of those lands would raise the more money.

(1.) The money so raised was not hoarded up, but distribution made, by proper persons, to every man according as he had need. Great care ought to be taken in the distribution of public charity, that it be given to such as have need, and above all, those that are reduced to want for well doing, and for the testimony of a good conscience ; and that it be given to every man, for whom it is intended, according as he had need, without partiality or respect of persons. It is a rule, in dispensing charity, as well as in administering justice, that those who are equally needing and equally deserving, should be equally helped.

(2.) One particular person is mentioned, remarkable for this generous charity, Barnabas, afterward Paul's colleague. His name was Joses, of the tribe of Levi, born in Cyprus, a great way off from Jerusalem. Notice is taken of the apostles' changing his name after he associated with them. Probably he was one of the 70 disciples, and, as he increased in gifts and graces, grew eminent, and was respected by the apostles, who, in token of their value for him, gave him a name, Barnabas,—the son of prophecy, so it properly signifies ; a son of exhortation, so some ; one that had an excellent faculty of healing and persuading ; we have an instance of it, ch. 11:22, 24. A son of consolation, so we read it ; one that did himself walk very much in the comforts of the Holy Ghost ; a cheerful Christian, one that was eminent for comforting the Lord's people, and speaking peace to wounded, troubled consciences. There were two among the apostles that were called Boanerges,—Sons of thunder, Mark 3:17. but here was a son of consolation with them. Each had his several gift, neither must censure the other, but both ease one another ; let the one search the wound, and then let the other heal it and bind it up.

Here is an account of his charity, and great generosity to the public fund ; particularly noticed, because of the eminency of his services afterward, especially in carrying the Gospel to the Gentiles : that this might not appear to come from any ill-will to his own nation, we have here his benevolence to the Jewish converts ; or, perhaps this is mentioned, as an example to others ; he having land, whether in Cyprus, or in Judca, or elsewhere, sold it, and laid the price at the apostles' feet, to be given in charity.

are not wanting, in which reading the Scriptures, social prayer, and religious conversation meet with frowns and checks ; when indolent, and dissipated, profligate, heretical, if not openly infidel churchmen escape uncensured, or are distinguished by preferments ! If however, we observe the instructions and obey the precepts of Christ, He will bear us out ; and the teaching of his Spirit will render the most timid bold in his cause.—Believers may, in various ways, be confined among those who fear not God ; but, 'being let go, they will return to their own company.'—Whatever trials we meet with, fervent prayer is our never-failing resource ; and the more we unite in it, as 'with one heart,' the more signal answers may be expected. Our prayers should especially be presented in love, even for our bitterest persecutors ; we should request that the Lord's 'hand may be stretched out to heal,' and to save, not to avenge and destroy. Thus we may expect to be effectually answered, and to be filled with inward confidence and comfort.

atives, attempted to impose on the apostles and on the Holy Spirit ; and his wife had joined him, in this impious and hypocritical attempt.—The papists adduce this passage, as a proof that the successors of Peter (i. e., the pope and the ecclesiastics devoted to him,) are invested with the secular as well as spiritual sword. Let them, therefore, use the weapons of Peter, whenever they will, but none else ; and let them see whether the same effects will follow.—(9.) Tempt, &c. 'As often as anything is done with an evil conscience ; so often men bring this sentence on themselves, and as much as lieth in them provoke God to wrath ; as if they purposely aimed to make trial, whether He be just and almighty or not.' Beza. The case, however, of Ananias and Sapphira was very peculiar, and their guilt exceedingly atrocious.—This single example of severity was made, not on avowed enemies and persecutors, but on false friends. [Showing that the church has more to fear from internal corruption, than external enemies.] Thus Judas, not Caiaphas, was marked out by his awful end, as the first object of Divine vengeance on the murderers of Christ. [See Amos 3:2.]

and what should they do in a time of need, if they should leave themselves nothing to take to? They could not take God's Word, that they should be provided for, but thought they would play a wiser part than the rest had done, and lay up for a rainy day. Thus they thought to serve both God and mammon, —God, by bringing part of the money to the apostles' feet,—and mammon, by keeping the other part in their own pockets; as if there were not an all-sufficiency in God to make up the whole to them, except they retained some in their own hands, by way of caution-money. Their hearts were divided, so were they found faulty, Hos. 10:2. They halted between two; if they had been thorough worldlings, they would not have sold their possession; if thorough Christians, they would not have detained part of the price.

3. They thought to deceive the apostles, and came with as good an assurance, and as great a show of piety and devotion, as any, and laid the money at the apostles' feet, as if it were their all. They dissembled with God and his Spirit, with Christ and his church and ministers; and this was their sin.

II. The indictment of Ananias, which proved both his condemnation and execution for this sin. When he brought the money, and expected to be commended and encouraged, as others were, Peter, without any inquiry or examination of witnesses, charges him peremptorily with the crime, aggravates it, and loads him for it, showing it him in its own color, v. 3, 4. The Spirit of God in Peter, not only discovered the fact without any information, but likewise discerned the principle of reigning infidelity in the heart of Ananias, at the bottom of it, and therefore proceeded against him so suddenly. Had it been a sin of infirmity, through the surprise of a temptation, Peter would have taken Ananias aside, and have bid him go home, and fetch the rest of the money, and repent of his folly in attempting to cheat them; but he knew his heart was fully set in him to do this evil, and, therefore, allowed him not space to repent. He here showed him,

1. The origin of the sin. Satan filled his heart; not only suggested it to him, and put it into his head, but hurried him on to do it. Whatever is contrary to the good Spirit, proceeds from the evil spirit; and those hearts are filled by Satan, in which worldliness reigns, and has the ascendant.

2. The sin itself. He lied to the Holy Ghost; a sin of such a heinous nature, that he could not have been guilty of it, if Satan had not filled his heart. The phrase we render lying to the Holy Ghost, some read, to belie the Holy Ghost; which may be taken two ways: (1.) That he belied the Holy Ghost in himself; so Lightfoot; and he supposes Ananias was not an ordinary believer, but a minister, and one that had received the gift of the Holy Ghost with the 120; (for mention is made of him immediately after Barnabas;) yet he durst thus, by dissembling, belie and shame that gift. Or, thus, They who had sold their estates, and laid the money at the apostles' feet, did it by the special impulse of the Holy Ghost, enabling them to do an act so very great and generous; and Ananias pretended he was moved by the Holy Ghost to do what he did, as others were; whereas, it appeared by his baseness, that he was not under the influence of the good Spirit at all; for had it been his work, it would have been perfect. (2.) That he belied the Holy Ghost in the apostles, to whom he brought the money, either by a suspicion that they would not faithfully distribute what they were intrusted with, or by an assurance that they could not discover the fraud; [which would have proved them liars, when they said they were endued with the Holy Spirit; and thus their influence would have been destroyed]. He belied the Holy Ghost, when by what he did he would have it thought, that those who are endued with the gifts of the Holy Ghost, might as easily be imposed on as other men, 2 K. 5:26. Thus Ananias thought the apostles were altogether such as himself, and this was belying the Holy Ghost in them, as if He were not in them a Discerner of spirits, whereas they had all the gifts of the Spirit in them, which to others were divided severally. See 1 Cor. 12:8, 10.

But we read it, to lie unto the Holy Ghost; which reading is countenanced by v. 4. Thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God. He told a deliberate lie, or expressed himself in words capable of a double meaning; or perhaps he said nothing; but it was all one, he did as the rest did, who brought the whole price, and would be thought to do so, and expected the praise of it, with the privilege of access to the common stock as they had; therefore it was an implicit protestation, that he brought the whole price, as they did; and this was a lie, for he kept back part. Many are brought to gross lying, by reigning pride, and affectation of the applause of men; particularly in works of charity to the poor. He told this lie to the Holy Ghost. It was not so much to the apostles, as to the Holy Ghost in them, that the money was brought, and that was said, which was said, v. 4. Thou hast not lied unto men, not to men only, not to men chiefly, though the apostles be but men; but thou hast lied unto God. From hence it is justly inferred, that the Holy Ghost is God; for he that lieth to the Holy Ghost, lieth to God. 'They that lied to the apostles, acted and acting by the Spirit of God, are said to lie to God, because the apostles acted by the power and authority of God. From whence it follows, (as Dr. Whitby well observes,) that the power and authority of the Spirit must be the power and authority of God.' And, as he further argues, 'Ananias is said to lie to God, because he lied to that Spirit in the apostles, which enabled them to discern the secrets of men's hearts and actions, which, being the property of God alone, he that lies to Him, must therefore lie to God, because he lies to one who has the incommunicable property of God, and consequently the divine essence.'

3. The aggravations of the sin, v. 4. While it remained, was it not thine own? And after it was sold, was it not in thine own power? Which may be understood two ways: (1.) 'Thou wast under no temptation to keep back the price, this property was unincumbered, thou hadst no debts to pay, perhaps no children to provide for;' Or, (2.) 'Thou wast under no necessity of selling thy land at all, or bringing any of the money to the apostles' feet. Thou mightest have kept the money, and the land too, and never have pretended to this piece of perfection.' This rule of charity the apostle gives, that it be not urged as of necessity, because God loves a cheerful giver, 2 Cor. 9:7. and Philemon must do a good work, not as it were of necessity, but willingly, Phil. 14. It is better not to vow, than to vow and not to pay. In giving our hearts to God, we are not admitted to divide them: God will have all or none.

4. All this guilt, thus aggravated, is charged upon him. Though Satan filled his heart to do it, yet he is said to have conceived it in his own heart; which shows that we cannot extenuate our sins, by laying the fault of them on the devil; the evil thing, whatever it is, that is said or done, the sinner has conceived it in his own heart. The close of the charge is very high, but very just; Thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God. What emphasis does the prophet lay on that of Abaz, Is. 7:13. and Moses on that of Israel, Ex. 16:8. So here. If we think to cheat God, we shall prove in the end to have fatally cheated our own souls.

III. The death and burial of Ananias, v. 5, 6.

1. He died on the spot. It does not appear whether Peter designed and expected that this would follow on what he said to him; but probably he did; for to Sapphira, his wife, Peter particularly spake death, v. 9. Some think, an angel struck him, that he died, as Herod, ch. 12:23. Or, his own conscience smote him with such horror and amazement at the sense of his guilt, that he sunk and died away under the load of it. See the power of the Word of God in the mouth of the apostles! As it was to some a savor of life unto life, so it was to others a savor of death unto death.

This punishment may seem severe, but we are sure it was just. (1.) It was designed to maintain the honor of the Holy Ghost, as now lately poured out on the apostles, in order to the setting up of the gospel-kingdom. It of proof and little probable. As to those who endeavor to account for all upon natural principles, their hypothesis, (no novelty, for it was broached by Origen,) involves more difficulties than it removes; so that, if we had not so many proofs of the credulous incredulity of skeptics, or at least latitudinarians, we should be surprised at seeing them seriously maintain such a position. Though instances of death by fright are on record; yet that any two given persons dwelling together shall die of fright, is too improbable even to think of. For Peter to threaten death, would have given the magistracy that handle against the apostles they desired. 'The Gr. is τὸ θεῷ; where [as here] theos is thus used with the article, it always means God the Father. Now Ananias and his wife did not deceive ordinary men, but the apostles, who were filled with the Spirit of God, and Christ, and therefore they insulted both the Spirit, Christ, and God the Father. Of the Holy Spirit we have express mention in this v., also in v. 3, 9; of Christ, in v. 1; of the Father in this and v. 32. 1 Cor. 6:19. 3:16. 1 Thess. 4:8. Ex. 16:8. Is. 7:13.'

(5.) 'The ancient commentators agree that this was sacrilege, the punishment of which (says Eusebius) was death. It was here aggravated by hypocrisy, vain-glory, avarice, &c.' Bloomf. Some Jews, and Porphyry, charge Peter with cruelty! But if they acknowledge he actually did it, they acknowledge it was by God, and so was God's act.

9 Then Peter said unto her, How is it that ye have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord? behold, the feet of them which have buried thy husband are at the door, and shall carry thee out.

was a great affront Ananias put on the Holy Ghost, as if He could be imposed on: and it had a direct tendency to invalidate the apostles' testimony; for if they could not by the Spirit discover this fraud, how could they by the Spirit discover the deep things of God, which they were to reveal to the children of men? It was therefore necessary, that the credit of the apostles' gifts and powers be supported, though at this expense. (2.) It was designed to deter others from the like presumptions, now at the beginning of this dispensation. Simon Magus afterward was not thus punished, nor Elymas; but Ananias was made an example now at first, that with the sensible proofs given what a comfortable thing it is to receive the Spirit, there might be also sensible proofs given what a dangerous thing it is to resist the Spirit, and do despite to Him. How severely was the worshipping of the golden calf punished, and the gathering of the sticks on the sabbath-day, when the laws of the second and fourth commandment were now newly given! So was the offering of strange fire by Nadab and Abihu, and the mutiny of Korah and his company, when the fire from heaven was now newly given, and the authority of Moses and Aaron now newly established.

2. He was buried immediately, for that was the manner of the Jews, v. 6. The young men, who, it is probable, were appointed to the office of burying the dead, as among the Romans the libitinarii and pollinctores; or the young men that attended the apostles, they wound up the dead body in grave-clothes, (John 11: 44. note,) carried it out of the city, and buried it decently, though he died in sin, and by an immediate stroke of divine vengeance.

IV. The reckoning with Sapphira, found guilty of sharing with her husband in his sin, by a question that Peter asked her, v. 8. Ananias and his wife agreed to tell the same story, and, the bargain being private, and by consent kept to themselves, nobody could disprove them; therefore, they thought they might safely stand in the lie, and should gain credit to it. How sad, to see those relations who should quicken one another to that which is good, harden one another in that which is evil.

Before he passes sentence, he shows her the evil of her sin. They both tempted the Spirit of the Lord; as Israel tempted God in the desert, when they said, Is the Lord among us? Or is He not? 'Can the Spirit in the apostles discover this fraud? Can they discern that this is but a part of the price, when we tell them it is the whole?' They saw they had the gift of tongues; but had they the gift of discerning spirits? Those that presume on security and impunity in sin, tempt the Spirit of God; they tempt God, as if He were altogether such an one as themselves. Then fell she down straightway! With some sinners God makes quick work, while with others He bears long; for which difference, doubtless, there are good reasons; but He is not accountable to us for them. Many sudden deaths there are, which are not to be looked upon as the punishment of some gross sin, like this; but here it is plainly in judgment. Some put the question concerning the eternal state of Ananias and Sapphira; but secret things belong not to us. Some ask, whether the apostles kept this money? I think they did; they had not the superstition of those who said, It is not lawful for us to put it into the treasury: for unto the pure all things are pure. What they brought, was not polluted to them they brought it to; but what they kept back, was to them that kept it back. Use was made of the censurers of Korah's mutineers.

V. The impression this made on the people; notice is taken of this in the midst of the story, v. 5. for, no doubt, it was all the talk of the city. And again, v. 11. 1. They that had joined themselves to the church, were hereby struck with an awe of God, and of his judgments, and with a greater veneration of this dispensation of the Spirit which they were now under. It was not a damp or check to their holy joy, but it taught them to be serious in it, and to rejoice with trembling. All that laid their money at the apostles' feet after this, were afraid of keeping back any part of the price. 2. All that heard it, were put into a consternation by it, and were ready to say, Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God, and his Spirit in the apostles? As 1 Sam. 6: 20.

V. 12—16. Here is an account of the progress of the Gospel.

1. Of the miracles the apostles wrought, v. 12. many miracles of mercy for one of judgment. The miracles they wrought proved their divine mission; they were not a few, but many, of divers kinds and often repeated; they were signs and wonders, such wonders as were confessedly signs of a divine presence and power; they were not done in a corner, but among the people, who were at liberty to inquire into them, and, if there had been fraud or collusion, would have discovered it.

II. The effects of these miracles. 1. The church was hereby kept together, and confirmed in its adherence both to the apostles, and to one another; They of the church were all with one accord in Solomon's porch. It was strange the rulers of the temple suffered them to keep their meeting there. But God inclined their hearts to tolerate them there a while, for the more convenient spreading of the Gospel; and thus early was the institution of public-worship observed in the church, which must by no means be forsaken, for in that a profession of religion is kept up. Their being united, shows also that there was no discontent or murmuring at them about the death of Ananias and Sapphira, as there was against Moses and Aaron, about the death of Korah and his company, Num. 16: 41. The separation of hypocrites, by distinguishing judgments, should make the sincere cleave so much the closer to each other, and to the gospel-ministry.

2. It gained the apostles very great respect. (1.) The other ministers kept their distance; Of the rest of their company, though endued with the Holy Ghost, durst no man join himself to them, as their equal or associate; for none of them at this time did such signs and wonders as the apostles did: and therefore they acknowledged their superiority, and in every thing yielded to them. (2.) All the people magnified them, and had them in great veneration; spake of them with respect, and represented them as the favorites of Heaven, and unspeakable blessings to this earth. Observe, The apostles were far from magnifying themselves, they transmitted the glory of all they did, very carefully and faithfully, to Christ, and yet the people magnified them; for they that humble themselves shall be exalted, and those honored, that honor God only.

3. The church increased in number, v. 14. So far from being deterred by the example made of Ananias and Sapphira, they were rather invited by it into a society that kept such a strict discipline. Notice is taken of the conversion of women as well as men, more notice than generally was in the Jewish church; as among those that followed Christ while He was on earth, so among those that believed on Him after He went to heaven, great notice was taken of the good women.

4. The apostles had abundance of patients,

Had the rich or the lazy attempted thus to live on the common fund contributed by others' labor, it would have been the inevitable ruin of the church, from the first, &c. See Wetstein, in Bloomf. Ed.

Such unbelievers as were displeased with the apostles, and hated the cause, would have been glad to put any trick on them, that they might thereby lessen their esteem among the people, yet durst not: seeing it might prove no less than fatal for any to go about to deceive them.'—As Peter was the readiest speaker, and stood foremost in every transaction, and as he was one of the first who experienced persecution; it seems he was more noticed by the people, than any of the other apostles, in these miracles. 17 ¶ Then the high priest rose up, and all they that were with him, (which is the sect of the 'Sadducees,) and were filled with indignation, 18 And laid their hands on the apostles, and put them in the common prison.

19 But the angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors, and brought them forth, and said, 20 Go, stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life.

21 And when they heard that, they entered into the temple early in the morning, and taught. But the high priest came, and they that were with him, and called the council together, and all the senate of the children of Israel, and sent to the prison to have them brought.

22 But when the officers came, and found them not in the prison, they returned, and told,

23 Saying, The prison truly found we shut with all safety, and the keepers standing without before the doors: but when we had opened, we found no man within.

24 Now when the high priest and the captain of the temple and the chief priests heard these things, they doubted of them whereunto this would grow.

and gained abundance of reputation both to them and their doctrine, by the cure of them all, v. 15, 16. It should seem, even the shadow of Peter had the desired effect, as the woman's touch of the hem of Christ's garment had; and in this, among other things, that word of Christ was fulfilled, Greater works than these shall ye do. And if such miracles were wrought by Peter's shadow, we have reason to think they were so by the other apostles, as by the handkerchiefs from Paul's body, ch. 19:12. no doubt, both being with an actual intention in the minds of the apostles thus to heal; so that it is absurd hence to infer a healing virtue in the relics of saints that are dead and gone; we read not of any cured by the relics of Christ Himself, after He was gone, as certainly we should, if there had been any such thing.

V. 17-25. In these vs. we have the malice of hell and the grace of heaven struggling about the apostles; the one to drive them off from their good work, the other to animate them in it.

I. Their enemies were, the high priest, as ringleader, Annas or Caiaphas, who saw their wealth and dignity, their power and tyranny, their all inevitably lost, if the spiritual and heavenly doctrine of Christ prevailed; and the sect of the Sadducees, who had a particular enmity to the Gospel of Christ, because it confirmed and established the doctrine of the invisible world, the resurrection of the dead, and the future state, which they denied. These were exasperated to the last degree, when they heard and saw what flocking there was to the apostles, and how considerable they were become, they rose up in a passion, as men that could no longer bear it, being filled with indignation at the apostles, for preaching the doctrine of Christ, and curing the sick; at the people for hearing them, and bringing the sick to them to be cured; and at themselves and their own party, for suffering this matter to go so far, and not knocking it on the head at first. Thus are the enemies of Christ and his Gospel a torment to themselves.

They laid their hands on them, perhaps their own hands, (so low did their malice make them stoop,) or, rather, the hands of their officers, and put them in the common prison, among the worst of malefactors; hereby designing to restrain, terrify, and to disgrace them. They could lay nothing criminal to their charge, yet, while they had them in prison, they kept them from going on in their work. Satan has carried on his design against the Gospel, very much, by making the preachers and professors of it despicable.

II. God sent his angel to release them, and to renew their commission to preach the Gospel; for the Lord will never desert his witnesses, his advocates! This deliverance is not so particularly related as that of Peter, ch. 12:7, &c. but the miracle here was the very same. When miraculously set at liberty, they must not think it was, that they might save their lives by making their escape from their enemies. No; it was, that they might go on with their work with so much the more boldness. Recoveries from sickness, releases out of trouble, are granted us, not that we may enjoy the comforts of our life, but that God may be honored with the services of our life. Let my soul live, and it shall praise Thee, Ps. 119:175. Bring my soul out of prison, as the apostles here, that I may praise thy name, Ps. 142:7. See Is. 38:22.

Now in the charge given them, observe, 1. They must preach in the temple. One would think it had been prudent in a more private place; but, no; 'Speak in the temple, for that is the place of concourse, that is your Father's house.' It is not for the preachers of Christ's Gospel to retire into corners, as long as they can have any opportunity of preaching in the great congregation. 2. They must preach to the people; not to the princes and rulers, for they will not hearken; but to the people, who are willing and desirous to be taught, and whose souls are as precious to Christ, as the souls of the greatest. 3. How; Go, stand, and speak: which intimates, not only that they must speak publicly, but boldly, resolutely, i. e. 'Speak it as persons resolved to stand to it, to live and die by it.' 4. What; all the words of this life. This life which you have been speaking of among yourselves. Or, 'of this life which the Sadducees deny.' Or, 'of this life emphatically; this heavenly, divine life, in comparison with which the present earthly life does not deserve the name.' Or, 'these words of life, the very same you have preached, these words which the Holy Ghost puts into your mouth.' The words of the Gospel are the words of life; quickening words; they are spirit, and they are life; words whereby we may be saved; that is the same with this here, ch. 11:14.

III. They went on with their work, v. 21. when they heard that it was the will of God, v. 12. Perhaps, they began to question whether they should preach as publicly in the temple as they had done, because they had been bid, when persecuted in one city, to flee to another. But now that the angel ordered them to go preach in the temple, their way was plain, and they ventured without any difficulty, and feared not the face of man, but set themselves immediately to their duty. They entered into the temple early in the morning, as soon as the people began to come together there, and taught them the Gospel of the kingdom. The case, here, was extraordinary; [the command express on this particular point;] the whole treasure of the Gospel is lodged in their hands; if they be silent now, the whole work falls to the ground; which is not the case of ordinary ministers, who, therefore, are not, by this example, bound to throw themselves into the mouth of danger; and yet, when God gives opportunity of doing good, though we be under the restraint and terror of human powers, we should venture far, rather than let go such an opportunity.

IV. The high priest and his party went on with their prosecution, v. 21. They called the council together, a great and extraordinary council, all the senate of the children of Israel.

Before, they had convened only a committee of the kindred of the high priest, who were obliged to act cautiously; but now they call together all the eldership, i. e. says Lightfoot, all the three courts or benches of judges, not only the Sanhedrim, consisting of 70 elders, but the other two judicatories, erected, one in the outer court-gate of the temple, the other in the inner or beautiful gate, consisting of 23 judges each. So that, if there were a full appearance, here were 116 judges. Thus God ordered it, that the confusion of the enemies might be more public, and the apostles' testimony against them; and that those might hear the Gospel, who would not hear it otherwise than from the bar. Howbeit, the high priest meant not so, but it was in his heart to cut the apostles all off at once.

We may suppose the high priest makes a solemn speech to them, setting forth the occasion of their coming together; that a very dangerous faction was now lately raised, by the preaching of the doctrine of Jesus, which it was needful, for the preservation of their church, speedily and effectually to suppress; that it was now in their power to do it, for he had the ringleaders of the faction now in prison, to be proceeded against, if they would but agree to it, with the utmost severity. An officer is despatched immediately to fetch the prisoners to the bar. But see how they are baffled, disappointed, and shamed.

1. The report the officers make, is, 'The prison-doors truly found we shut with all safety;' nothing had been done to weaken them; 'the keepers had not been wanting to their duty; we found them standing without before the doors, and knowing nothing to the contrary, but that the prisoners were all safe; but when we went in, we found no man therein, none of the men we were sent to fetch.' Probably they found the common prisoners there. Which way the angel fetched them, whether by some back way, or opening the door, and fastening it close again, (the keepers all the while asleep,) we are not told; however it was, they were gone.

Now think how blank the court looked, v. 24. They were extremely perplexed, were at their wits'-end, having never been so disappointed of a thing they were so sure of. It occasioned various speculations; some suggesting, that they were conjured out of the prison; others, that the keepers had played tricks with them, not knowing how many friends these prisoners had, that were so much the darlings of the people. Some feared that, having made such a wonderful escape, they would be the more followed; others, that though perhaps they had frightened them from Jerusalem, they should hear 25 Then came one and told them, saying, Behold, the men whom ye put in prison are standing in the temple, and teaching the people.

27 And when they had brought them, they set them before the council: and the high priest asked them, of them again in some part or other of the country, where they would do yet more mischief, and it would be yet more out of their power to stop the spreading of the infection; and now they began to fear, that instead of curing the ill, they have made it worse. Those distress and embarrass themselves, that think to distress and embarrass the cause of Christ.

28 Saying, Did not we <sup>b</sup> straitly command you that ye should not teach in this name? and, behold, ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, and intend to bring this man's blood <sup>c</sup> upon us.

2. Their doubt is, in part, determined; and yet their vexation is increased by another messenger, who brings them word that their prisoners are preaching in the temple, v. 25. Prisoners, that have broken prison, abscond, for fear of being retaken: but these prisoners, that here made their escape, dare to show their faces even there where their persecutors have the greatest influence. Now this confounded them more than anything.

V. 26—42. I. The seizing of the apostles

V. 26. 'Tyrants, not fearing God, are constrained to fear their own subjects.' Beza. Perhaps the expectation of a temporal kingdom was revived by the miracles of the apostles, among the bulk of the common people: so that, while they neither understood nor embraced the Gospel, they favored the cause, and excited the fears of their persecuting rulers.

V. 29. Name.] 'I. e., person; so Pearce, Ros., Kuin., "respecting this person." This.] The Gr. phraseology, here, denotes contempt, so Pricæus; and see Schoettgen.

V. 30. Tree.] Xulon: timber, and "tree," once meant the same. Id.

V. 31. It is the evident doctrine of Scripture, that true repentance is 'the gift of God;' and to exclude this most obvious meaning of the words, as many expositors do, is, in fact, an attempt to improve the language of Scripture, and to obscure one evidence of our Savior's Deity, and of all salvation coming wholly from his fulness of grace. 'Repentance was not indeed actually wrought in Israel, by his efficacious grace;' I. e., not in all Israel; for it certainly was in great numbers: but if any who heard the apostles were convinced that they must repent or perish, yet found their hearts still hard and their wills rebellious; was it not a most important and seasonable instruction, to be assured, that Jesus was exalted 'to give repentance,' as well as pardon to the penitent? that, as one with tears cried to Him, 'Help my unbelief; they might cry to Him, 'Turn Thou me, that I may be turned: 'Pour on me the Spirit of grace and supplications, that I may look unto Thee, a second time. We may think, if God designed this, 'Why were they rescued from their first imprisonment?' But that was designed to humble the pride, and check the fury, of their persecutors; and now God would show that they were discharged; not because they feared a trial, for they were ready to surrender themselves, and appear before the greatest of their enemies. They brought them with all respect. One would think they had reason to do so, in reverence to the temple, that holy place, and for fear of the apostles, lest they should strike them, as they did Ananias, or call for fire from heaven on them, as Elias did; but all that restrained their violence, was, their fear of the people, who had such a veneration for the apostles, that they would stone them if they offered [such good men] any abuse.

II. Their examination; being brought before this august assembly, the high priest, as the mouth of the court, told them what it was they had to lay to their charge, v. 23.

1. They who make void the commandments of God, are commonly very strict in binding on their own commandments. 2. Besides this disobedience, they spread false doctrine among the people, or at least a singular doctrine, which was not allowed by the Jewish church, nor agreed with what was delivered from Moses' chair; Ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine. Some take this for a haughty, scornful word; despising their doctrine as silly, they are angry that men, whom they looked upon as despicable, should make themselves thus considerable. The third charge is, they had a malicious design against the government, and aimed to stir up the people against it, by representing it as wicked and tyrannical, and that had made itself justly odious both to God and man; 'Ye intend to bring this man's blood, the guilt of it before God, the shame of it before men, upon us.' See here how those that with a great deal of presumption will do an evil thing, yet cannot bear to hear of it afterward, or to have it charged on them. When they were in the heat of the persecution, they could cry, daringly enough, 'His blood be on us, and on our children; let us bear the blame for ever.' But now that they have time for a cooler thought, they take it as a heinous affront to have his blood laid at their door.

III. Their answer; Peter and the other apostles all spake to the same purport, (whether severally examined, or answering jointly,) depending on the promise, that, when brought before councils, it should be given them in that same hour what they should speak, and courage to speak it.

1. They justified themselves in their disobedience to the commands of the Sanhedrim, v. 29. They do not plead the power they had to work miracles, but simply appeal to a maxim universally owned, which even natural conscience subscribes to, and which comes home to their ease.

2. They justify themselves in doing what they could to fill Jerusalem with the doctrine of Christ; 'Now,' say they, 'we will tell you who this Christ is, and what his Gospel is, and then do you judge whether we ought not to preach it; nay, and we shall take this opportunity to preach it to you, whether you will hear, or whether you will forbear.' People's being unwilling to hear of their faults, is no good reason why they should not be faithfully told of them. It is a common excuse made for not reproving sin, that the times will not bear it. But they whose office it is to reprove, must not be awed by that; the times must bear it, and shall bear it; Cry aloud, and spare not; cry aloud and fear not.

They are told also what honors God put upon this Jesus, and then let them judge who was in the right, the persecutors of his doctrine, or the preachers of it. He calls God the God of our fathers, not only ours, but yours, to show that, in preaching Christ, they did not preach a new god, nor entice people to come and worship other gods, nor set up an institution contrary to that of Moses and the prophets, but adhered to the God of the Jewish fathers, and that that name of Christ which they preached, answered the promises made to the fathers, and the covenant God entered into with them, and the types and figures of the law He gave them. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; see what honor He did Him. (1.) He raised Him up; i. e. qualified Him for, and called Him to, his great undertaking. It seems to refer to the promise God made by Moses, A Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you. Or, it may be meant of his raising Him up from the grave. (2.) He exalted Him with his right hand; hath lifted Him up. 'You loaded Him with disgrace, but God has crowned Him with honor; and ought we not to honor Him whom God honors?' God has exalted Him,—with his right hand, i. e. by his power put forth; Christ is said to live by the power of God. Or, to his right hand, to sit there, to rest there, to rule there. (3.) 'He has appointed Him to be a Prince and a Savior, therefore we ought to preach in his name, and to publish the laws of his government, as He is a Prince; and the offers of his grace, as He is a Savior.' Observe there is no having Christ to be our Savior, unless we be willing to take Him for our Prince. (4.) He is appointed, as a Prince and a Savior, to give repentance to Israel and remission of sins. Therefore they must preach in his name to the people of Israel, for his favors were designed, primarily and principally, for them; and none that truly loved their country, could be against that. Had He been exalted to give deliverance to Israel from the Roman yoke, and dominion over the neighboring nations, the chief priests would have welcomed Him with all their hearts. But repentance and remission of whom I have pierced, and mourn' with 'that godly sorrow, which worketh repentance unto salvation.' Repentance.] 'Metanoia: when it signifies the awakening and change of the mind for the better, is the gift of God, of his mere grace.' Beza. Scott.

V. 32. 'The testimony, arising from this miraculous communication of the Spirit to Christians, at that time, entirely removes the objection from Christ's not appearing in public, after his resurrection. For had there been any imposture, it had been easier, of the two, to have persuaded the people at a distance, that He had so appeared to the Jewish rulers, or even to the multitude, and yet had been rejected; than that He had given his servants such extraordinary powers. Since, had this assertion been false, every one might have been a witness to the falsehood of such a pretence, without the trouble and expense of a journey to Jerusalem, or any other distant place.' Doddr. Obey.] See on 29. 'There is no true obedience, without faith, or true faith without obedience.' Beza. Scott. If man could and would obey every law of the mixed constitution God has given him, how much more accessible to spiritual influences might he become! What now unknown developments of his higher nature might he not expect! Ep.

V. 33—39. 'Origen, who had read Jos., and declares that he examined things relating to the Scripture, . . . out of a love to truth, speaks thus: "We say there was one Theudas before the birth of Christ, who among the Jews declared himself to be somebody." And again, "that Judas Galileus, and Theudas who was before him, being not of God, perished." And a third time, "Because they gathered from the scriptures, that the 34 Then stood there up one in the council, a Pharisee, named Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, had in reputation among all the people, and commanded to put the apostles forth a little space ;

35 And said unto them, Ye men of Israel, take heed to yourselves what ye intend to do as touching these men.

36 For before these days <sup>m</sup> rose up Theudas, boasting himself to be somebody ; to whom a number of men, about four hundred, joined themselves : who was slain ; and all, as many as <sup>n</sup> obeyed him, were scattered, and brought to nought.

37 After this man rose up Judas of Galilee in the days of the taxing, and drew away much people after him : he <sup>o</sup> also perished ; and all, even as many as obeyed him, were dispersed.

38 And now I say unto you, Refrain from these men, and let them alone : <sup>p</sup> for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought :

39 But if <sup>q</sup> it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it ; lest haply ye be found even to fight <sup>r</sup> against God.

sins are blessings they neither value, nor see their need of, therefore, they can by no means admit his doctrine. Observe, wherever repentance is wrought, remission is without fail granted, and on the other hand, there is no remission without repentance. It is also Jesus Christ that gives, and is authorized to give both. (5.) All this is well attested; the apostles themselves are ready to testify on oath, if required, that they saw Him alive after his resurrection, and saw Him ascend into heaven; and, also, that they experienced the power of his grace on their hearts, raising them up to that which was far above their natural capacities. But that is not all, the Holy Ghost is witness, a witness from heaven; for God hath given his gifts and graces to them that obey Christ. Therefore we must preach in his name, because for this end the Holy Ghost is given us, whose operations we cannot stifle.

Note, The giving of the Holy Ghost to obedient believers, not only to bring them to the obedience of faith, but to make them eminently useful therein, is a very strong proof of the truth of Christianity. God gave the Holy Ghost by his Son and in his name, John 14:26. and in answer to his prayer, John 14:16. nay, Christ sent Him from the Father, John 15:26. 16:17. and this proves the glory to which the Father has exalted Him. The great work of the Spirit being not only to justify Christ, 1 Tim. 3:16. but to glorify Him, and all his gifts having a direct tendency to exalt his name, proves that his doctrine is divine, else it would not be carried on thus by a divine power. And, lastly, the giving of the Holy Ghost to them that obey Christ, both for their assistance in their obedience, and as a present recompense for their obedience, is a plain evidence that it is the will of God that Christ should be obeyed; and then judge whether we ought to obey you in opposition to Him.

IV. The impression the apostles' defence of themselves made on the court; instead of yielding to it, they raged against it, and were filled,

1. With indignation; they were cut to the heart, not, as the people, in remorse and godly sorrow, ch. 2:37. but with rage and indignation. Thus the same Gospel is to some a savor of life unto life, to others of death unto death.

2. With malice; since they see they cannot stop their mouths any other way than by stopping their breath, they take counsel to slay them, hoping that so they should cause the work to cease. While the apostles went on in the service of Christ, with a holy security and serenity of mind, perfectly composed, and in a sweet enjoyment of themselves, their persecutors went on in their opposition to Christ, with a continual perplexity and perturbation of mind, and vexation to themselves.

V. The grave advice of Gamaliel, a leading man in the council, on this occasion, the scope of which was to moderate the fury of these bigots, and check the violence of the prosecution. Gamaliel is here said to be a Pharisee by profession and sect, by office a doctor of the law, one that studied the scriptures of the O. T., read lectures on the sared authors, and trained up pupils in the knowledge of them; Paul was brought up at his feet, ch. 22:3. and tradition says, Stephen and Barnabas. Some say he was the son of that Simeon that took Christ in his arms, when presented in the temple; and grandson of the famous Hillel. He is here said to be in reputation among all the people for his wisdom and conduct; it appearing by this passage that he was a moderate man, and not apt to go in with furious measures. Men of temper and charity are justly had in reputation, for checking the incendiaries that otherwise would set the earth on fire. Observe,

1. His necessary caution; putting the apostles forth a little while; he might speak the more freely, and be the more freely answered, and then he reminds the house of the importance of this matter, which in their heat they were not capable of considering as they ought, v. 35. 'You are men, that should be governed by reason; men of Israel, that should be governed by revelation. Have regard then to God and his Word. Take heed to yourselves, now you are angry, lest you meddle to your own hurt.' The persecutors of God's people had best look to themselves, lest they fall into the pit they dig. We have need to be cautious whom we trouble, lest we be found making the hearts of the righteous sad.

2. To pave the way to his opinion; he cites two instances of factious, seditious men, such as they would have the apostles thought, whose attempts came to nothing of themselves; whence he infers, that if these men were indeed such as they represented them, their cause would sink with its own weight, and Providence would infatuate and defeat them, and then they needed not persecute them.

3. His opinion, (1.) That they should not persecute the apostles, v. 38. As the matter now stands, my advice is, 'Refrain from these men; neither punish them for what they have done, nor restrain them for the future. Connive at them.' It is uncertain whether he spake this out of policy, for fear of offending either the people or the Romans, and making further mischief; or, whether he was under some present convictions, at least of the probability of the truth of the Christian doctrine, and thought it deserved better treatment, at least a fair trial; or, whether it was only the language of a mild, quiet spirit, that was against persecution for conscience-sake; or, whether God put this word into his mouth beyond his own intention, for the deliverance of the apostles at this time; we are sure there was an overruling Providence in it, that the servants of Christ might not only come off, but honorably. (2.) That they should refer this matter to Providence. That which is apparently wicked and immoral, must be suppressed, else the magistrate bears the sword in vain; but that which has a show of good, and it is doubtful whether it be of God or men, it is best not to use any external force to suppress. Christ rules by the power of truth, not of the sword. But, 'If this counsel, this work, this forming of a society, and incorporating it in the name of Jesus, be of men, it will come to nothing.' If it be the time of the Messiah was come; first Theudas, and after him Judas, tumultuated, in the time of the taxing." Hence do the fathers unanimously say, that those words of Christ, "All that came before Me were thieves and robbers," relate to these two, Theudas, and Judas of Galilee; which shows their belief, that both of them were before the time of Christ's preaching. So that it is extremely evident, that the ancient fathers agreed in this, that there was a Theudas pretending to great things, even before the coming of our Lord; though Jos. has taken no notice of him. Whitby, in Scott. Lightfoot supposes, that the Theudas, mentioned by Josephus, was the son of this Theudas; and that he took his name, as engaging in the same enthusiastic attempts. Luke 2:2. Luke merely records Gamaliel's speech; and it indisputable, that he spake of facts well known to his hearers. As to Josephus, his mistakes and omissions are so numerous and palpable, that his authority ought not to be opposed to other authentic histories; or to facts, which, at the time, were known and allowed to have occurred. According to this opinion, [Gamaliel's,] which was the verdict of common sense, and supported by the most conclusive arguments, the continuance of Christianity to this day, a religion, neither supported by human authority, nor paying court to any man's corrupt passions; nay, opposed by all the power, wealth, philosophy, learning, superstition, idolatry, open profaneness, false religion, vices, and popular prejudices, of the whole world; and declaring exterminating war against all the corrupt propensities of the human heart, without favoring one more than another; and also the ruin of the Jewish church and nation, and other persecuting powers, are irrefragable demonstrations, that it 'was no work or counsel of men,' but indeed a revelation from God; and, that those who opposed it actually fought against Him, and incurred his righteous displeasure for so doing.—How different the introduction of Christianity in the world, and its preservation and continuance to this day, from those of Paganism and Mohammedism!

Scott.

(36, 37.) Theudas. A common name. It seems most probable (and so Origen, Seal., Beza., Can., Lightf., Dru., Cnsaubon, Grot., Ham., Basnage, Heum., Krebs, Limborch, Whitby, Doddr., Lardner, Morus, Ros., and Kuin.) there were two: Jos. mentions one more recent, Gamaliel another, who (so Casaubon and Krebs) lived about the time of Christ's birth. Beza and Kuin., however, think in the time when (as Jos., Ant. 17, 24.) innumerable seditions, which Varus could hardly suppress, reigned in Judea. For those events (as they observe) which happened at the time in which, after the death of Herod the Great, there was an interregnum in Judea, while Archelaus had gone to Rome, to obtain the confirmation of his father's will, and when Jesus was yet in Egypt, Jos. has passed over in silence, as he has done this insurrection of Theudas, which probably occurred at that time; not to mention many other events, of which, nevertheless, the truth is unquestionable. The second Theudas they suppose to have been a son or grandson of the first, and who again brought together his scattered followers; similar instances of which may be remarked in long-buried and almost forgotten sects, which sometimes revive. But this second may have simply adopted a name already popular. Bloomf. Judas of Galilee. Schoettgen, from the Rabbins, finds that this Judas "began a third sect, besides the Pharisees and Sadducees, the Essenes. Judas Galileus was the founder of the Nasireans, called also, Essenes. They stirred rebellion against the Romans, holding that no man ought to command other men, nor be called Lord, save God only." Juchasin. Taxing. Apographē: a census, of property as well as persons, Luke 2:1. This census was not that of Herod's reign, by Augustus' order, but that by Quirinus, after Archelaus, the son of Herod, had been exiled by Augustus to Vienna, and his kingdom reduced to the form of a Roman province. counsel and work of foolish men, that know not what they do, they will run themselves out, and they will make themselves ridiculous. If it be the counsel and work of politic and designing men, who, under color of religion, are setting up a secular interest, let them alone a while, and they will throw off the mask, and make themselves odious; Providence will never countenance it, and your persecuting and opposing it is very needless; there is no occasion for giving yourselves so much trouble, and bringing such an odium on yourselves, to kill that, which, if you give it a little time, will die of itself. The unnecessary use of power is an abuse of it. On the other hand, 'If it should prove, that these preachers have their commissions and instructions from God, that they are as truly his messengers to the world as the O. T. prophets were; then what do you think of persecuting them, of this attempt of your's, v. 33. to slay them? It must be fruitless; if it be of God, you cannot overthrow it; and it may be dangerous. Pray let it alone, lest haply ye be found even to fight against God; I need not tell you who will come off by the worst in that contest.'

Such was the advice of Gamaliel; we wish it were duly considered by those that persecute for conscience-sake, for it was a good thought, and natural enough, though we are uncertain what he was. The tradition of the Jewish writers is, that, for all this, he lived and died an inveterate enemy to Christ and his Gospel; and though now he was not for persecuting the followers of Christ, yet he was the man who composed that prayer which the Jews use to this day, for the extirpating of Christians and Christianity. On the contrary, the traditions of the Papists is, that he turned Christian, and became an eminent patron of Christianity, and a follower of Paul, who had sat at his feet. If that had been so, it is very probable we should have heard of him somewhere in the Acts or Epistles.

VI. The determination of the council, v. 40.

1. Thus far they agreed with Gamaliel, that they let fall the design of putting the apostles to death

2. Yet they could not forbear giving some vent to their rage. Therefore they beat them, scourged them as malefactors, stripped them, and whipped them, as they used to do in the synagogues, notice of the ignominy of which is taken, v. 41. Thus they thought to make them ashamed of preaching, and the people ashamed of hearing them.

VII. The wonderful courage and constancy of the apostles, in the midst of all these injuries and indignities; when dismissed, they departed from the council, and we do not find one word they said by way of reflection on the court, and their unjust treatment; all their business was, to preserve the possession of their own souls, and to make full proof of their ministry, notwithstanding the opposition; and both these they did to admiration.

1. They bore their sufferings with an invincible cheerfulness, v. 41. When they went out, perhaps, with the marks of the lashes appearing, hissed at by the servants and rabble, it may be, or public notice given of the infamous punishment they had undergone, instead of being ashamed of Christ, and their relation to Him, they rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name. [They had not been hardened by sin, but were of delicate sensibility,] yet they reckoned it an honor, to suffer this shame,—were honored, to be dishonored for Christ. They rejoiced, not only though they suffered shame, but that they suffered shame; their troubles increased their joy.

2. They went on in their work with indefatigable diligence, v. 42. They were punished for preaching, and commanded not to preach, and yet they ceased not to teach and preach; they omitted no opportunity, nor abated anything of their zeal or forwardness. They preached daily; not only on sabbath-days, or on Lord's days, but every day, not fearing they should either kill themselves, or cloy their hearers. They preached both publicly in the temple, and privately in every house; in promiscuous assemblies, to which all resorted; and in the select assemblies of Christians for special ordinances. They visited the families, and gave particular instructions to them, according as their case required; even to the children and servants. And the subject matter of their preaching was Jesus Christ; not themselves, but Christ, making it their business to advance his interest. This was the preaching that gave most offence to the priests; who were willing they should preach anything but Christ; but they would not alter their subject to please them. It ought to be the constant business of gospel-ministers to preach Christ; Christ, and Him crucified; Christ, and Him glorified; nothing beside this, but what is reducible to it.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—7. Hitherto the disciples, (for so Christians were at first called, learners of Christ,) were all with one accord; this had been often noticed to their honor; but now that they were multiplied, there arose [as is usual] a murmuring, not an open falling out, but a secret heart-burning.

1. The Grecians, or Hellenists, were Jews scattered in Greece, and other parts, who ordinarily spake Greek, and read the O. T. in the Greek version, and not the original Hebrew. The Hebrews were native Jews, that used the original Heb. of the O. T. It seems their joint embracing of the faith of Christ did not prevail, as it ought, to extinguish their little jealousies before conversion; not understanding, or not remembering, that in Christ there is neither Greek nor Jew, no distinction of Hebrew and Hellenist, but all are alike welcome to Christ, and should be, for his sake, dear to one another.

2. The complaint was, that their widows were neglected in the daily administration, i. e. in the distribution of the public charity, and the Hebrew widows had more care. Observe, the first contention in the Christian church was about a money-matter; pity the little things of this world should be make-baits among those that profess to be taken up with the great things of another world. A great deal of money was gathered for the relief of the poor, but, as often happens in such cases, it was impossible to please every body in the laying of it out. The apostles, at whose feet it was laid, did their best to dispose of it, so as to answer the intentions of the donors, and, no doubt, were far from respecting the Hebrews more than the Grecians; yet here they are complained to, and implicitly complained of. Perhaps this complaint was groundless and unjust; those who, on any account, lie under disadvantages, (as the Grecian Jews did, in comparison with them that were Hebrews of the Hebrews,) are apt to be jealous that they are slighted, when really they are not so; envy and covetousness are to be found among the poor as well as among the rich, notwithstanding the humbling providences they are under, and should accommodate themselves to. Some suggest, that though their other poor were well provided for, yet their widows were neglected, because the managers governed themselves by an ancient rule which the Hebrews observed, that a widow was to be maintained by her husband's children. See 1 Tim. 5:4. But, I take it, the widows are here put for all the poor.

PRACT. OBS. No state of the church has yet occurred entirely free from hypocrites, and other evils resulting from human depravity and the subtlety of Satan: nor is there anything so excellent, which artful men will not counterfeit, to gratify their avarice, or their love of applause and honor from men.—And does not the narrative, with which this ch. opens, most solemnly warn us, to watch against, and subjugate all our passions, not only the violent and disgraceful, but the plausible likewise, the love of money and of reputation, the ambition, not only of honor from worldly men, but also of consequence in the church?—Deceit and lies are, in all things, hateful to the God of truth; but most of all, when introduced into the immediate concerns of religion. If any of us are conscious of having committed so enormous a crime, let us be thankful, that the doom of Ananias has not been ours; and let us show our deep repentance, by keeping at the utmost distance from a repetition of the atrocious provocation.—On special occasions, the Lord interposes, in an extraordinary manner, to detect such offenders, as are about to become a snare to some, and a scandal to others.—Whatever conduces to the purity and reputation of the church, eventually promotes its enlargement. When unsound professors of the Gospel are excluded or detected, the surest method is taken to bring in an increase of true believers; and, if the apparent severity of reproof or censure, which ministers must at some times necessarily exercise, be connected with manifest and enlarged benevolence, that unfavorable impression, which might otherwise be made on the minds of men, will be prevented; and they will notwithstanding possess confidence and affection. But how wretched must they be, whose vexation is increased by the success of the Gospel! For God will surely destroy all those, who 'will not have Him to reign over them:' this every man will perceive, in proportion as he regards the testimony of his apostles; and of the Holy Spirit, whom God has always given as the Teacher, Sanctifier, and Comforter of those who obey his beloved Son.

V. 41, 42. The apostles went away rejoicing; 'rightly judging, that a punishment of this kind, though generally shameful, became a glory to them, when borne in so excellent a cause, and for the sake of Him, who... had submitted not only to stripes, but to death, for them.' [Alas! how seldom is true glory associated with the huzzas of men; yea, though the happiness of the race so much depends on the exertions of kindred spirits with the apostles, and its misery has been so much increased by the glorified ones of the earth!] Doddr.

2 Then the twelve called the multitude of the disciples unto them, and said, It is not reason that we should leave the word of God, and serve tables.

3 Wherefore, brethren, look ye out among you seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, whom we may appoint over this business.

4 But we will give ourselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word.

d De. 1:13. 7,8,10.

Those that administer public justice or charity, ought in a particular manner to protect widows, Is. 1:17. Luke 18:3. See 1 Tim. 5:3. And, observe, the widows here, and the other poor, had a daily ministrations; they lived from hand to mouth. Perhaps those that disposed of the money, considered there was more brought into the fund by the rich Hebrews, than by the rich Grecians, who had not estates to sell, as the Hebrews had, and therefore the poor Grecians should have less out of the fund; this, though there was some tolerable reason for it, they thought hard and unfair. Note, In the best ordered church in the world, there will be something amiss, some mal-administration or other, some grievances, or, at least, some complaints; they are the best, that have the least and fewest.

3. The apostles had hitherto the directing of the matter; applications were made to them, and appeals, in case of grievances; they were obliged to employ persons under them, who did not take all the care they might, nor were so well fortified against temptations to partiality; therefore some persons must be chosen to manage this matter, who have more leisure than the apostles had, and were better qualified for the trust than those they employed. But the apostles themselves would not determine anything without the multitude of the disciples, the heads of the congregations of Christians in Jerusalem; in a concern of this nature they might be best able to advise, who were more conversant in affairs than the apostles. Receiving and paying money was serving tables, too like the tables of the money-changers in the temple; it was foreign to the business they were called to; they were to preach the Word of God; and, though they had not such occasion to study for what they preached, as we have, it being given in that same hour what they should speak, yet they thought that was work enough for a whole man, and to employ all their thoughts, cares, and time, though one of them was more than ten of us, than ten thousand. If they served tables, they could not attend their preaching work so closely as they ought. These minds of ours admit not of two distinct, anxious employments. It is not reason, it is not fit or commendable, that we should neglect the business of feeding souls with the bread of life, to attend the business of relieving the bodies of the poor. Note, preaching the Gospel is the best, the most proper and needful work a minister can be employed in, and that which he must give himself wholly to, 1 Tim. 4:15. which, that he may do, he must not entangle himself in the affairs of this life, 2 Tim. 2:4. no, not in the outward business of the house of God, Neh. 11:16. They therefore desire that 7 men might be chosen, well qualified for the purpose, whose business it should be to serve tables, to be deacons to the tables, v. 2. They might be occasionally employed in the Word, and prayer, but were not so entirely devoted to it as the apostles were; these must take care of the church's stock, must review, and pay, and keep accounts; must buy those things which they had need of against the feast,

John 13:29. and attend to all those things which are necessary, in order to spiritual exercises, that everything might be done decently and in order, and no person or thing neglected. The people are to choose, and the apostles to ordain; but the men must be fit for the office; Look out seven men: so many they thought sufficient for the present, more might be added afterward if there were occasion; these must be, 1st. Of honest report, free from scandal, men of integrity, and faithful, well attested, as men that might be trusted; not under a blemish for any vice, but, on the contrary, well spoken of for every thing that is virtuous and praiseworthy; men that can produce good testimonials concerning their conversation. Note, Those that are employed in any office in the church, ought to be men of a blameless, nay, of a beautiful character. 2dly. They must be full of the Holy Ghost, those gifts and graces of the Holy Ghost, necessary to the right management of this trust; not only be honest, but men of parts and of courage; such as were to be made judges in Israel, Ex. 18:21. able men, fearing God; men of truth, and hating covetousness; and hereby appearing to be full of the Holy Ghost. 3dly. They must be full of wisdom. It was not enough that they were honest, good men, but they must be discreet, judicious men, that could not be imposed on, and would order things for the best, and with consideration: full of the Holy Ghost, and wisdom, i. e. of the Holy Ghost as a Spirit of wisdom. 1 Cor. 12:8. In many editions of our English Bibles, there has been an error of the press here, for they have read it, whom ye may appoint; as if the power were in the people; whereas it was certainly in the apostles; whom we may appoint.

(4.) The apostles engage to addict themselves wholly to their work, as ministers, v. 4. The two great gospel-ordinances,—the Word, and prayer; by these two, communion between God and his people is kept up and

V. 2—6. We read nothing more concerning any of the seven, [the seven deacons.] except Stephen and Philip; unless Nicolas ('a proselyte,' as distinguished from those who were of Jewish extraction) were the founder of the heretical sect, called Nicolaitans, which is not at all probable. It is evident, that they were appointed to take care of the property of the church, and not to the pastoral office; and the argument hence deduced to prove that every congregation ought to choose its own spiritual pastors, or for popular elections of ministers in any way, proves nothing. Men are generally careful enough, to entrust their property in the hands of suitable persons; but their souls are seldom more in danger, than when they follow 'teachers after their own hearts.' Beza indeed seems to think, that if the apostles would not appoint deacons, except by the choice of the church, much less would they ordain ministers, or spiritual pastors: but this only proves, that scriptural ground for that plan which he zealously supported, was not easily found, and that arguments were scarce.—Whatever may be said about the expediency or in expediency of these arrangements; the divine authority of them should be considered as another question. It must, however, be allowed, that matters are far removed from what is reasonable, scriptural, or profitable, respecting the general management of these most important concerns, in almost every part of the visible church; and that pastors should not be forced on congregations, * against whom they can bring just and reasonable objections, whether in respect of doctrine or character.—It has been generally taken for granted, that these seven persons were ordained, or appointed, to the office of 'deacons;' yet they are not so called, either in this chapter, or elsewhere: and as the word rendered 'deacon' is often translated servant, or minister, and used concerning Christ himself, (Rom. 15:8. Gr.) some have questioned whether there were such a distinct order in the church, during the times of the apostles. Nothing, however, can be more evident, than that such an order existed, and was well known, when Paul wrote his epistle to the Philippians, and his first epistle to Timothy. Phil. 1:1. 1 Tim. 3:8—13. 'Now if they' (the deacons,) 'were not instituted here by the apostles, I desire to know when, where, and by whom, they were instituted, and what other record we have left us of such an institution of them.' Whitby. If, then, the office of deacons was instituted on this occasion; it seems undeniable, that they were appointed solely to take care of the temporal concerns of the church; and not, as deacons, to preach, or to administer sacred ordinances, except by assisting the elders, presbyters, or bishops, as some think they did, in distributing the bread and wine at the Lord's supper.—This is as true of the deacons, mentioned by Paul, 1 Tim. 3: : there is not a word said of their ministering at the altar.' Whitby. He might have added, 'or of their preaching.' Yet it is plain, that Stephen did preach, and that Philip both preached and baptized; and he is even called 'the evangelist.' (21: 8.) It therefore occurs to inquire, whether they were preachers of the Gospel, before their appointment as deacons, or became preachers afterwards. The following remarks are of some importance in this question. 'The choice was committed to them;' (the laity;) 'yet this was done, 1st. by the particular appointment of the apostles, for "the twelve called the multitude," and said unto them, "Look ye out seven men." 2dly. They specify the number, and the qualifications, of the persons to be chosen to this office. 3dly. They reserve to themselves the appointment of them to this work: saying, "Look ye out seven men, whom we may appoint over this business." And, lastly, "they only laid their hands on them." . . . It seems very unlikely, that the apostles would have made this one requisite of the persons to be chosen, that they should be "full of the" extraordinary gifts of the "Holy Ghost;" . . . if their office had confined them to the ministry of the widows at Jerusalem, [though to be strictly just and honest in money-matters needs more of grace than falls to the lot of more than a very few.] . . . Being "men full of the Holy Ghost;" and of that wisdom which enabled them to teach others; we cannot reasonably conceive, that they were disabled, by their ordination to this office, from doing that work for which they were fitted, and as it were appointed, by these gifts of the Spirit conferred on them. . . This distribution, therefore, must be made by them. . . Now surely, that work which the apostles personally performed for a season, must be consistent with their commission to "teach and baptize all nations." Whitby. This statement does not prove, what the learned author seems to have intended, that the deacons, as such, were appointed to preach and baptize: but, to me, at least, it renders it highly probable, that some of the seven were previously ministers, or evangelists; and that they spared time from the ministry of the Word, for this service, as the apostles had done before the appointment of these assistants. In the abundance of spiritual and miraculous gifts, communicated at this favored season, it is highly probable, that many were thus qualified for important services, who had not at present a call or opening to perform them. The apostles, in counselling the church, make no distinction between such as had been employed in the ministry, and others; and probably some of each were chosen. Stephen and Philip, we may suppose, were of the former, and when Stephen was martyred, and Philip fully engaged at a distance, others might be chosen as deacons. And it appears to me very likely, that, both at this and future periods, many, who were appointed deacons in the first instance, afterwards became evangelists or pastors; and when they were fully employed, other deacons were appointed. 1 Tim. 3:8—13. SCOTT.

(2.) To serve tables.] 'Diakonon trapezais: "attend, see to the providing for the tables of the poor." Doddr. Later commentators, "superintend the collection and distribution of the alms to be expended on the poor." See Krebs. Trapeza is sometimes a banquet in the N. T., as Luke 19:23. and since (as Krebs) diakonein is, in 2 Cor. 8:4, 19. to minister alms, and diakonia, the alms themselves, in Acts 11:29. it seems best from the context so to explain here. maintained; by these two the kingdom of Christ must be advanced, and additions made to it; by the Word and prayer other ordinances are sanctified to us, and sacraments have their efficacy. The great business of gospel-ministers is, to give themselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the Word; they must still be either fitting and furnishing themselves for those services, or employing themselves in them; either publicly or privately; in the stated times, or out of them.

5. How this proposal of the apostles was agreed to, and presently executed, by the disciples; it was not imposed on them by an absolute power, though they might have been bold in Christ to do that, Philem. 8. but proposed, as what was highly convenient, and then the saying pleased the whole multitude, v. 5. It pleased them to see the apostles so willing to discharge themselves from intermeddling in secular affairs, and so to transmit them to others; it pleased them to hear, that they would give themselves to the Word and prayer; therefore they neither disputed the matter, nor deferred the execution of it: the majority of votes fell on the persons here named; and the rest acquiesced, as the members of societies in such cases ought. We may conjecture, that they were such as had sold their estates, and brought the money into the common stock; and all of the Grecian or Hellenist Jews, for they have all Greek names, and this would be most likely to silence the murmurings of the Grecians. Nicolas, it is plain, was one of them, for he was a proselyte of Antioch; and some think, that the manner of expression intimates, that they were all proselytes of Jerusalem, as he was of Antioch.

The first named is Stephen, the glory of them all; a man full of faith and of the Holy

V. 7. 'A happy event of a time of trial.' Beza. Indeed, the triumph of the Gospel, without this, would in some respects have been incomplete. It seems probable, that some of these converted priests became ministers of the Gospel: yet no intimation is given in the N. T., of any priest, of the family of Aaron, being employed as a Christian minister. John the Baptist was a priest; Barnabas was a Levite: but nothing else, in this respect, is said either of priests or Levites. It may, then, be a matter of inquiry, whether this circumstance were not intentionally ordered, to mark, not a gradual transition, but an immediate and entire change, in the external administration of the church. SCOTT.

V. 8. 'It appears plainly, from the foregoing history, that it was not as a deacon that he' (Stephen) 'preached: but the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit he received eminently qualified him for that work. And no doubt many Christians, not stately devoted to the ministry, and whose furniture was far inferior to his, would be capable of declaring Christ and his Gospel to strangers, in an edifying and useful manner, and would not fail accordingly to do it, as Providence gave them a call and an opportunity.' Doddr., in SCOTT.—'He that will plead a commission from Ghost; he had a strong faith in the doctrine of Christ, and was full of it, above most; full of fidelity, full of courage, so some; for he was full of the Holy Ghost, of his gifts and graces; he was an extraordinary man, and excelled in everything that was good; his name signifies a crown. Philip is next, because he, having used this office of a deacon well, thereby obtained a good degree, and was afterward ordained to the office of an evangelist, a companion and assistant to the apostles, for so he is expressly called, ch. 21:8. Comp. Eph. 4:11. And his preaching and baptizing, which we read of, ch. 8:12. were certainly not as a deacon, for it is plain that that office was serving tables, in opposition to the ministry of the Word, but as an evangelist; and when he was preferred to that office, we have reason to think he quitted this, as incompatible. As for Stephen, nothing we find done by him, proves him to be a preacher of the Gospel; for he only disputes in the schools, and pleads for his life at the bar, v. 9. and ch. 7:2.

The last named is Nicolas, who, some say, afterward degenerated, and was the founder of the sect of the Nicolaitans, Rev. 2:6, 15. But some of the ancients clear him from that charge, and tell us, that though that vile, impure sect denominated themselves from him, yet it was unjustly, and because he only insisted much on it, that they that had wives, should be as though they had none; thence they wickedly inferred, that they that had wives, should have them in common; which therefore Tertullian, when he speaks of the community of goods, particularly excepts, all things are common among us, except our wives, Apol. eap. 39.

The apostles, (1.) Prayed with them, and for them, that God would give them more and more of the Holy Ghost, and of wisdom. All that are employed in the service of the church, ought to be committed to the conduct of the Divine grace by the prayers of the church. (2.) Laid their hands on them, that is, blessed them in the name of the Lord, for laying on hands was used in blessing; so Jacob blessed both the sons of Joseph; and, without controversy, the less is blessed of the greater, Heb. 7:7. the deacons, by the apostles, and the overseers of the poor by the pastors of the congregation. Having by prayer implored a blessing on them, they did by the laying on of hands assure them that the blessing was conferred in answer to the prayer; and this was giving them authority to execute that office, and laying an obligation on the people to be observant of them therein.

6. The advancement of the church hereupon, v. 7. (1.) The Word of God increased; now that the apostles resolved to stick more closely than ever to their preaching, it spread the Gospel further, and brought it home with the more power. Ministers, disentangling themselves from secular employments, and addicting themselves entirely and vigorously to their work, will contribute very much, as a mean, to the success of the Gospel. (2.) The number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly. When Christ was upon earth, his ministry had least success in Jerusalem; yet now that city affords most converts. God has his remnant even in the worst of places. (3.) A great company of the priests were obedient to the faith. Then is the word and grace of God greatly magnified, when those are wrought upon by it, that were least likely, as the priests here, who either had opposed it, or at least were linked in with those that had. But they evidenced the sincerity of their believing the Gospel of Christ, by a cheerful compliance with all its rules and precepts.

V. 8—15. Stephen, no doubt, was diligent and faithful in his office, and though it appears here that he was a man of uncommon gifts, and fitted for a higher station, yet, being called to that office, he did not think it below him to do its duty. And being faithful in a little, he was intrusted with more; and though we do not find him propagating the Gospel by preaching and baptizing, yet we find him here called out to very honorable services, and owned in them.

I. He proved the truth of the Gospel, by working miracles in Christ's name, v. 8.

1. He was full of faith and power, i. e. of a strong faith, by which he was enabled to do great things. By faith we are emptied of self, and so are filled with Christ, who is the wisdom of God, and the power of God.

2. Being so, he did great wonders and miracles among the people, openly, and in the sight of all; for Christ's miracles feared not the strictest scrutiny. It is not strange that Stephen, though not a preacher by office, did these great wonders, for we find that these were distinct gifts of the Spirit, and divided severally, 1 Cor. 12:10, 11. And those signs followed not only them that preached, but them that believed, Mark 16:17.

II. He pleaded the cause of Christianity against those that opposed it, and argued against it, v. 9, 10.

1. His opponents, v. 9. Hellenist Jews, who seem to have been more zealous for their religion than the native Jews; they were of the synagogue of the Libertines; the Romans called those Liberti or Libertini, who, either being foreigners, were naturalized, or, being slaves by birth, were manumitted, or made freemen. Some think that these Libertines were such of the Jews as had obtained the Roman freedom, as Paul had, ch. 22:27, 28. and probably he was the most forward man of this synagogue of the Libertines in disputing with Stephen, and engaged others in the dispute; for we find him busy in the stoning of Stephen, and consenting to his death. There were others that belonged to the synagogue of the Cyrenians and Alexandrians, of which synagogue the Jewish writers speak; and others that belonged to their synagogue, who were

God to preach the Gospel, without an ordinary mission, must show the like extraordinary gifts or miraculous assistances: God never sending any person to do his work, without some testimony from Himself, or from persons commissioned by Him.' Whitby, in SCOTT.—It is most likely Stephen was previously a preacher: but if not, it can hardly be supposed he would undertake that important office, however qualified, at Jerusalem, and amidst the apostles, without their sanction; or that others, in such circumstances, would do this. At the same time, it must fairly be allowed, that extraordinary cases may arise, which would justify the dispensing with ordinary rules; and remarkable persons may be raised up, though not endued with miraculous powers, who may be fully warranted to teach the ignorant, not only privately, but in the most public manner; though not expressly appointed to the ministry. John the Baptist wrought no miracles; yet his ministry, as entirely distinct from the priesthood, was from God, without any human appointment: and it is far from clear, that all the prophets wrought miracles; indeed it is recorded of only a few of them that they did; and they were not sanctioned, but opposed, by the stated ministers of religion; yet their calling was divine. This appeared by the agreement of their instructions with the Scripture, and by the effects of their labors. General rules, however, though they admit of some exceptions, form the measure of our conduct in all ordinary cases: and it is extremely dangerous to give a kind of unlimited sanction to all who suppose themselves, or are supposed by their favorers, to be qualified for the public ministry, to engage in it, without any appointment from the church and its ministers. SCOTT.

9 Then there arose certain of the synagogue, which is called the synagogue of the Libertines, and Cyrenians, and Alexandrians, and of them of Cilicia and of Asia, disputing with Stephen.

10 And they were not able <sup>n</sup> to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake.

11 Then they suborned <sup>o</sup> men, which said, We have heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses, and against God.

12 And they stirred up the people, and the elders, and the scribes, and came upon him, and caught him, and brought him to the council,

13 And set up false witnesses, which said, This man ceaseth not to speak blasphemous words against this holy place, and the law:

14 For <sup>p</sup> we have heard him say, that this Jesus of Nazareth shall <sup>q</sup> destroy this place, and shall change the <sup>r</sup> customs which Moses delivered us.

15 And all that sat in the council, looking steadfastly on him, saw his <sup>s</sup> face as it had been the face of an angel.

of Cilicia and Asia; and if Paul, as a free-man of Rome, did not belong to the synagogue of the Libertines, he belonged to this, as a native of Tarsus, a city of Cilicia; it is probable that he might be a member of both. The Jews that were born in other countries, and had concerns in them, had frequent occasion, not only to resort to, but to reside in, Jerusalem. Each nation had its synagogue, as in London there are French, and Dutch, and Danish churches: and those synagogues were the schools, to which the Jews of those nations sent their youth to be educated in the Jewish learning. Now those that were tutors and professors in these synagogues, seeing the Gospel grow, and the rulers conniving at the growth of it, and fearing what would be the consequence of it to the Jewish religion, which they were jealous for, being confident of the goodness of their cause, and their own sufficiency to manage it, would undertake to run down Christianity by force of argument; it was a fair and rational way of dealing with it, and what religion is always ready to admit. But why did they dispute with Stephen, and not with the apostles themselves? (1.) Some think, because they despised the apostles as unlearned and ignorant men, but Stephen was bred a scholar, and they thought it their honor to meddle with their match. (2.) Others think, it was because they stood in awe of the apostles, and could not be so free and familiar with them, as they could be with Stephen, who was in an inferior office. (3.) Perhaps, they having given a public challenge, Stephen was chosen and appointed by the disciples to be their champion; for it was not meet that the apostles should leave the preaching of the Word of God, to engage in controversy. (4.) Some historians say, that Stephen had been bred up at the feet of Gamaliel, and that Saul and the rest of them set on him as a deserter, and with a particular fury made him their mark. (5.) Probably they disputed with Stephen, because he was zealous to argue with them, and convince them. And this was the service God had called him to.

2. We are here told how he carried the point in this dispute, v. 10. They could neither support their own arguments, nor answer his: though not convinced, yet they were confounded. It is not said, They were not able to resist him, but, They were not able to resist the wisdom and the Spirit by which he spake, that Spirit of wisdom which spake by him. Now was fulfilled that promise, Luke 21:15.

III. At length, he sealed it with his blood; so we shall find in the next ch., here we have some steps taken by his enemies towards it. When they could not answer his arguments as a disputant, they prosecuted him as a criminal, and suborned witnesses against him, to swear blasphemy on him. 'On such terms,' saith Baxter here, 'do we dispute with malignant men. And it is next to a miracle of Providence, that no greater number of religious persons have been murdered in the world, by the way of perjury and pretence of law, when so many thousands hate them, who make no conscience of false oaths.' They suborned men, instructed them what to say, and then hired them to swear it. Observe,

1. How, with all possible art and industry, they incensed both the government and the mob against him, that, if they could not prevail by the one, they might by the other, v. 12. They stirred up the people, that, if the Sanhedrim should still think fit to let him alone, yet they might run him down by a popular tumult; they also find means to stir up the elders and the scribes against him, that, if the people should countenance and protect him, they might prevail by authority.

2. How they got him to the bar; They came upon him in a body, and flew upon him as a lion on his prey; so the word signifies. Having caught him alone, they brought him triumphantly, and, as it should seem, so hastily, that he had none of his friends with him.

3. How they were prepared with evidence ready to produce against him, resolved not to be run aground, as they were when they brought our Savior on his trial, and then were to seek for witnesses. These were got ready beforehand, and were instructed to make oath, that they had heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses, and against God, v. 11, 13, 14. Probably he had said something to that purport; and yet they who swore it against him are called false witnesses, because, though there was something of truth in their testimony, yet they put a wrong and malicious construction on what he had said, and perverted it. Christ, and the preachers of his Gospel, never said anything that looked like blaspheming Moses; they always quoted his writings with respect, appealed to them, and said no other things than what Moses said should come. But,

Let us see how this charge is supported and made out; why, truly, when the thing was to be proved, all they can charge him with, is, that he hath spoken blasphemous words against the holy place and the law; and this must be deemed and taken as blasphemy against Moses, and against God Himself. This holy place, some understand of the city of Jerusalem, which was the holy city, but it is rather meant of the temple, that holy house. He is charged, also, with blaspheming the law; of which they made their boast, and in which they put their trust, then when through breaking of the law they dishonored God, Rom. 2:23.

Well, but how can they make this out? Why, here the charge dwindles again; for all they can accuse him of, is, that they had themselves heard him say, that this Jesus of Nazareth, who was so much talked of, shall destroy this place, and change the customs which Moses delivered us. He could not be charged with having said anything to the disparagement either of the temple or of the law. He had said, Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place; destroy the temple, destroy Jerusalem; probably he might say so; and what blasphemy in that; or in this, that the just and holy God would not continue the privileges of his sanctuary to those that abuse them? Had not the prophets given the same warning to their fathers, of the destruction of that holy place by the Chaldeans? Nay, when the temple was first built, had not God Himself given the same warning, 2 Chr. 7:21. He had said, This Jesus shall change the customs Moses delivered us. And it was expected the Messiah should change them, and that the shadows should be done away when the substance was come; yet this was no essential change of the law, but the perfecting of it; and if the Jewish church had not obstinately adhered to the ceremonial law, for aught I know, their place had not been destroyed; so that for putting them into a certain way to prevent their destruction, and for giving them certain notice of their destruction if they did

PRACT. OBS. Unless partial and carnal self-love could be wholly destroyed out of every heart; envies, murmurs, jealousies, and discontents will creep in, and, in some degree, disturb every community on earth, however collected and governed. We should, however, repress the first risings of selfish passions in our own hearts; and endeavor to prevent them in others, or to remove all occasions of them from others, as far as we can: and, if they begin to appear, such concessions and regulations should be made, without delay, as may disappoint that enemy, who thus seeks to divide the house and kingdom against itself. In general, the ministers of Christ should leave to other men, as far as they can, the management of secular concerns, even such as belong to the church, or to charitable institutions; that they may keep clear of all suspicion of partiality or injustice, and be more at leisure, and unincumbered in attending to their proper office. But, if it be unreasonable and sinful for them 'to leave the Word of God,' even to superintend the care of the poor, and those secular concerns which have an intimate connexion with piety and charity: how inexcusable must they be, who leave the public ministry, and even the care of the poor and sick, to others, and waste their time in dissipated pleasures, luxurious indulgence, ambitious and covetous pursuits, or such studies as are foreign to the clerical profession! or who spend their time, abilities, and zeal, in political [or sectarian] disputes!—How irrational a creature is man! To assert, that an intelligent being is capable of deliberately supporting a system of religion, by subornation, perjury, lying testimony, and murder, might have been deemed a libel on human nature, and on reason itself, had it not been done in numberless instances. But the blame rests not on the understanding, so much as on the 'desperately wicked' heart.

V. 9—14. No doubt Stephen foretold, that Jesus would destroy the city and temple, in case the nation of the Jews persisted in opposition to Him: but the apostles did not understand, till long after, that the Mosaic law was to be abrogated; so that this was their inference from his doctrine: and as the temple and city had before been destroyed, and yet the ritual law of Moses had not been altered; this inference was precarious, and their testimony false.—(14.) The customs.] 'The rites.' The traditions of the elders, or what was called the oral law, as well as the written institutions of Moses, seem to have been meant. SCOTT.

CHAP. VII.

1 Stephen, permitted to answer to the accusation of blasphemy, 2 sheweth that Abraham worshipped God rightly, and how God chose the fathers, 20 before Moses was born, and before the tabernacle and temple were built: 37 that Moses himself witnessed of Christ: 44 and that all outward ceremonies were ordained according to the heavenly pattern, to last but for a time: 51 reprehending their rebellion, and murdering of Christ, the Just One, who the prophets foretold should come into the world. 54 Whereupon they stone him to death, who commendeth his soul to Jesus, and humbly prayeth for them.

THEN said the high priest, Are these things so?

2 And he said, Men, brethren, and fathers, hearken; The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran,

3 And said<sup>b</sup> unto him, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and come into the land which I shall shew thee.

4 Then<sup>c</sup> came he out of the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in Charran: and from thence, when his father was dead, he removed him into this land, wherein ye now dwell.

5 And he gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on: yet he promised<sup>d</sup> that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child.

6 And God spake on this wise, That<sup>e</sup> his seed should sojourn in a strange land; and that they should bring them into bondage, and entreat them evil four<sup>f</sup> hundred years.

7 And the nation to whom they shall be in bondage will I judge, said God: and after that shall they come forth, and serve<sup>g</sup> me in this place.

8 And<sup>h</sup> he gave him the covenant of circumcision: and so<sup>i</sup> Abraham begat Isaac, and circumcised him the eighth day; and Isaac<sup>j</sup> begat Jacob; and Jacob<sup>k</sup> begat the twelve patriarchs.

not take that way, he is accused as a blasphemer!

Lastly, We are here told how God owned him when brought before the council, v. 15. All that sat in the council, the priests, scribes, and elders, looking steadfastly on him, being a stranger they had not yet had before them, they saw his face as if it had been the face of an angel. It is usual for judges to observe the countenance of the prisoner, which sometimes is an indication either of guilt or innocence. Now Stephen appeared at the bar with the countenance as of an angel, never better pleased in his life than now, when called out to bear his testimony to the Gospel thus publicly, and stand fair for the crown of martyrdom. Such an undisturbed serenity, such an undaunted courage, and such an unaccountable mixture of mildness and majesty, there was in his countenance, that every one said, he looked like an angel. It should seem there was a miraculous splendor and brightness on his countenance, like that of our Savior, when transfigured; or of Moses, when he came down from the mount; God designing thereby to honor his faithful witness, and confound his persecutors and judges, whose sin would be highly aggravated, and would be indeed a rebellion against the light, if, notwithstanding this, they proceeded against him. Wisdom and holiness make a man's face to shine, yet these will not secure men from the greatest indignities; and no wonder, when the shining of Stephen's face would not be his protection; though it had been easy to prove, that, if he had been guilty of putting any dishonor on Moses, God would not thus have put Moses' honor on him.

CHAP. VII. In this ch. we have the martyrdom of Stephen, the first martyr of the Christian church, who led the van in that noble army. Therefore his sufferings and death are more largely related than any other's, for direction and encouragement to all who are called out to resist unto blood. Here is, 1. His defence of himself before the council, in answer to the matters and things he stood charged with, the scope of which is to show, that it was no blasphemy against God, nor any injury at all to the glory of his name, to say, that the temple should be destroyed, and the customs of the ceremonial law changed. This he shows by going over the history of the O. T., and observing, that God never intended to confine his favors to that place, or that ceremonial law; and that they had no reason to expect He should; for the Jews had always been a provoking people, and had forfeited the privileges of their peculiarity; nay, that that holy place and that law were but figures of good things to come, and it was no disparagement at all to them to say, that they must give place to better things. He then applies this to them that prosecuted him, and sat in judgment on him, sharply reproofing them for their wickedness, by which they had brought on themselves the ruin of their place and nation, and then could not bear to hear of it. 2. His death by stoning, and his patient, cheerful, pious submission to it.

V. 1-16. I. The high priest calls on Stephen to answer for himself, v. 1. Guilty or not guilty? This carried a show of fairness, yet seems to have been spoken with haughtiness; and thus far he seems to have prejudged the cause, that, if it were so, that he had spoken such and such words, he shall certainly be adjudged a blasphemer, whatever he may offer in justification or explanation.

II. He begins his defence, and it is long; but it seems by his breaking off abruptly, just when he came to the main point, v. 50. it would have been much longer, had his enemies given him leave to say all he had to say. In general, 1. In this discourse he appears to be a man ready and mighty in the Scriptures, and thereby thoroughly furnished for every good word and work. They that are full of the Holy Ghost, will be full of the Scripture. 2. He quotes the Scriptures, according to the Sept., by which it appears he was one of the Hellenist Jews, who used that version in their synagogues. His following that, occasions divers variations from the Heb. original, in this discourse, which the judges of the court did not correct, because they knew how he was led into them; nor is it any derogation to the authority of that Spirit by which he spake, for the variations are not material. These vs. carry on this his compendium of church-history to the end of Gen. Let us see what this is to Stephen's case.

(1.) They had charged him as a blasphemer of God, and an apostate from the church; therefore he shows he is a son of Abraham, and values himself on being a faithful worshipper of the God of Abraham, whom, therefore, he here calls the God of glory. He also shows that he owns divine revelation, and that particularly by which the Jewish church was founded and incorporated. (2.) They were proud of their being circumcised; therefore he shows that Abraham was taken under God's conduct, and into communion with Him, before he was circumcised, v. 8. With this argument Paul proves, that Abraham was justified by faith, because he was justified when he was in uncircumcision: and so here. (3.) They had a mighty jealousy for this holy place: the whole land of Canaan; called the holy land, Immanuel's land; the destruction of the holy house, inferred that of the holy land. 'Now,' says Stephen, 'you need not be so proud of it; for you came originally out of Ur of the Chaldees, where your fathers served other gods, Josh. 24:2. and you were not the first planters of this country. Further, God appeared in his glory to Abraham a great way off in Mesopotamia, before he came near Canaan, nay, before he dwelt in Charran; so that you must not think God's visits are to this land: no; He that brought the seed of the church from a country so far east, can, if He pleases, carry the fruit of it to another country as far west. Neither did God make haste to bring him into this land, but let him linger some years by the way, and his children 400 years: which shows that God has not his heart so much on this land as you have, neither is his honor, nor the happiness of his people, bound up in it. It is therefore neither blasphemy nor treason to say, It shall be destroyed.'

But how does this serve Stephen's purpose. [1.] Since things are thus as to the Jewish nation, what need is there of so much ado, as if their ruin, when they bring it on themselves by sin, must be the ruin of the world, and of all God's interest in it? No; He that brought them out of Egypt, can bring them into it again, as He threatened, Deut. 28:68. and yet be no loser, while He can, out of stones, raise up children unto Abraham. Besides, [2.] The slow steps by which the promise made to Abraham advanced toward the performance, and the many seeming contradictions here taken notice of, plainly show that it had a spiritual meaning, and that the land principally intended to be conveyed and secured by it, was, the better country, i. e. the heavenly: as the apostle shows from this very argument, Heb. 11:9, 10. It was therefore no blasphemy

NOTES. CHAP. VII. V. 2. God of glory. [I. e. most worthy of glory and honor; it is meant to refute the crimination of blasphemy against God. Stephen here follows the tradition of the Jews, that God appeared twice to Abraham; once when he was in Chaldea, and again at Charran. So Philo.]

V. 4, 5. Both 'Ur of the Chaldees,' and Charran, or Haran, were, properly speaking, in Mesopotamia; though Haran was much nearer to the promised land than Ur was. Not so much, &c. When Sarah died, Abraham had no land for a burying-place, till he bought it. Scott.

(4.) After. [I think with Mieh., Krauser, Morus, Ros., &c. that Stephen here also followed the Jewish tradition, that Abraham, after the death (i. e. the moral and allegorical death) of his father, migrated into Canaan. So Philo. For the Jews maintain, that Moses relates Terah's death by anticipation, because, from being a worshipper of God, he now became an idolater, and thus might be accounted dead (as the apostle says sinners are dead while they live), see Josh. 24:2. Judith 5:6,

7. Kuin. Bp. Lloyd, however, thinks the seventy yrs., at Gen. 11:26. relates only to the birth of Haran; and that Terah was 130 when he begat Abraham, and that, if so, A. was seventy-five, and T. (who died at 205) might have been dead when A. left Charran. Bp. Pearce? Bl.

V. 6. Four hundred. [I. e. in round numbers; 430 actually, as Jos., who in another place speaks [roundly] of 400. The Israelites abode 243 yrs. (as Koppe proves) in Egypt.] (So Bl.)

V. 7. [These words are not found in Gen. 15:13, &c. Krebs and others observe, that we have them in substance, in Gen. 15:12. but some, more justly, in Ex. 3:12. For it was a custom with the Jewish doctors (followed by the writers of the N. T., and Stephen here) when they cited any oracle of the O. T., to add some words elsewhere employed on the same subject, and those sometimes a little changed, and this, in order to amplify the thing. See Surenhusius. Besides, Stephen does not say the words were spoken to Abraham, but, [simply,] "God thus spake." Id. [See Woods's Lect. on Quotations.]

9 ¶ And the patriarchs, moved with <sup>l</sup>envy, sold Joseph into Egypt: but <sup>m</sup>God was with him,

10 And delivered him out of all his afflictions, and gave him favor and wisdom in the sight of Pharaoh king of Egypt; and he <sup>n</sup>made him governor over Egypt and all his house.

11 Now <sup>o</sup>there came a dearth over all the land of Egypt and Chanaan, and great affliction: and our fathers found no sustenance.

12 But <sup>p</sup>when Jacob heard that there was corn in Egypt, he sent out our fathers first.

13 And at the second time Joseph <sup>q</sup>was made known to his brethren; and Joseph's kindred was made known unto Pharaoh.

14 Then sent Joseph, and called his father Jacob to him, and all <sup>r</sup>his kindred, threescore and fifteen souls.

15 So Jacob went down into Egypt, and died, he, and our fathers, 16 And <sup>s</sup>were carried over into Sychem, and laid in the sepulchre that Abraham bought for a sum of money of the sons of Emmor the father of Sychem.

17 ¶ But when the time of the promise drew nigh, which God had to say, Jesus shall destroy this place, when at the same time we say, 'He shall lead us to the heavenly Canaan, and put us in possession of that, of which the earthly Canaan was but a type and figure.' [3.] The building up of Abraham's family, with the entail of divine grace upon it, and the disposals of Divine Providence concerning it, which take up the book of Genesis.

1st. God engaged to be a God to Abraham and to his seed; and, in token of that, appointed that he and his male seed should be circumcised, Gen. 17: 9, 10. by which he was both obliged by the divine law, and interested in the divine promise; for circumcision had reference to both. 2dly. Joseph, the darling and blessing of his father's house, was abused by his brethren; thus early did the children of Israel begin to grudge those among them that were eminent and outshone others; of which, their enmity to Christ, who, like Joseph, was a Nazarite among his brethren, was a great instance. 3dly. God owned Joseph in his troubles, and was with him, Gen. 39: 2, 21. by the influence of his Spirit, both on his mind, giving him comfort, and on the minds of those he was concerned with, giving him favor in their eyes. And thus he not only arrived at great preferment among the Egyptians, but became the shepherd and stone of Israel, Gen. 49: 24. 4thly. Jacob was compelled to go into Egypt, by a famine forcing him out of Canaan, a dearth, a great affliction, to that degree, that our fathers found no sustenance, even in Canaan, v. 11—14. They are said to be 70 souls, Gen. 46: 27. But the Sept. there makes them 75, and Stephen or Luke follows that, as Luke 3: 36. where Caiman is inserted, that is not in the Heb. text, but in the Sept. Some, by excluding Joseph and his sons, who were in Egypt before, which reduces the number to 64, and adding the sons of the 11 patriarchs, make the number 75. 5thly. Jacob and his sons died in Egypt, v. 16. but were carried over to be buried in Canaan, v. 17. A very considerable difficulty occurs here: it is said, They were carried over into Sychem, whereas Jacob was buried not in Sychem, but near Hebron, in the cave of Machpelah, where Abraham and Isaac were buried, Gen. 50: 13. Joseph's bones, indeed, were buried in Sychem, Josh. 24: 32. and it seems by this, (though it is not mentioned in the story,) that the bones of all the other patriarchs were carried with his, each of them giving the same commandment concerning them that he had done; and of them this must be understood, not of Jacob himself. But then the sepulchre in Sychem was bought by Jacob, Gen. 33: 19. and by that it is described, Josh. 24: 22. How then is it here said to be bought by Abraham? Dr. Whitby's solution of this is very sufficient. Jacob went down into Egypt and died, he and our fathers; and (our fathers) were carried over into Sychem; and he, i. e. Jacob, was laid in the sepulchre that Abraham bought for a sum of money, Gen. 23. (Or, they were laid there, i. e. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.) And they, namely, the other patriarchs, were buried in the sepulchre bought of the sons of Emmor, the father of Sychem.

Let us now see what this is to Stephen's purpose.

1. He still reminds them of the mean beginning of the Jewish nation, as a check to their priding themselves in its glories; but if they answer not the intention of their being so raised, they can expect no other than to be destroyed. The prophets frequently put them in mind of the bringing of them out of Egypt, as an aggravation of their contempt of the law of God; and here it is urged on them as an aggravation of their contempt of the Gospel of Christ. 2. He reminds them likewise of the wickedness of those that were the patriarchs of their tribes, in envying their brother Joseph, and selling him into Egypt; and the same spirit was still working in them toward Christ and his ministers. 3. Their holy land, which they doted so much upon, their fathers were long kept out of the possession of, and met with dearth and great affliction in it; therefore let them not think it strange, if, after it has been so long polluted with sin, it be at length destroyed. 4. The faith of the patriarchs, in desiring to be buried in the land of Canaan, plainly showed that they had an eye to the heavenly country, which it was the design of this Jesus to lead them to.

V. 17—29. I. Stephen here goes on to

V. 9—13. The argument of this passage seems to be, that, as the patriarchs must have perished, if Joseph, whom they had envied and injured, had not been advanced to authority, and thus enabled to preserve them; so must the Jews and their rulers perish, unless Jesus, whom they had despised and crucified, but whom God had highly exalted, should graciously save them. As therefore Joseph's brethren at length submitted to him, and were forgiven; so ought they to submit, and seek forgiveness from the glorified Messiah. (10) Favor.] Many understand this of the courteous and graceful deportment of Joseph, as conciliating the favor of all men, in connexion with his wisdom. SCOTT.

(10.) Gave, &c.] 'Gave him favor in the sight of Pharaoh by his wisdom.' Grot., Ros., Kuin., Bloomf., &c. Ed.

V. 14. Seventy persons, including Jacob and Joseph, and Joseph's two sons, are reckoned up by Moses; among whom were some grandchildren of Benjamin, who was not above twenty-five years of age, when Jacob went down into Egypt. And several grand-children of Joseph are named in Chr., who are not mentioned in Gen. (1 Chr. 7: 16, 20.) It is undeniable, that some of the grand-children of Jacob's sons, who afterwards became heads of families in their tribes, were included in the number stated by Moses: and is it not the most obvious way of settling the difficulty, between his account, and that of Stephen from the Sept., to include five grand-children of Joseph? Some learned men indeed would make up the number, by the wives of the patriarchs: but it must have been very extraordinary at least that, with so many sons and grandsons, there should have been no more than five women! and, if there were many more, why should five only be here added to the number? Only two females (Dinah, and Serah, a descendant of Gad) are mentioned in Gen.: and the Sept., which Stephen seems to have referred to, may be thus tr.: 'All the souls which came with Jacob into Egypt, who came out of his loins, apart from the wives of Jacob's sons, all the souls were sixty-six. But the sons of Joseph, who were born to him in the land of Egypt, were nine. All the souls of the house of Jacob, who went down with Jacob into Egypt, were seventy-five souls.' Joseph, and his two sons, and Jacob himself, complete the seventy of our version: and though the Sept. is not very accurate or perspicuous in this statement, three things are sufficiently clear: 1. That the additional five mentioned in it were not women. In fact, with what propriety could the wives of Jacob's sons be said to come out of his loins? 2. That they were sons, or male descendants of Joseph. And, 3. That the family of Jacob, containing some born in Egypt, and Joseph who was carried thither long before, as well as Jacob, and those who went down with him, are included.—'Reckoning some of the children born in Egypt, together with Joseph and his sons, and his sons' sons, made up seventy-five persons.' Hammond. SCOTT. 'The most probable [reconciliation of Acts with Gen.] says Kuin., is that adopted by Hammond, Cappellus, Wetst., Mich., Kreuse, Ros., &c. who remark, that the Sept. numbered among the posterity of Jacob the five sons of Manasseh and Ephraim, born in Egypt [who in scripture-style might be said to be [34] in his loins, and are by a figure said to have gone down with him, the greater part, too, here denominating the whole. Ed.] and that these five were omitted by Moses, because they were born after Jacob's departure, but by the Sept. at Gen. 46: 20. are expressly added from 1 Chr. 7: 14. (&c.) That there were in Stephen's time various calculations of this number (and so no inaccuracy to be supposed in the SS.) is evident from Philo., who, touching on this matter in an allegory, mentions both numbers. Kuin. The very perplexed and dubious question, as Bloomf. (whom see) remarks, is, like most such, of little importance. Ed.

V. 15, 16. It appears from this passage, and it is indeed highly probable in itself, and confirmed by ancient tradition, that the bodies of all Jacob's sons were embalmed, and carried up by their descendants, to be interred in Canaan. Jacob was buried in the cave of the field of Machpelah, with his fathers, Abraham and Isaac. This Abraham bought of Ephron the Hittite. But Joseph, and probably his brethren, were buried at Sychem, or Shechem, in the piece of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Emmor, or Hamor, the father of Shechem; and which he left as an inheritance to the descendants of Joseph. 'Jacob died, he and our fathers, and they' (our fathers) 'were carried over to Sychem and buried, he' (that is Jacob) 'in the sepulchre which Abraham bought for a sum of money; and they' (the other patriarchs) 'in that of the sons of Emmor, the father of Sychem.' This rendering has been proposed by several eminent men, to remove the obvious difficulty of reconciling the passage with the history in Gen. 33: 19. Gen. 48: 22. Josh. 24: 29—32, v. 32. But it is rather a paraphrase than a tr.; and not a fair paraphrase of the present text. SCOTT.

(16.) 'The difficulties here may be satisfactorily solved, if "carried over" and "laid" be referred only to the words "our fathers," and "Abraham" be cancelled as spurious. Then tr. thus: "they were removed to Sychem, and were buried in a sepulchre which had been bought for a sum of money from the sons of Emmor, father of Sychem." Now it was a common tradition of the Jews, not only that the bones of Joseph, but also of his eleven brethren, were buried at Sychem; as appears by the rabbinical passages in Lightf. and Wetst. And so Jer. But Jos. says, the patriarchs were buried at Hebron. The tradition therefore was two-fold and different. And since we learn from Scripture, that at Hebron were buried Abraham, and Sarah, Isaac, and Jacob, and (according to report) Adam and Eve; especially too, as nothing is said in the SS. of the burial-place of the brethren, so arose the tradition that the brethren also of Joseph were buried there.—At "bought," Beza, Boeh., and Pierce, siband "Jacob," from the context (comp. v. 15); and they think that "Abraham" was foisted in. So also Bayer, Wasenburger, Valckn., and Tittman, who refer the word (with great probability) to the glosses. It is unquestionable, that sometimes all the MSS. unite in a false reading (see [my] note on Mark 15: 25); and the introduction of the present one may be easily accounted for.' BLOOMF.

V. 17—20. The words here rendered, 'exceeding fair,' some have rendered, 'Beloved by God;' but this is not a just tr. Neither is there any ground to conclude, either that Moses prophesied, as some have supposed, or indeed had true faith and grace, till a short time before he visited his brethren. The clause 'fair to God,' seems to refer to the Lord's purposes concerning Moses, which induced Him to preserve him, when other children were destroyed; and by means of his extraordinary beauty to accomplish this. Moses might be 'mighty in words,' as capable of calm, forcible, and conclusive reasoning; and yet be slow of speech, and destitute of the graces of elocution, as he modestly pleaded concerning himself. He had received some general intimation, that he should deliver his people; but it does not appear, that he was expressly commissioned to attempt their deliverance at this time. From some general computation, it is probable he supposed the appointed time was at hand; but forty years more must elapse, before that event actually took place. He also concluded, that when so distinguished a person, as he had been in Pharaoh's court, renounced all his prospects, to join interests with his enslaved people, as the deliverer whom God had raised up; they too, remembering the prediction and promise to Abraham, would readily attach themselves to him: but in this he found himself mistaken. Now he seems to observe this to them, not only that they might further see how mean their beginnings were, Ezek. 16:4. and how much they were indebted to God for his care of them, which they had forfeited, and made themselves unworthy of; but also that they might consider, that what they were now doing against the Christian church in its infancy, was as impious and unjust, and would be in the issue as fruitless, as that the Egyptians did against the Jewish church in its infancy.

25 For he supposed his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them : but they understood not.

26 And the next day he shewed himself unto them as they strove, and would have set them at one again, saying, Sirs, ye are brethren; why do ye wrong one to another ?

27 But he that did his neighbor wrong thrust him away, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge over us ?

II. Stephen was charged with having spoken blasphemous words against Moses; in answer to which charge, he here speaks very honorably of him.

I. Moses was born when the persecution of Israel was at the hottest, v. 20. and was himself in danger, as soon as he came into the world, as our Savior also was at Bethlehem, of falling a sacrifice to that bloody edict. God is preparing for his people's deliverance, then when their day is darkest, and their distress deepest. 2. He was exceeding fair; he was sanctified from the womb, which made him beautiful in God's eyes. 3. He was wonderfully preserved in his infancy, first, by the care of his tender parents, and then by a favorable providence, that threw him into the arms of Pharaoh's daughter, v. 21. Whom God designs to make special use of, He will take special care of. And did He thus protect the child Moses? Much more will He secure the interests of his holy Child Jesus, ch. 4:27. from the enemies gathered against Him. 4. He was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, v. 22. then famed for all manner of polite literature, particularly philosophy, astronomy, and (which perhaps helped to lead them to idolatry) hieroglyphics. Moses, having his education at court, had opportunity of improving himself by the best books, tutors, and conversation, in all the arts and sciences, and had a genius for them. Only we have reason to think he had not so far forgotten the God of his fathers, as to acquaint himself with the unlawful studies and practices of the magicians of Egypt, any further than was necessary to confute them. 5. He became a prime minister of state in Egypt; that seems to be meant by his being mighty in words and deeds. And in business none went on with such courage, and conduct, and success. Thus was he prepared, by human helps, for those services, which, after all, he could not be thoroughly furnished for without divine illumination. Now, by all this, Stephen will make it appear, that notwithstanding the malicious insinuations of his persecutors, he had as high and honorable thoughts of Moses as they had.

III. Stephen notes the attempts Moses made to deliver Israel, which they spurned. This he insists much on, and it serves for a key to this story, Ex. 2:11-15. as does also that other construction of the apostle's, Heb. 11:24-26. There it is represented as an act of holy self-denial, here as a designed entrance on the public service he was to be called out to, v. 23. When he was full 40 years old, in the prime of his time for preferment in the court of Egypt, it came into his heart (for God put it there) to visit his brethren the children of Israel, and to see which way he might do them any service; and he showed himself as a public person, with a public character:

1. As Israel's savior, v. 24. which, if he had been only a private person, he could not lawfully have done; but he knew his commission from heaven would bear him out; and he supposed that his brethren (who could not but have some knowledge of the promise made to Abraham, that the nation that should oppress them, God would judge) would have understood that God by his hand would deliver them; for he could not have had, either presence of mind, or strength of body, to do what he did, if he had not been clothed with such a divine power as evidenced a divine authority. 2. As Israel's judge; offering to accommodate matters between two contending Hebrews, wherein he plainly assumed a public character, v. 26. He showed himself to them as they strove, and, putting on an air of majesty and authority, he would have set them at one again, and as their prince have determined the controversy between them, saying, Sirs, ye are brethren, by birth and profession of religion; why do ye wrong one to another? He gave them excellent laws and statutes, and determined on their complaints and appeals made to him, Ex. 18:16.

But the contending Israelite, that was most in the wrong, thrust him away, v. 27. would not bear the reproof, though a just and gentle one, for proud and litigious spirits are impatient of check and control, but was so enraged, that he upbraided Moses with the service he had done to their nation, in killing the Egyptian, which, if they had pleased, would have been the earnest of further and greater service, v. 28. Charging that upon (24.) Oppressed. 'Properly, worn down, or out, [see on v. 19.] with labor, affliction, ill-treatment, [sickness.] It cannot be proved that Moses meant to slay the Egyptian; his act was justifiable as living under a tyrant who afforded them no legal protection; they had thereby returned to a state of nature, and were at liberty to use its rights, which Grot. says, gave [the power of death] to an innocent person, and his defender. The Pentateuch neither praises nor blames the action.' Bloomf.

29 Then fled Moses at this saying, and was a stranger in the land of Midian, where he begat two sons.

30 And when forty years were expired, there appeared to him in the wilderness of mount Sina an angel of the Lord in a flame of fire in a bush.

31 When Moses saw it, he wondered at the sight: and as he drew near to behold it, the voice of the Lord came unto him, 32 Saying, I am the God of thy fathers, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. Then Moses trembled, and durst not behold.

33 Then said the Lord to him, Put off thy shoes from thy feet: for the place where thou standest is holy ground.

34 I have seen, I have seen the affliction of my people which is in Egypt, and I have heard their groaning, and am come down to deliver them. And now come, I will send thee into Egypt.

35 This Moses whom they refused, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge? the same did God send to be a ruler and a deliverer, by the hand of the angel which appeared to him in the bush.

36 He brought them out, after that he had shewed wonders and signs in the land of Egypt, and in the Red Sea, and in the wilderness, forty years.

37 This is that Moses, which said unto the children of Israel, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear.

38 This is he, that was in the church in the wilderness, with the angel which spake to him in the Mount Sina, and with our fathers; who received the lively oracles to give unto us:

him as his crime, and threatening to accuse him for it, which was the hanging out of the flag of defiance to the Egyptians, and the banner of love and deliverance to Israel: hereupon Moses fled into the land of Midian, and made no more attempt to deliver Israel till 40 years after; he settled as a stranger in Midian, married, and had two sons, by Jethro's daughter, v. 29.

Now let us see how this serves Stephen's purpose. (1.) They charged him with blaspheming Moses, in answer to which he retorts on them the indignities their fathers did to Moses, which they ought to be ashamed of, and humbled for, instead of picking quarrels thus, under pretence of zeal for the honor of Moses, with one that had so great a veneration for him. (2.) They persecuted him for disputing in defence of Christ, and his Gospel; 'but,' saith he, 'you had best take heed,' [1.] 'Lest you hereby do as your fathers did, refuse and reject one whom God has raised up to be to you a Prince, and a Savior; you may understand, if you will not wilfully shut your eyes against the light, that God will, by this Jesus, deliver you out of a worse slavery than that in Egypt; take heed then of thrusting Him away, but receive Him as a Ruler and a Judge over you.' [2.] 'Lest you hereby fare as your fathers fared, who, for this, were justly left to die in their slavery, for the deliverance came not till forty years after.' Mat. 23: 38, 39.

V. 30—41. Stephen here proceeds in his story of Moses; and let any one judge, if anything could be spoken more honorably of him. Here is,

I. His vision of the glory of God at the bush, v. 30. Stephen notices this, and its being called holy ground, v. 33. as a check to those who prided themselves in the temple, that holy place, as if there were no communion to be had with God but there; whereas God met Moses, and manifested Himself to him, in a remote, obscure place in the wilderness of Sinai. Moses wondered at a sight all his Egyptian learning could not solve. He had the curiosity at first to pry into it; but the nearer he drew, the more he was struck with amazement. He trembled, and durst not look wistly upon it; for he was soon aware that it was not a fiery meteor, but no other than the Angel of the covenant, the Son of God Himself. Stephen was accused for blaspheming Moses, ch. 6: 11. as if Moses had been Divine; but by this it appears, that he was a man subject to like passions as we are; and particularly that of fear, on any appearance of the Divine Majesty and glory.

II. The declaration he heard of the covenant of God, v. 32. the covenant God made with Abraham some ages ago, I will be to thee a God, a God all-sufficient. 'Now,' saith God, 'that covenant is still in full force; and now I will make it to appear so;' for all the favors, all the honors God put upon Israel, were founded upon this covenant with Abraham, and flowed from it. If the covenant be good, then God will be a God to their souls, and is so now they are separated from their bodies. Our Savior; by this, proves the future state, Mat. 22: 31. Those therefore who stood up in defence of the Gospel, and endeavored to propagate that, so far from blaspheming Moses, did the greatest honor imaginable to Moses, and that glorious discovery God made of Himself to him at the bush.

God, in declaring Himself thus the God of their fathers, intimated his kindness also to their seed, that they should be loved for the fathers' sakes, Rom. 11: 28. Deut. 7: 8. Now the preachers of the Gospel preached up this covenant, the promise made of God unto the fathers; unto which promise, those of the 12 tribes, that did continue serving God, hoped to come, ch. 26: 6, 7. And shall they, under color of supporting the holy place, and the law, oppose the covenant which was made with Abraham and his seed, his spiritual seed, before the law was given, and long before the holy place was built? Since God's glory must be for ever advanced, and our glorying for ever silenced, God will have our salvation to be by promise, and not by the law; the Jews, therefore, who persecuted the Christians, under pretence that they blasphemed the law, did themselves blaspheme the promise, and forsook all their own mercies that were contained in it.

III. The commission God gave him to deliver Israel out of Egypt. The Jews set up Moses in competition with Christ, and accused Stephen as a blasphemer, because he did not do so too. But Stephen here shows that Moses was an eminent type of Christ, as he was Israel's deliverer. It should seem, though God is present in all places, yet the expression, coming down to deliver them, is used, because that deliverance was typical of what Christ did, when, for us men, and for our salvation, He came down from heaven.

IV. His acting in pursuance of this commission, wherein he was a figure of the Messiah. And Stephen notices here again the slights they had put upon him, the affronts they had given him, and their refusal to have him to reign over them, as tending very much to magnify his agency in their deliverance. Now, by this example, Stephen would intimate to the council, that this Jesus whom they now refused, as their fathers did Moses, even this same has God advanced to be a Prince and a Savior, a Ruler and a Deliverer; as the apostles had told them a while ago, ch. 5: 30. that the Stone which the builders refused, was become the head-stone in the corner, ch. 4: 11. For it does not at all derogate from Moses' just honor to say, that he was but an instrument, and that he is outshone by this Jesus, whom he encourages these Jews yet to elose with, and to come into his interest, not fearing but that then they should be received into his favor, and receive benefit by Him, as the people of Israel

Gr. Midiam: note, end of ch. Sinoi.] Comp. Ex. 3:1. 'Horeb': they were two peaks of the same mountain: note, end of ch. Ed.

V. 30—36. Some make the expression, that 'God sent Moses, by the hand of the angel,' an objection to the conclusion, that this was not a created angel, but the 'Angel Jehovah,' the Angel or Messenger of the covenant, the Word and Son of God, by whom He has always been declared unto men. Mal. 3:1—4, v. 1. John 1:18. But it only implies the distinct personality of the Father and the Son; and that the Son, having undertaken to become incarnate, always was the medium of communication between the invisible God and sinful man: and though He often appeared in human form, yet was He 'the God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob;' being One with and equal to the Father. 'It would be too frigid an interpretation to say, that the Lord called Moses by the ministrition of an angel; when, (unless I am deceived,) this also is signified, that Moses was armed by his hand and power, seeing that Angel, namely Christ, (as the apostle explains it, 1 Cor. 10: 9.) was the true Deliverer and Leader, whose servant Moses was.' Beza. (34) I have seen, &c.] This varies considerably from the Sept., Ex. 3:7. and also from the Heb. [for Stephen, of course, quotes from memory.] But it gives the general meaning very clearly. Scott.

(33.) 'In all ages, and among all nations, cleanliness [note, Ex. 29: 4.] in the celebration of sacred rites has been thought especially requisite; so it was usual to direct the shoes or sandals of the worshipper to be taken off, previous to his entrance into a sacred edifice.' Bloomf.

V. 38. Lively oracles.] Logia zōnta: 'As the subject is plainly the promulgation of the Law, by logia tou Theou (answering to the Heb. amroth rbay in Ps. 139:38 and 58. Num. 24:4.) are meant my divine oracles. See the examples in Raphael. Now this, in respect of the context, is to be understood of promises and divine precepts. They are moreover said to be zōnta, which Pisc., Alb., and Heum., explain delivered viva voce. But this signification is unauthorized. Others, as Heinrichs, explain zōnta, valid, strong, efficacious, quoting Heb. 4:2. where the apostle speaks of divine threatenings which will assuredly have their event, and in Soph., where panteia zōnta means oracles of certain fulfillment. Now zōn is, not unfrequently, used metaphorically of what flourishes, exerts its force, &c., and Morus would explain zōnta, 'efficacious for procuring rewards and blessings.' But there is no need to resort to any such ambages. Zēn is often, in the Sept. and N. T., equivalent to zoopoiein; [life-causing;] ns in 6:51. Heb. 10:20. where odos zōsa is explained by Theophylact, zoopoiousa, [life-making,] cis zēn ogousa, [leading to life.] And in Deut. 32:47. the Law is said to be zōt, salvation. Therefore logia zōnta, are most salutary precepts. Kuin. In this last mode of interpretation I must acquiesce. It had been long ago brought forward by Drusius, Beza, Vntabul, and Grot., (confirmed by the Vulg. "vivifica"); as also by Pearce, Valckn., and Schleusner. Now logion denotes an oracular response, delivered in prose; chrēsmos, one in verse. So Thucyd. The name logia came nt length to denote the Scriptures. So Procop., who mentions ta Christianōn logia. Id.

39 To whom our fathers would not obey, but thrust him from them, and in their hearts turned back again into Egypt, 40 Saying unto Aaron, Make us gods to go before us: for as for this Moses, which brought us out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him.

41 And they made a calf in those days, and offered sacrifice unto the idol, and rejoiced in the works of their own hands.

43 Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made, to worship them: and I will carry you away beyond Babylon.

44 Our fathers had the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness, as he had appointed, speaking unto Moses, that he should make it according to the fashion that he had seen.

45 Which also our fathers that came after, brought in with Jesus into the possession of the Gentiles, whom God drove out before the face of our fathers, unto the days of David; were delivered by Moses, though they had once refused him.

46 Who found favor before God, and desired to find a tabernacle for the God of Jacob.

47 But Solomon built him an house.

V. His prophecy of Christ and his grace, v. 37. This is spoken of, as one of the greatest honors God put upon Moses, that by him He gave notice to the children of Israel of the great Prophet that should come into the world, raised their expectation of Him, and obliged them to receive Him. When his bringing of them out of Egypt is spoken of, it is with an emphasis of honor, this is that Moses! Ex. 6:26. And so it is here, this is that Moses! Now this is very full to Stephen's purpose; in asserting [insinuating, perhaps?] that Jesus should change the cus-

V. 40. To go before.] 'It seems to have been the custom of the Oriental nations of antiquity, to bear the images of the gods [cuts Is. 46:1,2. Am. 5:26.] before the people in journeys or military expeditions, or in going out to battle; since thus, they imagined, they should more effectually enjoy their guidance, protection, and support. Num. 10:33. Deut. 31:8, 15. 4:3, 25. 3:21.'

V. 41. Calf.] Thinking (so Le Clerc) they were left to make their own laws, Ex. 33:1. the Israelites, after an Egyptian fashion, of symbolizing their divinities, [note, Jer. 43. end.] made this symbol of the true God. 'Under the figure of Apis, who was a bullock, [note, and cut, 1 K. 12:28.] the Egyptians worshipped Osiris, who formerly was an Egyptian king, and was supposed to have invented or introduced agriculture, horticulture, &c. That the ox, which among the ancients was a symbol of agricultural labor, was to the Egyptians a symbol of Osiris, we learn from Plutarch.'

V. 43. Tabernacle, &c.] Cut and note, Am. 5:26. to the ceremonial law, he was so far from blaspheming Moses, that really he did him the greatest honor imaginable, by showing how the prophecy of Moses was accomplished, which was so clear, that, as Christ told them Himself, if they had believed Moses, they would have believed Him, John 5:46.

He charged them, therefore, to hear that Prophet, to receive his dictates, to admit the change He would make in their customs, and to submit to Him in everything, as the greatest honor they can do to Moses and to his law, who said, hear ye Him; and came to be a witness to the repetition of this charge by a voice from heaven, at the transfiguration of Christ, and, by his silence, gave consent to it, Mat. 17:5.

VI. The eminent services Moses continued to do to the people of Israel, after he had been instrumental to bring them out of Egypt, v. 38. And herein, also, he was a type of Christ, who yet so far exceeds him, that it is no blasphemy to say, 'He has authority to change the customs that Moses delivered.' 1. Christ is the President and Guide of a more excellent and glorious church than that in the wilderness was, and is more in it, as the life and soul of it, than Moses could be in that. 2. Moses was immediately conversant with God, but never lay in his bosom as Christ did from eternity. Or, these words, v. 38. may be taken thus; Moses was in the church in the wilderness, but it was with the angel that spake to him in mount Sinai, that is, at the burning bush; for that was said to be at mount Sinai, v. 30. that angel went before him, and was guide to him, else he could not have been a guide to Israel; of this, God speaks, Ex. 23:20, and 33:2. And see Num. 20:16. He was in the church with the angel, without whom he could have done no service to the church; but Christ is Himself that Angel, which was with the church in the wilderness, and therefore has an authority above Moses. 3. Moses received the lively oracles from God, and delivered nothing as an oracle to the people, but what he had first received from God. It was the principal privilege of the Jews, that to them were committed the oracles of God: and it was by the hand of Moses that they were committed. As Moses gave them not that bread, so neither did he give them that law from heaven, John 6:32. but God gave it them; and He that gave them those customs by his servant Moses, might, no doubt, when He pleased, change the customs by his Son Jesus, who has received more lively oracles to give unto us, than Moses.

VII. The contempt that was, after this, and notwithstanding this, put on him by their own ancestors, v. 35. They murmured, mutinied, refused to obey his orders, and, sometimes were ready to stone him. They made a calf, as if that were as capable of going before them as he was. Observe, their secret disaffection to Moses, and inclination to Egyptianism, (if I may so call it,) were, in effect, turning back to Egypt, it was doing it in heart; many that pretend to be going toward Canaan, by keeping up a show of religion, are in their hearts turning back to Egypt, like Lot's wife to Sodom; and will be dealt with as deserters, for it is the heart God looks at. Now if the customs Moses delivered to them, could not prevail to change them, wonder not that Christ comes to change the customs, and to introduce a more spiritual way of worship.

V. 42—50. Two things we have in these verses.

I. Stephen upbraids them with the idolatry of their fathers, which God gave them up to, as a punishment for their early forsaking Him, in worshipping the golden calf. Comp. Deut. 4:19. with Jer. 8:2.

For this he quotes a passage out of Amos 5:25, as less invidious. Some think Remphan signifies the moon, as Moloch does the sun; others, take it for Saturn, for that planet is called Remphan, in the Syriac and Persian languages. The Sept. puts it for Chion, as being a name more commonly known. They had images representing the star, like the silver shrines for Diana, here called the figures which they made to worship. Lightfoot thinks they had figures representing the whole starry firmament, with all the constellations, and the planets, and these are called Remphan, 'the high representation,' like the celestial globe.

Now for this it is threatened, I will carry you away beyond Babylon. In Amos it is beyond Damascus, meaning to Babylon, the land of the north. But Stephen changes it, with an eye to the captivity of the ten tribes, who were carried away beyond Babylon, by the river of Gazan, and in the cities of the Medes, 2 K. 17:6. Let it not therefore seem strange to them, to hear of the destruction of this place, for they had heard of it many a time from the prophets of the O. T. who were not therefore accused as blasphemers by any but the wicked rulers. It was observed, in the debate on Jeremiah's case, that Mical was not called to an account, though he prophesied, saying, Zion shall be ploughed as a field, Jer. 26:18, 19.

II. He gives an answer particularly to the charge exhibited against him relating to the temple, that he spake blasphemous words against that holy place, v. 44—50. He was accused for saying, that Jesus would destroy this holy place; 'And what if I did say so?' saith Stephen; 'the glory of the holy God is not bound up in the glory of this holy place, but that may be preserved untouched, though this be laid in the dust;' for,

1. It was not till our fathers came into the wilderness, in their way to Canaan, that they had any fixed place of worship; and then at first it was but a tabernacle, mean and movable, speaking itself to be short-lived, and not designed to continue always, a tabernacle of witness only, or of testimony, a figure for the time then present, Heb. 9:9. 8:2. framed just as God appointed, and according to the fashion Moses saw in the mount; which plainly intimates, that it had reference to good things to come; its rise being heavenly, its meaning and tendency were so; therefore, since the case was such as to the temple, and as the Mexican idols (Humboldt), had the head of an ox. See Munthe's Bloomf. Ed.

V. 44—50. The language of their prophets, as well as the Bab. captivity, should have taught the Jews to expect, that the temple would be destroyed, whenever their presumption and rebellion provoked God to be their enemy. 1 K. 8:27. 9:3—9. Is. 66:1, 2. Jer. 7:1—15. The chosen race, Abraham and his seed, had served God above 400 years, before the law of Moses was promulgated, or the tabernacle erected; and Solomon's temple was not built till 480 years afterwards. So that nearly half the time, from the calling of Abraham till the coming of the Messiah, the true worshippers had served God, without the temple: and could those things be essential to true religion, which had not existed during so many ages? (49, 50) Heaven, &c.] The quotation is not made exactly from the LXX; (Is. 66:1, 2.) and it varies both from that and the Heb., by putting the last clause as a question: 'Hath not?' 'As Stephen had been accused of blaspheming the temple; he, with great propriety, takes occasion to speak of their sacred places with due reverence, as raised by special direction from God; and yet corrects that extravagant regard to them, and confidence in them, which the Jews were ready to entertain.

the patriarchs worshipped acceptably in the open air, it was no diminution at all to its glory, to say, that this temple made with hands should be destroyed, in order to the building of another made without hands; which was Christ's crime, Mark 14: 58. and Stephen's.

2. That tabernacle was pitched first in the wilderness; it was not a native of this land of yours, but was brought in, in the next age, by our fathers, who came after those who first erected it, into the possession of the Gentiles, into the land of Canaan, whom God drove out before the face of our fathers; and why may not God set up his spiritual temple, as He did the material tabernacle, in countries now the possession of the Gentiles? That tabernacle was brought in by those who came with Jesus, that is, Joshua, as, for distinction-sake, and to prevent mistakes, it ought to be read, both here and Heb. 4: 8. Joshua being named here, which, in Greek, is Jesus, by way of tacit intimation, that as the O. T. Joshua brought in that typical tabernacle, so the N. T. Joshua should bring in the true tabernacle into the possession of the Gentiles.

3. That tabernacle continued even to the days of David, above 400 years, before there was any thought of building a temple, v. 45. God had his heart so little on a temple, or, such a holy place as they were so jealous for, that, when David desired to build one, he was forbidden to do it; God was in no haste for one, as He told David, 2 S. 7: 7. therefore it was not he, but his son Solomon, some years after, that built Him a house. David had all that sweet communion with God in public worship, which we read of in his Psalms, before there was any temple built.

4. God often declared, that temples, made with hands, were not his delight, nor could add anything to the perfection of his rest and joy. And as the world is God's temple, wherein He is manifested, Rom. 1: 20. so it is God's temple in which He will be worshipped. It was therefore no reflection at all on this holy place, however they might take it, to say that Jesus shall destroy this temple, and set up another, into which all nations shall be admitted, ch. 15: 16, 17. And it would not seem strange to them who considered that scripture Stephen quotes, Is. 66: 1—3. which, as it spake God's comparative contempt of the external part of his service, so it plainly foretold the rejection of the unbelieving Jews, and the welcome of the Gentiles into the church, that were of a contrite spirit.

V. 51—53. Stephen was going on in his discourse, (as it should seem by the thread of it,) to show that, as the temple, so the temple-service must come to an end, and it would be the glory of both to give way to that worship of the Father in spirit and in truth, which was to be established in the kingdom of the Messiah, stripped of the pompous ceremonies of the old law; and so he was going to apply all he had said, more closely to his present purpose; but he perceived they could not bear it. If he tell them their power and tyranny must come down, and the church must be governed by a spirit of holiness and love, and heavenly-mindedness, they will not so much as give him the hearing. Probably he perceived they were going to silence him; therefore he breaks off abruptly, and by that spirit of wisdom, courage, and power, wherewith he was filled, he sharply rebukes his persecutors; for if they will not admit the testimony of the Gospel to them, it shall become a testimony against them.

I. They, like their fathers, were stubborn and wilful, and would not be wrought upon by the various methods God took to reclaim and reform them: but were enraged and incensed against them; Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost.

1. They resisted the Holy Ghost speaking to them by the prophets, whom they contradicted, hated, and ridiculed; this seems especially meant here, by the following explication, Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? Their fathers resisted the Holy Ghost in the prophets that God raised up to them, and so did they in Christ's apostles and ministers, who spake by the same Spirit, and had greater measures of his gifts than the prophets of the O. T. had, and yet were more resisted.

2. They resisted the Holy Ghost striving with them by their own consciences, and would not comply with their convictions and dictates. There is that in our sinful hearts, that always resists the Holy Ghost; a flesh that lusts against the Spirit, and wars against his motions; but in the hearts of God's elect, when the fulness of time comes, this resistance is overpowered, the throne of Christ set up in the soul, and every thought that had exalted itself against it, brought into captivity to it, 2 Cor. 10: 4, 5. That grace, therefore, which effects this change, might more fitly be called victorious grace, than irresistible.

II. They, like their fathers, persecuted and slew those whom God sent unto them to call them to duty, and make them offers of mercy. 1. What aggravated the sin of their fathers, was, that the business of the prophets they were so spiteful at, was, to show before of the coming of the Just One; to give notice of God's kind intentions toward that people, to send the Messiah among them in the fulness of time. 2. They, however, had been the betrayers and murderers of the Just One Himself, as Peter had told them, ch. 3: 24. 5: 30. They had hired Judas to betray Him, and had, in a manner, forced Pilate to condemn Him; therefore, it is charged upon them, that they were his betrayers and murderers. Thus they were the genuine seed of those who slew them that foretold his coming, which, by slaying Him, they showed they would have done if they had lived then; and thus, as our Savior had told them, they brought on themselves the guilt of the blood of all the prophets.

III. They, like their fathers, put contempt on divine revelation, and would not be guided and governed by it; and this was the aggravation of their sin, that God had given, as to their fathers his Law, so to them his Gospel, in vain. 1. The law is said, v. 53. to be received by the disposition of angels, because angels were employed in the solemnity of giving it; in the thunderings and lightnings, and the sound of the trumpet, Gal. 3: 19. Deut. 33: 2. Heb. 2: 2. This put an honor both on the law and the Law-giver, and should increase our veneration for both. 2. They received the Gospel now, by the disposition, not of angels, but of the Holy Ghost; not with the sound of a trumpet, but, which was more strange, in the gift of tongues, and yet they did not embrace it.

Stephen, probably, had much more to say, and would have said it, if they would have suffered him; but they were wicked and unreasonable men with whom he had to do, that could no more hear, than speak, reason.

V. 54—60. We have here the death of the first martyr of the Christian church; and there is, in this story, a lively instance of the outrage and fury of the persecutors, and of the courage and comfort of the persecuted. Here is hell in its fire and darkness, and heaven in its light and brightness; and these here serve as foils to set off each other. It is not here said, that the votes of the council were taken on his case, and that by the majority he was found guilty, and then condemned and ordered to be stoned, according to the law, as a blasphemer; but, it is likely, so it was, and that it was not by the violence of the people, without order of the council, that he was put to death; for here is the usual ceremony of regular executions,—he was cast out of the city, and the hands of the witnesses were first upon him.

Let us observe, here, the wonderful discomposure of the spirits of his enemies and persecutors, and the wonderful composure of his spirit.

I. See the strength of corruption in the persecutors of Stephen; malice in perfection, hell itself broken loose, men become incarnate devils, and the serpent's seed spitting their venom!

1. When they heard these things, they were cut to the heart, v. 54. the same word used

V. 51—53. The supposition [that he here broke off, as suggested in Henry] is the more probable, as Stephen began his defence in the most calm and respectful language, and touched on such topics, as were suited to conciliate and gain the attention of the audience: but nothing can well exceed the marked severity of his conclusion. Had it not been expressly stated, that he was 'full of the Holy Ghost,' when he spake it, many would have been ready to censure him: but probably he was sensible, that the council were determined on his death, out of desperate enmity to his Lord; and he was moved to bear this awful testimony against them, and thus to warn them against that destruction, which they were about to bring on themselves; without further respect to their rank, or fear of their vengeance; but not without tender compassion for their souls, as his dying prayer evinced. 'Stephen, fired with a divine zeal, at length judges those who sat in judgment on him.' Beza.

The crucifixion of Christ was the most flagrant violation of the sixth commandment, which ever was committed: and if David, having shed blood in war, or even having shed the blood of Uriah, must not build the temple; could it be supposed that the temple would be continued to those, who had shed the blood of the prophets, and filled up the measure of their crimes by 'crucifying the Lord of glory?' SCOTT.

(53.) Angels.] 'The ancient Jews believed that God, on all solemn occasions when He declares his special presence, was thus accompanied.'

V. 55. Standing, &c.] 'This does not (like the phrase sit at the right hand of God) denote the royal dignity and majesty of God, but (as is remarked by Oecumen., from Chrys., and other Fathers) the present and perpetual assistance of God. So Grot., Taylor, Doddr., Ros., Knappe, Kuin.'

56 And said, Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God.

57 Then they cried out with a loud voice, and stopped their ears, and ran upon him with one accord, 58 And cast him out of the city, and stoned him: and the witnesses laid down their clothes at a young man's feet, whose name was Saul.

Heb. 11:37. and translated, they were sawn asunder. They were put to as much torture in their minds, as ever the martyrs were put to in their bodies. They were filled with indignation at the unanswerable arguments Stephen urged for their conviction, and that they could find nothing to say against them. They were not pricked to the heart with sorrow, as those were ch. 2:37. but cut to the heart with rage and fury, as ch. 5:33. Note, Rejecters of the Gospel, and opposers of it, are really tormentors to themselves. Enmity to God is a heart-cutting thing; faith and love are heart-healing. Gnashing with the teeth is often used to express the horror and torments of the damned. Those that have the malice of hell, cannot but have with it some of the pains of hell. They cried out with a loud voice, v. 50. to irritate and excite one another, and to drown the noise of the clamors of their own and one another's consciences: when he said, I see heaven opened, they cried with a loud voice, that he might not be heard to speak. It is very common for a righteous cause, particularly the righteous cause of Christ's religion, to be endeavored to be run down, by noise and clamor; what is wanting in reason is made up in tumult, and the cry of him that ruleth among fools, while the words of the wise are heard in quiet. They stopped their ears, under pretence, perhaps, that they could not bear to hear his blasphemies; Mat. 26:64, 65. a manifest specimen of their wilful obstinacy, and a fatal omen of that judicial hardness to which God would give them up. Make the heart of this people fat, and their ears heavy; thus was Stephen's character of them answered, Ye uncircumcised in heart and ears. 2. They ran upon him with one accord; the people, and the elders of the people, judges, prosecutors, witnesses, and spectators, they all flew upon him, as beasts on their prey; violent, in haste, unanimous, one and all, envying him his composure and comfort in soul, with which he wonderfully enjoyed himself in the midst of this fury. They cast him out of the city, and stoned him; as if he were not worthy to live in Jerusalem, nay, in the world; pretending, herein, to execute the law of Moses, Lev. 24:16. Thus they had put Christ to death, when this same court had found Him guilty of blasphemy, but that, for his greater ignominy, they were desirous that He should be crucified, and God overruled it for the fulfilling of the Scripture. The witnesses against him were the leaders in the execution, according to the law, Deut. 17:7. and particularly in the case of blasphemy, Lev. 24:14. Deut. 13:9. Thus they were to confirm their testimony. Now the stoning being laborious, the witnesses put off their upper garments, and laid them at a young man's feet, whose name was Saul, now a pleased spectator of this tragedy; it is the first time we find mention of his name; we shall know it and love it better when we find it changed to Paul, and him from a persecutor to a preacher, ch. 22:20.

II. See the strength of grace in Stephen, and the wonderful instances of God's favor to him, and working in him. As his persecutors were full of Satan, so was he full of the Holy Ghost, fuller than ordinary, anointed with fresh oil for the combat, that as the day, so might the strength be. Now here we have a remarkable communion between this blessed martyr and the blessed Jesus, in this critical moment. Observe, 1. Christ's gracious manifestation of Himself to Stephen, both for his comfort and for his honor, in the midst of his sufferings; when they were cut to the heart, and gnashed on him with their teeth, then he had a view of the glory of Christ, sufficient to fill him with joy unspeakable; which was intended not only for his encouragement, but for the support and comfort of all God's suffering servants, in all ages. Lifting up his soul with his eyes to God in the heavens, in pious ejaculations, calling on God for wisdom and grace to carry him through this trial in a right manner; some think his sight was so raised above its natural pitch, by a supernatural power, that he saw into the third heavens, as Moses' sight was enlarged to see the whole land of Canaan. Others think it was a representation of the glory of God set before his eyes, as before Isaiah and Ezekiel; the heavens were opened, to give him a view of the happiness he was going to, that he might, in prospect of that, go cheerfully through so great a death.

He saw Jesus standing on the right hand of God, v. 55. the Son of man, so it is, v. 56. Jesus having taken our nature with Him to heaven, and being there clothed with a body, might be seen with bodily eyes, and so Stephen saw Him. When the O. T. prophets saw the glory of God, it was attended with angels; in Isaiah's vision, with seraphim; in Ezekiel's, with cherubim; both signifying the angels, the ministers of God's providence. But here no mention is made of the angels; instead of them, Stephen sees Jesus at the right hand of God, the great Mediator of God's grace, from whom more glory redounds to God than from all the ministrations of the holy angels. The glory of God shines brightest in the face of Jesus Christ; for there shines the glory of his grace, which is the most illustrious instance of his glory. Here is a proof of the exaltation of Christ to the Father's right hand; the apostles saw Him ascend, but Stephen saw Him there; and was abundantly satisfied with the sight. He is usually said to sit there; but Stephen sees Him standing there, as one more than ordinarily concerned at present for his suffering servant; He stands ready to receive him and crown him, and in the mean time to give him a prospect of the joy set before him. Nothing so comfortable to dying saints, nor so animating to suffering saints, as to see Jesus at the right hand of God; and, blessed be God, by faith we may see Him there. What was so cordial to him, ought to have been a conviction to them, and a caution to take heed of proceeding against one on whom heaven thus smiled; therefore, what he saw he declared, v. 56. If some were exasperated by it, others perhaps might be wrought upon to consider this Jesus whom they persecuted, and to believe in Him.

2. His pious addresses to Jesus Christ, v. 59. It is good to die praying; then we need help,—strength we never had, to do a work we never did; and how must we fetch in that help and strength, but by prayer? Two short prayers Stephen offered up to God, in his dying moments, and in them as it were breathed out his soul. (1.) For himself; Lord Jesus receive my spirit. We are here taught to resign our spirit into the hands of Christ, as Mediator, by Him to be recommended to the Father. It is necessary that we have an eye to Christ when we come to die, for there is no venturing into another world but under his conduct; no living comforts in dying moments, but what are fetched from Him. We ought to be in care about this while we live, that Christ may receive our spirits when we die; for if He reject and disown them, whither will they betake themselves?

(2.) For his persecutors, v. 60; herein following the example of his dying Master. Prayer may preach; this did so to those who stoned Stephen; and therefore he knelt down, that they might take notice he was going to pray, and cried with a loud voice, that they might take notice of what he said, and might learn, that what they did was a sin, a great sin, which, if divine mercy and grace did not prevent, would be laid to their charge, to their everlasting confusion; and yet, that, notwithstanding their malice and fury against him, he was in charity with them, and was so far from desiring that God would avenge his death on them, that it was his hearty prayer to God, that it might not, in any degree, be laid to their charge: it might teach them, too, that, though the sin was very heinous, yet they must not despair of pardon, on repentance. 'Do you think,' saith Austin, 'that Paul heard Stephen pray thus? It is likely he did,' saith he, 'and ridiculed it, then, but afterward he had the benefit of it.'

3. His expiring with this; observe, He fell asleep when praying for his persecutors; it is expressed as if he thought he could not die in peace till he had done that. It contributes very much to our dying comfortably,

V. 59. The prayer of Stephen was a most direct act of divine worship rendered to Jesus, appearing in human nature, as the Son of man, and attended by a vision of the glory of God. The word God does not occur in the original. To receive a departing soul to glory, and to pardon the guilt of most aggravated murder, are acts of divine power and authority; and it would be evidently most unreasonable, as well as unscriptural, to make such requests to any mere creature, whether present, or absent. (Mat. 9:2—8.) Indeed the Socinians are most grievously perplexed by this undeniable fact: after many other attempts to evade our inference from it, in which they have been evidently baffled in the argument; some very learned men have lately ventured to say, 'that the example of a man, in an ecstasy of devotion, and in the agonies of death, is not proper to be imitated by the whole church of God.' As if modern reasoners could better direct our faith and practice, than this apostolical Protomartyr, when 'full of the Holy Ghost,' when immediately favored 'with the visions of God,' and when replete with the very light, joy, and temper of heaven itself!—And let it here be observed, that we bring a very large number of positive evidences, to support the truth of this doctrine. If then objectors make very feeble efforts to invalidate the testimony of each of them, considered as detached from the rest, so that each still evinces the point in question; how very powerful must be the combined proof of the whole! For if twenty, or forty, or more, such texts were expunged out of the Bible, we should not want sufficient, yea, unanswerable evidence of the Deity of Christ. It is here also inquired, By what authority did the Jewish council put Stephen to death? In the case of Jesus, they allowed, that they had no such authority: and it is probable that their situation was still the same. (John 18:28—32.) Had they proceeded to pass a legal sentence on Stephen, they would perhaps have obtained permission from Pilate to execute it: but they stoned him in a popular fury, without any regular sentence, and the governor might choose to connive at it, as he did at some of their subsequent persecutions. (8:1—4. 9:1, 2.) 'The Jews were more than once ready to stone Christ, not only when by their own confession they had not power to put any one to death; but when nothing had passed which had the shadow of a legal trial. (John 8:59. 10:31. 18:31.)' Dodtr.—When the Jews would afterwards have put Paul to death, the chief captain and the governor hindered them: and yet, if he had been killed, it is not unlikely that the irregularity would have been connived at, had it not been discovered that he was a Roman citizen.

60 And he kneeled down, and cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge! And when he had said this, he fell asleep.

CHAP. VIII.

<sup>1</sup> By occasion of the persecution in Jerusalem, the church being planted in Samaria, <sup>5</sup> by Philip the deacon, who preached, did miracles, and baptized many, among the rest Simon the sorcerer, a great seducer of the people: <sup>14</sup> Peter and John come to confirm and enlarge the church: where, by prayer and imposition of hands giving the Holy Ghost, <sup>18</sup> when Simon would have bought the like power of them, <sup>20</sup> Peter sharply reproving his hypocrisy and covetousness, and exhorting him to repentance, together with John preaching the Word of the Lord, return to Jerusalem. <sup>25</sup> But the angel sendeth Philip to teach and baptize the Ethiopian eunuch.

AND Saul was consenting unto his death. And at that time there was a great persecution against the church which was at Jerusalem; and they were all scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judea and Samaria, except the apostles.

to die in charity with all men; we are then found of Christ in peace. He fell asleep; the vulgar Latin adds, in the Lord; in the embraces of his love.

CHAP. VIII. In this ch. we have an account of the persecutions of the Christians, and the propagating of Christianity thereby. It was strange, but very true, that the disciples of Christ, the more they were afflicted the more they multiplied. Thus in different ways and methods the Gospel was dispersed

PRACT. OBS. We should be ready to 'give a reason of the hope that is in us,' to inquirers of every description: this ought indeed to be done in meekness, and with cautious fear of disgracing a cause, which should be dearer to us than our lives; but we may confidently rely on the Lord to 'give us in the same hour what we should speak,' if called to answer for ourselves before the enemies of his truth. In all addresses to those who allow the truth of the Scriptures, we should call their attention to them, lodge our appeal with them, and thence deduce our arguments.—It is very lawful and expedient to express approbation of men's opinions, as far as consistent with truth, and even to avoid the mention of their more harmless prejudices; in order that we may reason with them from their own principles, and so oppose their erroneous

V. 60. The early loss of so eminent a minister of Christ, in this manner, must indeed have been a heavy affliction to the church; but how animated was his end! how suited to confirm the faith of the disciples! What an example also were his boldness and tenderness, even for his murderers! The instruction and encouragement of this single scene might produce the most beneficial effects on multitudes, and that permanently; even far greater, than the long-continued labors of many eminent ministers. Such in general has been the event of bloody persecution; and 'the noble army of martyrs' have done more, perhaps, towards the success of the Gospel, by their sharp but transient sufferings, than the whole company of those who have professed and preached the truth, in quiet times; and without being called forth, thus to show, in the fiery trial, the energy of their principles, and the power of divine grace, to the confusion of their enemies, and the encouragement of their brethren. SCOTT. Lay. 'Stēsēs, from istēmi, which, like the Heb. shql, signifies to try weight by the balance. The Jews (so Elsner) used to say, that the virtues and vices of all men would, at the last day, be cast into the scales of two balances, and they would be everlastingly happy or eternally miserable, as those or these preponderated. A dogma adopted into the Mahometan system. [Comp. Job 31:6. Ps. 90:8. and note and out, Dan. 5:27.]

BLOOMF.

Concluding Note. Madian, v. 29. Wilderness. Sina, &c. v. 30.] Part of this region is thus described by Laborde and Burckh., whom see. 'The route I followed, [from Sinai, E. then N. W. up Wady Sahal, then S. E. down Wady Cheick and Wady Zackal to Dahab, on the Gulf of Akaba, E. of Mt. Sinai, then back through Wady Zackal into Wady Cheick, then N. E. through Wady Safran to Akaba,] passed through a series of long ravines, [Wadys,] running in different directions. . . In Wady Cheick, in the middle of the valley, at the place called El Boueb, is an isolated rock, 7 ft. high. It is at an angle made by two turnings of this narrow and gigantic defile of perpendicular limestone, chalk, and granite rocks, at the point where its seclusion protects it from the rays of the sun, and the voice of man and the cry of the camel are reflected back in sonorous echoes. Our Arabs dismounted silently from their camels, and, approaching the rock, passed the right hand over its surface, smooth by the frequency of these touches, and then drew it back again to the forehead, crying out "El Fatha," the usual invocation during journeys and dangers of any description. Tradition relates, that Moses rested on this stone while yet a shepherd, meditating his projects of delivering Israel. Another version of the story makes it Mahomet's resting-place, while a camel driver; and here he is said to have composed some verses of his Koran. . . On quitting this passage, the traveller perceives Mt. Sinai, whose prominent point is overhung by Mt. St. Catharine, [the Horb of the SS. and a peak of Sinai,] which is more rounded in its form; [so that the burning bush, if in the top of Sinai, would ever appear also as on Floreb.] They were both then capped with snow. Crossing an intersecting ridge, we descended into Wady Zackal, a valley, which continues on to the gulf. Our road was the most singular that the imagination can picture. The valley shut in within a width of about 50 paces, by masses of granite, 1000 to 1200 ft. high, often perpendicular to their very tops, looked like a Cyclopean street, from which, on each side, seemed to be adjoining streets, all belonging to some ancient and abandoned town. The extraordinary shapes and immensity of the masses accumulated on the right and left, were calculated to terrify [Deut. 1:19] and almost to overwhelm the mind; an effect not a little augmented by the enormous fissures here and there, presenting huge fragments, tumbled from the mountain-tops. The silence around was that of the grave: the wind was unheard, amidst these almost subterranean passages, the sun touched with its golden hue only the most elevated points, every step and sound of our voice was reechoed. This curious passage leads among the nations, and, one way or other, Have they not all heard?

V. 1—3. I. Christ had told his disciples, when parting with them, John 16: 20. Ye shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice. Accordingly here is,

1. Stephen's death rejoiced in by many, no doubt, but by one in particular, and that Saul, afterward called Paul; he was consenting to his death, consented with delight; so the word signifies; hoping it would stop the growth of Christianity. We have reason to think Paul ordered Luke to insert this, for shame to himself, and glory to free grace. Thus he owns himself guilty of the blood of Stephen, and aggravates it.

2. Stephen's death bewailed by others, v. 2. Devout men, which some understand of those that were properly so called, proselytes, one of whom Stephen himself, probably, was. Or, it may be taken more largely; some of the church more devout and zealous than the rest, went, and gathered up the poor, crushed remains, to which they gave a decent interment; probably in the field of blood, which was bought some time ago to bury strangers in. They buried him solemnly, and made great lamentation over him. Though his death was of great advantage to himself, and great service to the church, yet they bewailed it as a general loss, so well qualified was he to be useful, both as a deacon and as a disputant. It is an ill symptom, if, when such men are taken away, it is not laid to heart.

II. An account of this persecution of the church, which begins on the martyrdom of Stephen. When the fury of the Jews ran with such violence, and to such a height, against Stephen, it could not quickly either stop itself, or spend itself. The bloody are often in Scripture called blood-thirsty; for when they have tasted blood they thirst for more. One would have thought Stephen's dying prayers and dying comforts should have overcome them, and melted them into a better opinion of Christians and Christianity. 1. As Christ often intimated, that tribulation and persecution would arise because of the Word; and particularly that persecuting Jerusalem would soon be made too hot for his followers, Mat. 23: 37. so here it begins, and many were put to death, for Paul owns that at this time he persecuted this way unto the death, ch. 22: 4. and ch. 26: 10. that when they were put to death he gave his voice against them. 2. None was so zealous, so busy in it, as Saul, a young Pharisee, v. 3. He made havoc of the church, did all he could to lay it waste and ruin it; aimed at no less than the cutting off of the Gospel-Israel, Ps. 83: 4. He was the fittest tool the chief priests could find to serve their purposes; he was informer-general against the disciples, a messenger of the great council, to be employed in searching for meetings, and seizing all that were suspected. Bred a scholar, a gentleman, yet he did not think it below him to be employed in the vilest work of that kind: entering into every house where they used to keep their meetings, or every house that had any Christians in it, or was thought to have. No man could be secure in his own house, though it is his castle. Both men and women he dragged along the streets, without conclusions and evil practices.—It is also profitable to recur to the first rise of those usages or sentiments, which have been warped or perverted. Would we know the nature and effects of justifying faith, we should study the character of 'the father of the faithful.' Jesus is the great 'Angel of the covenant,' who brings his people from bondage, through the wilderness to their promised rest; and all the scenes exhibited in Egypt, at the Red Sea, at Sinai, and in Canaan, shadowed forth his excellences and his glorious salvation. But any kind of false religion, or irreligion, however absurd, by which men rejoice in their own works and imaginations, is more suitable to the carnal mind, than the spiritual truth and worship set before us in the sacred Scriptures! SCOTT.

gently down to the sea-coast, to the palm trees of Dahab, which, without any assistance from cultivation, are constantly increasing in number, at a point where the sand and the rocks, driven down through the valley by the winter torrents, form a boundary to the sea. 'To the N. of Dahab (which is properly the Dizahab, Deut. 1:1.) is a bay, with good anchorage, except in N. winds. The plantations of date-trees (close to the shore of the low promontory) are enclosed by low walls, and have many wells of indifferent water, but are 25 ft. deep; and, 50 yds. from the sea, had the best water on any part of this coast. 2 miles S. of the date-groves, in shallow ponds, filled at high tide, salt is made, which supplies all the peninsula, as well as the fishermen, for curing their fish. Dahab is a favorite resort of the fishermen.' Burckh. Ed.

NOTES. CHAP. VIII. V. 1. The whole subsequent history shows, that a great number of believers continued at Jerusalem: though it is probable, that the most of those, who commonly resided in other countries, returned home at that time: and many others doubtless fled from the storm.—It is a very ancient tradition, that our Lord assigned 12 years after his ascension, for the conversion of the unbelieving Jews in Judea, saying to his apostles, Go ye out into the world after 12 years. It shows the reason, why the apostles continued at Jerusalem, while the rest of the disciples were scattered abroad, Whitby. As the Scripture says nothing of this, it is far more probable, especially after the command before given, (5:20.) that the apostles, considering the importance of their station at this crisis, and the necessity of showing both friends and enemies, that they were not to be intimidated; and, depending on special protection, acted as Daniel did on a similar occasion, and left the event to God. (Dan. 6.)—As the disciples had before lived in much harmony and comfort together, they would not perhaps have thought of separating so soon, if this storm had not arisen: thus the efforts of Satan and his servants were overruled for the promulgation of the Gospel; while the apostles were competent for all the work which was to be done in Jerusalem, and the persecution would not prevent, but forward their success. SCOTT. 'There now commences a new period of Christian history, in the first epoch of which (narrated ch. 1—7.) the Christian society consisted of Jews only, who had hitherto remained in Jerusalem. For although many of those who, on the day of Pentecost, had come hither from various regions, seem, after their return home, to have communicated to their countrymen some idea, however imperfect, of Christian doctrine; yet the apostles had hitherto continued within Jerusalem, nor had they yet taught in any other country. The congregation, therefore, at Jerusalem, was tolerably numerous; but it had not yet entirely separated itself from the Jewish communion; since we read that, during the whole of this first period, the apostles and all other Christians yielded obedience to the Jewish Sanhedrim, frequented the temple at the stated hour of prayer, and taught in it. In one respect only, was there seen any vestige of a private society, namely, that the Christians had their funds for the relief of the poor, the administration of which they committed to the care of seven persons, whom they called Deacons. Now follows Luke's narration of the further propagation and the fortunes of the Christian religion.' Ros.

2 And devout men carried Stephen to his burial, and made great lamentation over him.

3 As for Saul, he made havoc of the church, entering into every house; and haling men and women, committed them to prison.

4 Therefore they that were scattered abroad, went every where preaching the word.

5 Then Philip went down to the city of Samaria, and preached Christ unto them.

6 And the people with one accord gave heed unto those things which Philip spake, hearing, and seeing the miracles which he did.

7 For unclean spirits, crying with loud voice, came out of many that were possessed with them: and many taken with palsies, and that were lame, were healed.

any regard to the tenderness of the weaker sex, so extremely bigoted was he; he committed them to prison, in order to their being tried and put to death, unless they would renounce Christ; and some, we find, were compelled by him to blaspheme, ch. 26: 11. 3. The effect of this persecution. They were all scattered abroad, v. 1. not all the believers, but all the preachers, * they being principally struck at, and remembering our Master's rule, When they persecute you in one city, flee to another; they looked upon it as an intimation of Providence to them to scatter; their Master had told them that they must be his witnesses in Jerusalem first, and then in all Judea and in Samaria, and then to the uttermost parts of the earth, ch. 1: 8. The preachers were all scattered except the apostles, who, probably, were directed by the Spirit to continue at Jerusalem yet for some time, they being, by the special providence

* Was not every believer, v. 4. required to be, more or less, a preacher, and witness? See Note, Lu. 24:36—43. Ed.

V. 2. Thus honorably and publicly to bury one stoned by the council, as a blasphemer, and as such accused, was a very courageous display of faith, zeal, and confidence in God. It must also have greatly offended the persecutors; and, perhaps, served as a pretence for their subsequent violence. 8.

V. 3. 'It was the Sanhedrim's duty, to take care that no false doctrines should be promulgated, and to make inquisition after those who were introducing innovations into the church.'

V. 4. They that were scattered, &c. [Not the whole church of Jerusalem, or the body of the laity; . . . for what authority had they to preach the Word? but the hundred and eight that were "full of the Holy Ghost." Whitby.—The whole company, after our Lord's ascension, was about one hundred and twenty, that is, one hundred and eight besides the twelve apostles: but it clearly appears from the history, that the women formed a part of this number. After so great an increase of the church, as had since that time taken place, it may well be supposed, that many had been set apart for the ministry before the martyrdom of Stephen. So that, even allowing that none were scattered, except the ministers, (which is extremely improbable,) it is incongruous to limit the number in this manner.—'There is no room to inquire where these poor refugees had their orders. They were endued with miraculous gifts; and if they had not been so, the extraordinary call they had to spread the knowledge of Christ, wherever they came, among those who were ignorant of Him, would abundantly justify them in what they did.' Dodd.—Were then all the Christians endued with miraculous powers? or might none, who were not, declare, what they had seen and heard?—'Some difference may perhaps be here observed between euaggelizesthai [pron. euaggelizesthai] and kerussein, not in respect of the matter of their preaching, but of the manner of it. The latter doth generally signify a public, solemn proclaiming of Christ, as when a herald or crier doth by way of office proclaim anything: but the former imports no more, than the telling it, making it known; as good news is published, without the voice of a herald or crier, by all that have heard it, to all they meet with. Not that euaggelizesthai is never used of that public, authoritative proclaiming; for it is sometimes used of the apostles: and the word Evangelist is the name of an office in the apostles' times. But, I say, that sometimes, and particularly in this place, it may belong to whatsoever publishing the Gospel of Christ, and by whomsoever, i. e. by those who have no calling to it. For when the doctrine of Christ was first preached by the apostles, and a multitude of Jews and proselytes received the faith, and for doing so professedly, were presently persecuted and driven out of Jerusalem; it is not to be imagined, but that all, wheresoever they came, both men and women, published what they knew, both of the doctrine, and the miracles by which it was confirmed, and of their own sufferings for it. When of Philip, who was a of God, screened from the storm, and by special grace enabled to face it. They tarried, that they might be ready to go where their assistance was most needed by the other preachers, sent to break the ice; as Christ ordered his disciples to go to those places where He Himself designed to come, Luke 10: 1. They continued longer at Jerusalem than one would have thought, considering the command, and commission, to go into all the world, and to disciple all nations; see ch. 15: 6. Gal. 1: 17. But what was done by the evangelists whom they sent forth, was reckoned as done by them.

V. 4—13. The persecution designed to extirpate the church, was, by overruling Providence, made an occasion of its enlargement.

I. A general account of what was done by them all, v. 4. They went every where, preaching the Word. They did not go to hide themselves for fear of suffering; no, nor to show themselves as proud of their sufferings; but to scatter the knowledge of Christ in every place where they were scattered, into the way of the Gentiles, and the cities of the Samaritans, which before they were forbidden to go into, ch. 10: 5. Christ and his disciples had conversed much in Judea; so they had a foundation laid there for them to build on; and it would be requisite to let the people there know, what that doctrine Jesus had preached there some time ago was come to.

II. A particular account of what was done by Philip, the deacon, now advanced to the degree of an evangelist, which when he entered upon, being obliged by it to give himself to the Word and prayer, he was, no doubt, discharged from the office of a deacon; for how could he serve tables at Jerusalem, (as by that office he was obliged to do,) when preaching in Samaria? Now observe,

I. Philip's success. He came to Samaria, the head city of the country Samaria; it stood where the city of Samaria was built, 1 K. 16: 24. now called Sebaste, the same, so some, with Sychem or Sychar, where Christ was, John 4: 5. The doctrine he preached, was, Christ; he proclaimed Christ to them, so the word signifies; as a king, it is related, that "he preached Christ," it follows that he baptized also.—But of these other disciples, there is no more said, but that they passed along publishing this good news, the Gospel which they had received; but no mention of gathering disciples, or baptizing. Accordingly when there is mention of these very men, that, being scattered by the persecution, they spake the Word, or published the Gospel, the phrase used is observable: (11: 19. Gr.) the word lalein being known to belong to my way of reporting, or relating, by talk or discourse. And upon the success of this, through God's prospering hand, and many receiving the faith, it follows, that the church of Jerusalem sent Barnabas to visit and confirm them. Thus Apollos (18: 25) spake and taught exactly the things concerning the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John. Hammond.—It appears to me, that the remarks contained in this quotation, are suited to throw much light on a difficult and disputed subject. Whether the learned author's criticism on the original words be exact, or not; the difference between stately and authoritatively, as a herald, and by office and authority, preaching to regularly convened congregations; and simply declaring what a man knows of Christ and salvation, among relations, juniors, ignorant neighbors, or ignorant persons of any sort, without assuming any authority,* seems of great importance. No doubt, in this way, a man's sphere will often gradually enlarge, till he appears something like an authoritative preacher: but would it not then be proper, that pastors and rulers should send some Barnabas, to confirm what has been done, and to confer the due authority? and would it not be right, in this case, for the person himself to seek, from the pastors and teachers of the church, their regular sanction to his labors, now become more public, than he at first either expected or intended?—To authorize all who choose, without any human appointment, and in ordinary cases, to become authoritative preachers, seems a dangerous extreme: and to suppose that no man, in an ignorant family, or among poor children, or illiterate, neglected persons, may expound a chapter of sacred Scripture, or talk to them about their souls, except previously ordained to the ministry; appears suited to destroy all zeal in the laity for the success of the Gospel, and to prevent all communication of knowledge to a deluded and perishing world; except by those, who are so fully employed in their own several charges, as to have little opportunity of attempting anything further; and who are often restricted, by peculiar circumstances, from every exertion out of their own line and department.

V. 5—8. It is evident, that Philip the apostle was not here meant, for he continued at Jerusalem; and the mission of Peter and John to Samaria evinces the same: (14—17.) and as Philip, one of the seven, was the only person of that name, whom the historian had mentioned, * See Rev. 22: 17, 2d cl.

8 And there was great joy in that city.

9 ¶ But there was a certain man called Simon, which beforetime in the same city used <sup>1</sup>soreery, and bewitched the people of Samaria, giving out <sup>k</sup> that himself was some great one:

10 To whom <sup>1</sup>they all gave heed, from the least to the greatest, saying, This man is the great power of God.

11 And to him they had regard, because that of long time he had bewitched <sup>m</sup> them with sorceries.

12 But when they believed <sup>n</sup> Philip preaching the things <sup>o</sup> concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women.

13 Then Simon himself believed also: and when he was baptized, he continued with Philip, and wondered, beholding the <sup>p</sup> miracles and signs which were done.

14 ¶ Now when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John:

j c. 13:6. Re. 1 2 Co. 11:19. o c. 1:3.

men, and gave up themselves to the conduct and government of it: without scruple (though Samaritans); and, without delay they were baptized, openly professed the Christian faith, and were solemnly admitted into the communion of the Christian church, and owned as brethren by the disciples. Men only were capable of being admitted into the Jewish church by circumcision; but in Jesus Christ there is neither male nor female, Gal. 3:28. Hence it is easily gathered, that women are to be admitted to the Lord's supper, though it does not appear that there were any among those to whom it was first administered. All this occasioned great joy. The spreading of the Gospel in the world, is often prophesied of in the O. T. as the diffusing of joy among the nations, Ps. 67:4. 1

Thess. 1:6. The Gospel of Christ does not make men melancholy, but fills them with joy, if it be received as it should be; for it is glad tidings of great joy to all people, Luke 2:10.

2. What in particular at Samaria made the success of the Gospel there more than ordinarily wonderful. (1.) Simon Magus had been busy there, and gained great interest among the people. He had been a long time in this city, using sorceries; he had no design to reform their lives, or improve their worship and devotion, but only to make them believe he was some divine person, some great one. Justin Martyr says, he would be worshipped as the chief God. He gave out himself to be the Son of God, the Messiah, so some; or, to be an angel, or a prophet; perhaps uncertain what title of honor to pretend to; but he would be thought some great one. Pride, ambition, and an affectation of grandeur, have always been the cause of abundance of mischief, both to the world and to the church. What he thus assumed, the people all ascribed to him, from the least to the greatest; and to him they had regard, v. 10, 11. perhaps the more, because the time fixed for the coming of the Messiah was now expired; which had raised a general expectation of the appearing of some great one about this time. They said of him, this man is the great power of God; the power of God, that great power, so it might be read; that power which made the world. See how ignorant, inconsiderate people mistake what is done by the power of Satan, as if it were done by the power of God! Thus, in the Gentile world, devils pass for deities; and in the antichristian kingdom all the world wonders after a beast, to whom the dragon gives his power, and who opens his mouth in blasphemy against God, Rev. 13:2, 3. They were brought to it by his sorceries; he bewitched the people of Samaria, v. 9. with sorceries, v. 11. i. e. by magic arts doing many signs and lying wonders, which seemed miracles, but were not so; like those of the magicians of Egypt, and of the man of sin, 2 Thess. 2:9. When acquainted however with Philip's miracles, they saw plainly, that the one was real and the other a sham, and that there was as much difference as between Aaron's rod and those of the magicians.

Thus, notwithstanding Simon's influence, and the lothness there generally is in people to own themselves in an error, and to retract it, yet they gave heed no longer to Simon, but to Philip: and thus you see how strong the power of Divine grace is, by which they were brought to Christ, who is Truth itself, and was, as I may say, the great Deceiver. Let us not despair of the worst, when even those whom Simon Magus had bewitched were brought to believe.

(2.) What is yet more wonderful, Simon Magus himself became a convert, in show and profession, for a time, v. 13. He was convinced that Philip preached a true doctrine, because he saw it confirmed by real miracles, which he was the better able to judge of, as conscious of the trick of his own pretended ones. The present conviction went so far, that, [1.] He was baptized, admitted, as other believers, into the church, by baptism; and we have no reason to think that Philip did amiss in baptizing him; no, nor in baptizing him quickly. For, as great wickedness, before conversion, excludes not true penitents from the benefit of God's grace, so neither should it keep professing ones from church-fellowship. Nay, though he was now but a hypocrite, and really in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity all this while, and would soon have been found to be so, if he had been tried a while, yet Philip baptized him; for it is God's prerogative to know the heart: the church and its ministers must go by a judgment of charity, as far as there is room for it. It is a maxim in the discipline of the church,—The secrets of the heart God only judges. [2.] It lasted so long, that he continued with Philip, courted his acquaintance; and he that had given out himself to be some great one, is content to sit at the feet of a preacher of the Gospel. Even bad men, very bad, may sometimes be in a good frame, very good; and they whose hearts still go after their covetousness, may possibly not only come before God as his people come, but continue with them. [3.] The present conviction was wrought and kept up by the miracles; he wondered to see himself so far outdone in signs and miracles. Many wonder at the proofs of divine truths, who never experience their power.

V. 14—25. God had wonderfully owned Philip in his work as an evangelist at Samaria, but he could do no more than an evangelist; there were some peculiar powers reserved to the apostles, and here we have an account of what was done by two of them here,—Peter and John. If Peter had been, as some say he was, the prince of the

he was doubtless here spoken of. (6:2—6, v. 5.)—As Jesus had stayed two days among the Samaritans, and had mentioned them among those, to whom the apostles were to preach; (1:4—3. John 4:39—42.) the apostles do not seem to have hesitated about the admission of the Samaritans into the church, notwithstanding the bigoted enmity of the Jews against them.

V. 9—13. It is evident that Simon actually used sorcery, and produced many extraordinary effects by satanical influence, and not merely by human imposture.—Ecclesiastical historians have given us strange accounts of the horrid blasphemies, which this man propagated; but these seem to have been subsequent to the events here recorded.—Perhaps Philip exposed the nature and tendency of Simon's magical arts; or Simon deemed Philip a magician of superior skill and attainments, and hoped to get acquainted with the secret of his art, by which he produced effects, far exceeding all that he himself had been able to perform.—“Simon believed, also,” that this Jesus, who enabled Philip to do these things, was some power superior to any he conversed with. Whitby. Id.

(9.) Sorcery . . bewitched.] Mageuōn . . existōn: had [practised magic] exercised the magic art, and had thrown into amazement. Mageuēin is rare, but is found in Plutarch and Hippocrates. It comes from Magoi, the Magi, Mat. 2:1. In process of time the name was assumed by many who had little pretension to anything more than a similarity of studies, and (as Kuin. observes) the appellation was often given even to strolling quacks, who had some knowledge of natural philosophy and astrology, and abused it to the deception of the people [see Brewster's Natural Magic, pretended] to predict future events from the stars, to cure disorders by the recitation of certain formulas, and even by muttering certain incantations, to bring up departed spirits, and compel them to reveal secrets; as also by the repetition of certain verses, and the use of particular herbs, to terrify and drive-away demons. Bl.

V. 14—17. The apostles acted in concert, as a collective body; no one arrogating authority over the others, but every one paying a great regard to the determination of the whole company.—Without doubt, Peter and John were sent by the other apostles, partly that they might confirm the doctrine of Philip the deacon; and partly that they might establish a church in that city by apostolical authority. Beza. It is probable, that many received the gift of the Holy Spirit, by the laying on of the apostles' hands, and that, from among these persons, the ministers were generally selected, by those who were entrusted with that important concern. (13:1—3. 14:21—23. 19:1—7. 2 Tim. 2:1,2. Tit. 1:5—9.)—It may be supposed, that Peter and John ordained ministers in this city of the Samaritans. But it does not appear, that their laying of hands on some, that they might receive the Holy Spirit, after having prayed for the company in general that they might partake of these benefits, implied previous ordination.—The right of confirmation, as practised by many Christian churches, has often been and still is, spoken of, as a continuation of this apostolical imposition of hands, for the confirmation of new converts, by the Holy Spirit thus given to them. But it is far from evident, that this was done universally by the apostles, or by those who immediately succeeded them. As, however, miraculous powers, rather than sanctifying grace, were thus conferred; unless miraculous powers were now connected with that rite, the parallel must wholly fail. How far something of this kind, properly regulated and conducted, may be rendered subservient to the edification of young persons, descended from Christian parents, and baptized when infants, is another question: but to advance this observance into a sacrament, and even above a sacrament, (as it certainly is advanced, when the Holy Spirit is supposed to be conferred by imposition of hands, and by using words in prayer like those of Peter and John,) puts the subject in a very different light. Doubtless it was at first thus magnified, in order to exalt the episcopal order, to whom the administration of it was confined, as if they were entrusted with apostolical authority: but as miracles are out of the question, so to follow the apostles in faith, humility, diligence, in ‘preaching in season, out of season,’ in piety, and self-denial, is the only scriptural or adequate method of magnifying either the episcopal or the clerical office. Assuredly, as this matter is very often conducted, it must be allowed to be an evil; and it ought either to be attended to in another manner, or not at all.—It appears indisputable, that Philip was, before these transactions, a regularly ordained minister, or evangelist. (Note, 6:2—6.)

(14.) The apostles seem to have laid down a rule, that, after being baptized and catechized, the proselytes should have the imposition of hands, accompanied with prayer, in order to their receiving the gifts of the Holy Spirit. Hence in Heb. 6:2. we find mention made first of baptism, then of instruction, and finally of imposition of hands, the last in the primitive ages only, being done by the apostles; in process of time,

15 Who, when they were come down, prayed for them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost :

16 (For as yet he was fallen upon none of them ; only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus : )

17 Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost.

18 ¶ And when Simon saw, that through laying on of the apostles' hands the Holy Ghost was given, he offered them money, 19 Saying, Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost.

20 But Peter said unto him, Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money.

21 Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter : for thy heart is not right in the sight of God.

22 Repent therefore of this thy wickedness ; and pray God, if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee :

23 For I perceive that thou art in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity.

apostles, he would have sent some of them, or, if he had seen cause, would have gone himself, of his own accord ; but, so far from that, he submitted to go as a servant to the body, whither they sent him. Two apostles were sent to encourage Philip, and carry on the good work that was begun. Now observe,

I. How they advanced and improved those of them that were sincere. It is said, v. 16. The Holy Ghost was as yet fallen upon none of them, in those extraordinary powers which were conveyed by the descent of the Spirit on the day of pentecost ; they were none of them endued with the gift of tongues, which seems then to have been the most usual, immediate effect of the pouring out of the Spirit. See ch. 10: 45, 46. This was both an eminent sign to them which believed not, and of excellent service to them that did. This, and other such gifts, they had not, only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, and so engaged to Him, and interested in Him, which was necessary to salvation, and in that they had joy and satisfaction, v. 8. though they could not speak with tongues. The apostles conferred the Holy Ghost on some, not all that were baptized, and it should seem, on such as were designed for some office in the church, or at least to be eminent, active members of it ; and on some of them, one gift of the Holy Ghost, and on others, another. See 1 Cor. 12:4, 8. 14:26. Now, in order to this,

1. The apostles prayed for them, v. 15. The Spirit is given, not to ourselves only, Luke 11:13. but to others also, in answer to prayer, Ez. 36:27, 37. We may take encouragement from this example, in praying to God to give the renewing graces of the Holy Ghost to them whose spiritual welfare we are concerned for ; for our children, for our friends, for our ministers ; we should pray, and pray earnestly, that they may receive the Holy Ghost ; for that includes all blessings.

2. They laid their hands on them, to signify that their prayers were answered, and that the gift of the Holy Ghost was conferred upon them ; for, upon the use of this sign, they received the Holy Ghost, and spake with tongues. The laying on of hands was anciently used in blessing, by those who blessed with authority.

II. How they discovered and discarded Simon Magus, as a hypocrite, for they knew how to separate between the precious and the vile. Now observe here,

1. The wicked proposal Simon made, by which his hypocrisy was discovered, v. 18, 19. He does not desire them to lay their hands on him, that he might receive the Holy Ghost himself, but that they would convey to him a power to bestow the gift on others. He was ambitious to have the honor of an apostle, but not at all solicitous to have the spirit and disposition of a Christian. He was more desirous to gain honor than to do good. Now, in making this motion, (I.) He put a great affront on the apostles, as if they were mercenary men, would do anything for money, and loved it as well as he did ; whereas they had left what they had, for Christ, so far were they from aiming to make it more ! (2.) He put a great affront on Christianity, as if the miracles wrought for the proof of it, were done by magic art, only of a different nature from what he himself had practised formerly. (3.) He showed that, like Balaam, he aimed at the rewards of divination ; for he would not have bid money for this power, if he had not hoped to get money by it. (4.) He showed that he had a very high conceit of himself, and that he had never his heart truly humbled. Such a wretch as he had been before his baptism, should have asked, like the prodigal, to be made as one of the hired servants. But as soon as he is admitted into the family, no less a place will serve him than to be one of the stewards of the household, and to be intrusted with a power which Philip himself had not, but the apostles only. 2. The just rejection of his proposal, and the cutting reproof Peter gave him for it, v. 20—23. (1.) Peter shows him his crime, v. 20. He had overvalued the wealth of this world, and undervalued the gift of the Holy Ghost. He thought the power of an apostle might as well be had for a good fee, as the advice of a physician or a lawyer ; which was the greatest despite that could be done to the Spirit of grace. (2.) He shows him his character, which is inferred from his crime. This was such a fundamental error, as could by no means consist with a state of grace ; it was an incontestable evidence that he was yet under the power of a worldly and carnal mind. Therefore, Peter tells him plainly, his heart was not right in the sight of God, v. 21. We are as our hearts are ; our hearts are that which they are in the sight of God, who cannot be deceived ; and if they be not right in his sight, whatever our pretensions be, our religion is vain, and will stand us in no stead. Some refer this particularly to the proposal he made ; what he asked is denied him, because his heart is not right in the sight of God in asking it ; he does not aim at the glory of God or the honor of Christ in it, but to make a hand of it for himself ; he asks, and has not, because he asks amiss, that he may consume it upon his lusts, and be still thought some great one. He is in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity ; I perceive that thou art so, says Peter, v. 23. This is plain dealing, and plain dealing is best when we are dealing about souls and eternity. Note, It is possible for a man to continue under the power of sin, and yet to put on a form of godliness. I perceive it, saith Peter. It was not so much by the spirit of discerning, with which Peter was endued, that he perceived this, as by Simon's discovery of it in the proposal he made. The disguises of hypocrites many times are soon seen through. Now the character here given of Simon is really the character of all wicked people. They are in the gall of bitterness ; odious to God, as that which is bitter as gall is to us ; they are vicious in their own nature, Deut. 29:18. The faculties are corrupted, and the mind imbibbered against all good, Heb. 12:15. It speaks likewise the pernicious consequences of sin ; the end is other teachers obtained this power.' KURN. 'The several uses of imposition of hands are fully detailed in [my] note on 1 Tim. 4: f. Three in the O. T., 1, as a ceremony in prayer ; 2, in paternal benediction ; 3, in creating officers. And proportionable to them many more in the New : 1, for curing diseases ; 2, for absolution of penitents ; 3, for blessing of infants, or those that are to be baptized, to prepare them for it ; 4, in confirmation ; 5, in ordination of officers for the church. The three former cannot, the fourth appears to be here meant.'

HAMMOND. V. 18—24. Many teachers, and probably private Christians, wrought miracles, and spake with tongues, 'as the Spirit gave them utterance ;' but the honor of communicating those gifts, by imposition of hands and prayer, was, generally at least, restricted to the apostles. Simon aspired, with horrible pride and ambition, at equality with the apostles in power and authority ; while he meant to prostitute the sacred operations of the Holy Spirit, to gratify his love of filthy lucre, and of human applause ; and attempted to seduce the apostles to concur in the detestable sacrifice !—Whatever miraculous power of discerning men's spirits Peter might possess, and on some occasions exercise, he had no need of it in this case : but, perceiving the extreme wickedness and hypocrisy of Simon, he expressed his abhorrence of his money, and of his crime, in the most decided manner. This was not a wish that Simon might perish ; but an awful warning, that he was in most extreme danger of perdition, which he could not escape if he proceeded further in his present course. If he would then escape perdition, let him deeply repent of this most horrid wickedness, and pray earnestly to God, that this blasphemous thought of his depraved heart might be pardoned. For though 'all manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven' to the true penitent ; yet Simon's crime came at least so near to that against the Holy Spirit, which never can be pardoned, that it was a very doubtful case, whether God would ever give him true repentance.—Nothing can be more evident, than that the apostle here exhorted an unconverted sinner to repentance and prayer, yea, one who he feared had committed the unpardonable sin, though he did not look upon his case as absolutely hopeless.

—Credible historians inform us, that he retained a sort of profession of Christianity, which he distorted by the most horrible and senseless blasphemies ; and thus he became the founder of a most multifarious sect of heretics, who were long the trial and the scandal of the church.—From his infamous attempt, to bargain for the power of conferring the Holy Spirit, all mercenary contracts for church benefices, and other methods of turning the concerns of religion into a lucrative trade, are called Simony ; of which there have been, and are, a great variety of species ; and will be, so long as men continue covetous and ambitious, and verily suppose that 'gain is godliness.' It is, therefore, much easier to expose and declaim against such impious practices, than to find an effectual remedy for them.—Alas, Simon Magus has left far more indisputable successors, than Simon Peter has done : especially in that church which grounds its claims on succeeding to St. Peter's authority ; but not in that church alone.—'It' (the sin of Simon) 'struck at the very foundation of the Christian faith ; supposing that the apostles, and other Christians, did their miracles, by some higher art of magic, than that which he had learned ; and so they by the same art could teach others to do the same works for any other end.' Whitby. (Ex. 7:13,22,23.)—'They who buy and sell sacred things are the successors, not of Simon Peter, but of Simon Magus.' Beza.

SCOTT. (20.) 'There is no imprecation here ; the sense may be, Keep your money to yourself for your own ruin, not mine.'

bitter as wormwood. They are, too, in the bond of iniquity; bound over to the judgment of God by the guilt of sin, and bound under the dominion of Satan by the power of sin. (3) He reads him his doom in two things: he shall sink with his worldly wealth which he overvalued; Thy money perish with thee. Hereby Peter rejects his offer with the utmost disdain and indignation, and warns him of his danger of utter destruction if he continued in this mind. He shall come short of the spiritual blessings he undervalued, v. 21. Thou hast nothing to do with the gifts of the Holy Ghost, thou dost not understand them; thou canst not receive the Holy Ghost thyself, nor power to confer the Holy Ghost on others, for thy heart is not right in the sight of God, if thou thinkest that Christianity is a trade to live by in this world; therefore thou hast no part nor lot in the eternal life in the other world which the Gospel offers. Many who profess the Christian religion, have no part in Christ, John 13:8. no lot in the heavenly Canaan. (4.) He gives him good counsel, notwithstanding, v. 22. Those that have said and done amiss, must, as far as they can, unsay it and undo it again by repentance. He must pray to God, must pray that God would give him repentance, and pardon on repentance. Penitents must pray, which implies a desire toward God, and a confidence in Christ. He encourages him; if perhaps the thought of thy heart, this wicked thought, may be forgiven thee. There may be great wickedness in the thought of the heart, its false notions, corrupt affections, wicked projects, which must be repented of, or we are undone. The thought of the heart, though ever so wicked, shall be forgiven, on our repentance, and not laid to our charge. When Peter here puts a perhaps upon it, the doubt is of the sincerity of his repentance, not of his pardon, if his repentance be sincere. If indeed the thought of thy heart may be forgiven, so it may be read. Or, it intimates, that the greatness of his sin might justly make the pardon doubtful, though the promise of the Gospel had put the matter out of doubt, in case he did truly repent; like that, Lam. 3:29. If so be there may be hope. Simon was startled, and begged the prayers of the apostles for him, v. 24. wishing to have an interest in them, who, he believed, had a good interest in heaven. Yet while he begged of them to pray for him, he did not pray for himself; and, in desiring them to pray for him, his concern is more, that the judgments he had made himself liable to might be prevented, than that his corruptions might be mortified, and his heart, by divine grace, be made right in the sight of God. See Ex. 8:8. 10:17. Some think, Peter had denounced some particular judgments against him, as against Ananias and Sapphira, which, on his submission, at the apostle's intercession, were prevented: or, from what is related, he might infer, that some token of God's wrath would fall upon him, which he thus dreaded and deprecated.

Lastly, The apostles return to Jerusalem, when they had finished the business they came about; for as yet they were not to disperse: but though they came hither to do that work which was peculiar to them as apostles, yet, opportunity offering itself, they applied themselves to that which was common to all gospel-ministers, preaching on their way, as they passed through many villages of the Samaritans. Though the congregations were inconsiderable, yet their souls were precious, and the apostles did not think it below them to preach the Gospel to them.

V. 26—40. Here is the story of the conversion of an Ethiopian eunuch to the faith of Christ; by whom, we have reason to think, the knowledge of Christ was sent into that country where he lived, and that scripture fulfilled, Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands, one of the first of the nations, unto God, Ps. 68: 31.

I. Philip, the evangelist, is directed by an angel, where he would meet this Ethiopian, v. 26. We cannot now expect such guides in our way; but doubtless there is a special providence of God about the removes and settlements of ministers. He must go S., to the way that leads from Jerusalem to Gaza, through the desert or wilderness of Judah. Philip would never have thought of going thither; yet thither he is sent, according to our Savior's parable, foretelling the call of the Gentiles, Go ye into the highways, and the hedges, Mat. 22 : 9. Sometimes God opens a door of opportunity to his ministers in places very unlikely.

II. An account of this eunuch, v. 27. 1. He was a black, a foreigner, of Ethiopia; there were two Ethiopians, one in Arabia, but that lay E. from Canaan; it should seem, this was in Africa, which lay S. W., beyond Egypt, a great way off from Jerusalem. 2. He was a person of quality, a great man in his own country, an eunuch; not in body, but in office; lord chamberlain or steward of the household; and, either by the dignity of his place, or by his personal character, of great authority, under Candace, queen of the Ethiopians, probably successor to the queen of Sheba, who is called the queen of the S.; that country being governed by queens, to whom Candace was a common name, [so Pliny,] as Pharaoh to the kings of Egypt; he had the charge of all her treasure; so great a trust did she repose in him! Not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but some are. 3. He was a proselyte to the Jewish religion, for he came to Jerusalem for to worship. Some think he was a proselyte of righteousness, who was circumcised, and kept the feasts; others, that he was only a proselyte of the gate, a Gentile, but who had renounced idolatry, and worshipped the God of Israel occasionally, in the court of the Gentiles: but, if so, then Peter was not the first that preached the Gospel to the Gentiles, as he says he was. Some think there were remains of the knowledge of the true God in this country, ever since the queen of Sheba's time; and probably the ancestor of this eunuch was one of her attendants, who transmitted to his posterity what he learned at Jerusalem.

III. Philip and the eunuch are brought together into a close conversation; and now Philip shall know the meaning of his being sent into a desert, for there he meets with a chariot, that shall serve for a synagogue, and one man, the conversion of whom shall be in effect, for aught he knows, the conversion of a whole nation.

1. Philip is ordered to fall into company

V. 25. John was one of those, who formerly asked leave to call for fire from heaven, to consume certain of that nation; but his Lord had now taught him better things.

V. 26—31. Philip seems to have continued some time among the Samaritans, after the return of the apostles. He [the eunuch] had been to worship at Jerusalem; but it cannot be supposed, he had heard anything favorable concerning Jesus, from the priests, scribes, and rulers.—(26) Which is desert.] This may be understood either of Gaza, or of the road: but the latter is the more obvious interpretation, as more immediately connected with the context. (30) Understandest, &c.] 'Dost thou indeed understand, &c.'—Gen. 26:9. Sept.—The passage of Scripture was a difficult prophecy; and the question seems to imply surprise, that he should understand it, or select it. Id.

(26.) Desert.] 'I incline with some, to regard the words as a remark of Luke, and refer them to the desolated city, whether new or old Gaza, not to the road.' Bloomf. whom see. En.

(27.) Eunuch.] 'Not necessarily one mutilated: the word is from eunē, a bed, or couch, and echein, to keep, guard. In the courts of Oriental monarchs these were generally mutilated, hence eunuch came to mean such.' Bloomf. This abuse is not near so common in the E. as is generally thought, see Niebuhr. Id.

(28.) 'Schoettgen thus cites from the Rabbinical writings: "R. Joshua said, whoever was going on a journey, and had no companion, should study the Law." That Jewish students used to read aloud, appears from his other citations. It is not improbable, that the eunuch had heard of Jesus, and was now revolving the prophecy, and comparing it.' Kuin. Chariot.] Harna: 'Those of princes and heroes were not only contrived for service but ornament, being richly embossed with gold and other metals.' Potter. The Romans of the times of the apostles had many kinds of carriages among them; Alam speaks of one 'with two wheels, for travelling expeditiously, (called cisium.) drawn usually by three mules; its body of basket-work:' also of 'a larger carriage with four wheels, called rheda, sometimes adorned with silver: also 'an open carriage with four wheels, for persons of inferior rank, as some think.' 'In the war-chariots of the ancients, there were usually two persons, one who fought, and another who directed the horses.' 'The driver commonly sat behind the pole, sometimes dressed in red or scarlet, sometimes he walked.' 'The Roman magistrates, consuls, praetors, censors, and chief ediles, used the currus, (two wheels,) and the seal (made to fold up) on which these magistrates sat in the senate-house, the rostra, or tribunal of justice, was called curulis, because they carried it with them in their chariots;' cut 18:16. A cut is given from Pompeii, or Herculaneum, of a 'biga': also a 'triga,' and 'quadriga,' of those times. Ed.

30 And Philip ran thither to him, and heard him read the prophet Esaias, and said, Understandest thou what thou readest?

31 And he said, How can I, except some man should guide me? And he desired Philip that he would come up and sit with him.

32 The place of the scripture which he read was <sup>k</sup> this, He was led as a sheep to the slaughter; and like a lamb dumb before his shearer, so opened he not his mouth:

33 In his humiliation his judgment was taken away: and who shall declare his generation? for his life is taken from the earth.

34 And the eunuch answered Philip, and said, I pray thee, of whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself, or of some other man?

with this traveller, that is going home from Jerusalem toward Gaza, thinking he has done all the business of his journey, when the great business which the overruling providence of God designed in it, was yet undone. He had been at Jerusalem, where the apostles were preaching the Christian faith, and multitudes professing it, yet there he had taken no notice of it, and made no inquiries after it; nay, it should seem, had slighted it, and turned his back upon it; yet the grace of God pursues him, overtakes him in the desert, and there overcomes him. Thus God is often found of those that sought Him not, Is. 65: 1. Philip has this order, not by an angel, as before, but by the Spirit whispering it in his ear, v. 29. 'Go near, and join thyself to this chariot; go so near as that the gentleman may notice thee.' We should study to do good to those we light in company with on the road: thus the lips of the righteous may feed many. We should not be so shy of all strangers as some affect to be. Those of whom we know nothing else, we know this of, that they have souls.

2. He finds him reading his Bible, as he sat in his chariot, v. 28. he read aloud, for the benefit of those with him, v. 30. Perhaps the eunuch was now reading over again those portions of Scripture which he had heard read and expounded at Jerusalem, that he might recollect what he had heard. Note, It is the duty of every one to converse much with the Holy Scriptures, persons of quality and men of business; time is [the most precious of God's gifts,] and it is the best husbandry in the world to gather up the fragments of time, that none be lost, to fill up every minute with something that will turn to a good account. When returning from public worship, we should use means in private to keep up the good affections there kindled, and preserve the good impressions there made, 1 Chr. 29: 18. Those that are diligent in searching the Scriptures, are in a fair way to improve in knowledge; for to him that hath shall be given.

3. He questions him; Understandest thou what thou readest? Not in reproach, but with design to offer him his service. We should often ask ourselves, when we read the Scripture, whether we understand it or no? Mat. 13: 51. We cannot profit by the Scriptures unless we do in some measure understand them, 1 Cor. 14: 16, 17. And, blessed be God, what is necessary to salvation, is easy to be understood.

4. He, in a sense of his need of assistance, desires Philip's company, v. 31. He speaks as one that had very low thoughts of himself and his own capacity and attainments. He takes the question kindly, and makes a very modest reply, How can I? We have reason to think he was an intelligent man, and as well acquainted with the meaning of Scripture as most were, yet he modestly confesses his weakness. Those that would learn, must see their need to be taught, Zech. 4: 13. He speaks as one very desirous to have some one to guide him. Observe, He read the Scripture, though there were many things in it which he did not understand; though there are many things in the Scriptures, which are dark and hard to be understood, nay, often misunderstood, yet we must not therefore throw them by, but study them for the sake of those things that are easy, which is the likeliest way to come by degrees to the understanding of those things that are difficult; for knowledge and grace grow gradually. In order to our right understanding of the Scripture, it is requisite we should have some one to guide us; some good books, and some good men, but above all, the Spirit of grace, to lead us into all truth.

IV. The portion of Scripture the eunuch perceived, with some hints of Philip's discourse upon it.

1. The ch. he was reading, was, Is. 53. two verses of which are here quoted, v. 32, 33. part of vs. 7, 8.; they are set down according to the Sept., which in some things differs from the original Heb. Grotius thinks the eunuch read it in the Heb., but Luke takes the Sept., as readier to the language in which he wrote; and he supposes the eunuch had learned from the many Jews in Ethiopia, both their religion and language. But, considering the Sept. was made in Egypt, the next country adjoining to Ethiopia, and betwixt them and Jerusalem, I rather think that translation was most familiar to him. It appears by Is. 20: 4. that there was much communication between those two nations,—Egypt and Ethiopia. The greatest variation from the Heb. is, that what in the original is, He was taken from prison and from judgment, is here read, In his humiliation his judgment [i. e. chance of justice] was taken away; so the sense is much the same with that of the Heb. So that these vs. foretold of the Messiah. (1.) That He should die; should be led to the slaughter, as sheep offered in sacrifice; with what little reason then was the death of Christ a stumbling-block to the unbelieving Jews, when it was so plainly foretold by their own prophets, and was so necessary to the accomplishment of his undertaking? Then is the offence of the cross ceased. (2.) That He should die wrongfully; by violence, should be hurried out of his life, and his judgment shall be taken away; no justice done Him; for He must be cut off, but not for Himself. (3.) That He should die patiently; like a lamb dumb before the shearer, nay, before the butcher too, so He opened not his mouth; never was such an example of patience as our Lord Jesus was in his sufferings; when accused, when abused, He was silent, reviled not again, threatened not. (4.) That yet He should live for ever, to ages which cannot be numbered; for so I understand those words, Who shall declare his generation? The Heb. word properly signifies, the duration of one life, Eccl. 1: 4. Now who can conceive or express how long He shall continue, notwithstanding this; for his life is only taken from the earth? in heaven He shall live to endless ages, as it follows in Is. 53: 10.

2. The eunuch's sensible question on this, v. 34. He does not desire Philip to give critical remarks on the words and phrases,

V. 32—35. The Gr. tr. of the O. T. was first begun at least in Egypt; thence it had found its way into Ethiopia. Greek was understood by superior persons there; and from this tr., it is highly probable, that, without any other teacher, this Ethiopian obtained the knowledge of the true God; and thus became first a proselyte to Judaism, and then a convert to Christianity: what an abundant encouragement to translating, and dispersing translations of the sacred oracles! We may suppose, that [Philip] showed him the circumstantial and exact accomplishment of the prediction, in the Person, doctrine, conduct, sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension of the Lord Jesus; concerning whom it is most likely, that he had heard many disadvantageous reports, whilst at Jerusalem: and also the necessity and nature, the benefit and efficacy of faith in Him, as the Savior of the lost. 'It is probable, that it was in the familiar way of dialogue, . . . that Philip continued to instruct this stranger in the doctrine of Christ.' Campbell. (Note, 4.) 'Who can be named either of kings or prophets, to whom these things agree? No one truly.' Grotius de Veritate. Yet in his notes on the ch., this learned writer endeavors to interpret the words concerning the prophet Jeremiah:—(32, 33.) He was led, &c. From the LXX: the variations from the Heb. do not materially alter the meaning. Lowth tr. the Heb. of the clause here rendered 'in his humiliation his judgment was taken away,' 'by an oppressive judgment He was taken off.'—Man's oppressive judgment was, in our Lord's 'humiliation,' suffered to take effect, and God did not interpose to hinder it. [See on Zech. 6:12, &c. Ed.] Who shall declare the age of Him, (33) 'whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting?' Mic. 5:1. His race, who is the Father of the age, or world to come? Is. 9:6. His eternal generation? SCOTT.

(32.) See Hengstenberg on this of Is. and his tr. at Zech. 6:12, &c. Ed. 'Prophets, divine legates, and kings, were, by way of eminence, named worshippers and ministers of Jehovah.' By this appellation, therefore, Isaiah ch. 53) might, with propriety, distinguish the Messiah, who, we may observe, is here also described as a King (comp. 53:12); and thus the oracle of Is. (who lived at the Bah. captivity) teaches the same as the other prophets had taught. Now by David, and other meritorious leaders and deliverers of the state, much was to be endured, and a great conflict to be maintained, in order to remove all impediments thrown in their way by their enemies. Of the prophets, and divine legates, many had been persecuted by the hatred of the corrupt populace; nay, not a few had been put to death. (Mat. 23:34.) In a later age, however, the Jews represented the Messiah to themselves as a King, Prophet, High Priest. (See 1 Mac. 14:41, 47. comp. with 13 [?]:15. They regarded their evils and misfortunes as punishments inflicted by the angry Deity. (See Job 9:1.) They believed also that an innocent person would suffer punishment in the place of the guilty, and thus reconcile them to the favor of God. See Jos. de Mac. 1:17. Now the wiser Jews who were living in captivity were aware, that they had brought this calamity upon themselves by their own wickedness. Peculiar sacrifices had been offered up by them; and at that time they anxiously longed for some expiator, and represented the Messiah to themselves as the author of every kind of felicity; from Him especially expecting the restoration of true piety and religion; and therefore hoped also that he would expiate the sins of the people, &c. See Schoettg. Thus there is no reason to be surprised that the author of this passage, together with the other wiser Jews, should have come to the opinion that the Messiah would die, in order to expiate the sins of the people, (See on Luke 23:42. John 1:29.) and would, for their sins, suffer heavy afflictions; all which must take place till his kingdom were established: but that He would finally overcome these various calamities, reign gloriously, and that all the citizens of his kingdom would be most studious of piety and virtue. Comp. Joel 3. (Kuin.) I assent to most of these positions, yet cannot but except to the fundamental principle, which seems to refer the language of the prophet to the ideas and notions of the Jews of his time, but which is inconsistent with the full inspiration we are accustomed to attribute to this most distinguished of the prophets. BLOOMF.

The Sept. seem to have read [the Heb. a little differently from our copies], and Mich., Heusler, and Thiess, on the authority of the Syr. tr. the Sept. thus, "He opened not his mouth, since great was his misery." Thiess tr. also, "his judgment was taken away; He was condemned." I would however tr. thus: "in his humility, when his condition was exceedingly miserable, was his judgment. (i. e. He was condemned,) He was taken off, destroyed." Kuin. 'Doddr. says, to take a person's judgment is a known proverb for oppressing him. He also reand the idioms of the language, but to acquaint him with the general scope and design of the prophecy, to furnish him with a key, in the use of which he might, by comparing one thing with another, be let into the meaning of the particular passages. Prophecies had usually in them something of obscurity, till explained by the accomplishment of them, as this now was. Though the modern Jews will not allow it to be spoken of the Messiah, yet their an-

PRACT. OBS. The Lord does not want the services of the most eminent men: if He permit them to be cut off, when they seem scarcely to have begun their work, or if persecution 'make havoc in the church?' He can override these events to the glory of his name, and the more extensive promulgation of his Gospel. The glory of his grace often shines forth with peculiar lustre in our view, when we are informed of the manner, in which his most honored servants spent the years preceding their conversion. Wherever the true believer is driven, he carries with him his knowledge of the Gospel, as an inestimable treasure, not only for his own benefit, but to make others also truly rich; and in one way or other he will make known the preciousness of Christ in every place: for when a simple desire of doing good influences the heart, it will be found impossible to exclude a man from all opportunity of usefulness.—Facts authenticate the truth of the Gospel, when it is faithfully preached: and though miracles are no longer wrought, yet sinners are converted; and unclean spirits reluctantly quit possession of those, over whom they have long reigned with uncontrolled sway: and the Gospel brings with it substantial and permanent joy to every heart, house, village, city, or country, in which it is cordially received. But, whoever compares the juggles and ambiguous pretences to miracle, or extraordinary operation, that shrink from investigation, which every age produces and fosters, and then detects and despises; with the open, beneficent, incontestable, and disinterested miracles of Christ and his apostles, will easily discern the most manifest difference, or rather the most entire contrariety. The one can only subvert the credit or interest of designing men, and abet delusion, hypocrisy, or immorality; the other evidently tended to promote the best of all causes, even that of truth and holiness.—The abundant unction of the Holy Spirit divests men of their narrow and selfish prejudices, and teaches them to own all as brethren, who receive the Word of God, and to impart to them some marks, that this is one of the many passages of the O. T. in which it is not so difficult to find a sense fairly applicable to Christ, as to know which to prefer. His paraphrase of the next clause, differing little from Han. and Kuin., is: "Who can describe the obstinate infidelity and barbarous injustice of that generation of men among whom He appeared, and from whom He suffered such things." BLOOMF.

V. 36—40. The discourse of Philip, no doubt comprising abundant instruction, with animated exhortations and persuasions; and the prophecy as shown to coincide with its accomplishment in so wonderful a manner; fully convinced the eunuch, through the concurrent teaching and illumination of the Holy Spirit, that Jesus was the promised Messiah: and he was enabled to understand the nature of his kingdom and salvation. Accordingly, he desired to be numbered among his disciples. Doubtless Philip had shown him the nature of baptism, as the initiatory ordinance of Christianity. Men will form their conjectures, concerning the mode in which Philip baptized him, according to their different sentiments on that subject. History informs us, that this eunuch became a preacher of the Gospel, in Ethiopia and the adjacent regions; and there founded a flourishing church, which continued for several ages afterwards; and it is supposed, on very probable grounds, that cient doctors did so interpret it; and perhaps the eunuch knew it, and did partly understand it so himself, only he proposed this question, to draw on discourse with Philip.

3. Philip takes occasion to open to him the great mystery of the Gospel, concerning Jesus Christ and Him crucified. He began at this scripture, took that for his text, and preached unto him Jesus, v. 35. That is all the account given us of Philip's sermon, because it was the same in effect with Peter's sermons, which we have had before. The business of gospel-ministers is to preach Jesus, and that is the preaching likely to do good. Here is an instance of speaking of the things of God, and to good purpose, not only as we sit in the house, but as we walk by the way, Deut. 6:7.

V. The eunuch is baptized in the name of Christ, v. 36—38. Probably he had heard at Jerusalem of the doctrine of Christ, so that it was not altogether new to him. But, if he had, what could that do toward this speedy conquest of his heart for Christ? It was a powerful working of the Spirit, with and by Philip's preaching, that gained the point. Now here we have,

1. The modest proposal the eunuch made of himself to baptism, v. 36. As they went on their way, discoursing of Christ, the eunuch asking more questions, and Philip answering them to his satisfaction, they came unto a certain water, a well, river, or pond, the sight of which made the eunuch think of being baptized. The eunuch knew not how little a while Philip might be with him, nor where he might afterwards inquire for him; he could not expect his travelling with him to his next stage; therefore, if Philip think fit, he will take the present convenience which offers itself, of being baptized. Observe, (1.) He does not demand baptism, for if Philip have anything to offer to the contrary, he is willing to waive it for the present. The most forward zeal must submit to order and rule. But, spiritual good as they have opportunity and ability: for in these things, there is no room for competition, as no man is impoverished by others being enriched. Though simoniacal practices are everywhere exclaimed against, they almost universally insinuate themselves into all things relative to religion!—Commonly those who aspire to be the chief, have 'neither part nor lot in the matter;' for a proud and covetous heart cannot be 'right in the sight of God.' But when we most plainly perceive, that men are 'in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity;' and when we most solemnly warn them of their guilt and danger; we should still exhort them to repent of their wickedness, and to pray to God, if peradventure it may be forgiven.—Men often imagine that their thoughts are free, and have no sin in them; yet 'the thought of the heart' may possibly be so atrocious, as to exclude a man from repentance and forgiveness. We ought not to be discouraged, when called to minister in obscure places, or to few hearers: seldom was more effectual and extensive good done in the most numerous assembly, than followed Philip's preaching to one stranger in a desert: and implicit obedience and submission become the servants of God. Those who seek the truth will improve their leisure time in searching the Scripture; even when they have but small advantages for understanding it. But alas! how few of our nobles, and ministers of state, study that sacred volume, as they ride in their chariots! or willingly take long journeys to inquire after God, or worship Him! Surely this Ethiopian will rise up in judgment against them, and condemn them!—When God, by means of the Bible alone, excites serious inquiries after the truth; He will send an expositor to obviate difficulties and perplexities: thus while one society disperses the sacred Scriptures, another sends missionaries: both are needful, and there should be no competition between them, but most cordial concurrence in their most excellent designs. SCOTT.

he was endued with the miraculous power of the Holy Spirit, to qualify him for that service. SCOTT.

(37.) 'This v. is wanting in A. C. G. and very many other MSS., as also in the Syr., Arab., Copt., Sahidic, and Æth.; and in others there is much of variation and transposition. It has been, therefore, rightly thrown out by Griesb. and Matth.' Kuin. But Bloomf. would only include it in brackets. See Dr. A. C. ED.

(38.) 'It would be very unnatural to suppose they went down to the water, merely that Philip might take a little up in his hand to pour on the eunuch.' Doddr. But, though frequent bathing be a custom of religion in hot climates, and immersion be an old form of baptism, we know not if the 'water' was a pool, stream, tank, well, or fountain, or deep enough for immersion. And see Henry, with Is. 52:15. ID.

(39.) 'The most enlightened commentators are now agreed that εραπασε [tr. 'caught away'] may very well be understood of the imperative suggestions of the Holy Spirit, which Philip doubtless well knew how to distinguish from ordinary thoughts. Comp. 1 K. 18:12. Herodot. 4, 13.' BLOOMF.

1 Saul, going towards Damascus, 4 is stricken down to the earth, 10 is called to the apostleship, 13 and is baptized by Ananias. 20 He preacheth Christ boldly. 23 The Jews lay wait to kill him: 29 so do the Grecians, but he escapeth both. 31 The church having rest, Peter healeth Eneas of the palsy, 35 and restoreth Tabitha to life.

AND Saul, yet <sup>a</sup>breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, went unto the high priest,

2 And desired of him letters to Damaseus to the synagogues, that, if he found any of <sup>b</sup>this way, whether they were men or women, he might bring them bound unto Jerusalem.

3 And <sup>c</sup>as he journeyed, he came near Damascus; and suddenly there shined round about him a light from heaven:

4 And he fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou <sup>d</sup>me?

5 And he said, Who art thou, Lord? And the Lord said, I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest: it is hard for thee to kiek <sup>e</sup>against the prieks.

they went down both into the water, for they had no convenient vessels with them, being on a journey, wherewith to take up water, and must therefore go down into it; not that they stripped off their clothes, and went naked into the water, but, going barefoot, according to the custom, they went, perhaps, up to the ankles or mid-leg into the water, and Philip sprinkled water upon him, according to the prophecy which this eunuch had probably but just now read, for it was but a few vs. before those which Philip found him on, and was very apposite to his case, Is. 52:15. Observe, Though Philip had very lately been deceived in Simon Magus, and had admitted him to baptism, though he afterward appeared to be no true convert, yet he did not, therefore, scruple to baptize the eunuch on his profession of faith immediately, without putting him on a longer trial than usual. If some hypoerites crowd into the church, that afterward prove a grief and scandal to us, yet we must not, therefore, make the door of admission any straiter than Christ has; they shall answer for their apostasy, and not we.

VI. Philip and the eunuch are unexpectedly parted, presently; as soon as they were come up out of the water, before the eunuch went into his chariot again, the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip, v. 39. and did not give him time for an exhortation, as is usual after baptism; but his sudden departure was sufficient to make up the want of that, for it seems to have been miraculous, and that he was caught up in the air, in the eunuch's sight, and so carried out of his sight; and the working of this miracle on Philip, was a confirmation of his doctrine, as much as the working of a miracle by him would have been. He was caught away, and the eunuch saw him no more, but, having lost his minister, returned to the use of his Bible again.

1. The eunuch went on his way rejoicing; business called him home, and he must hasten to it; for it was no way inconsistent with his Christianity, which places no sanctity or perfection in men's being hermits or recluses, but is a religion which men may and ought to carry about with them into the affairs of this life. He rejoiced that he himself was joined to Christ, and had an interest in Him; and that he had these good tidings to bring to his countrymen, for he returned, not only a Christian, but a minister. Some copies read: And when they were come up out of the water, the Holy Spirit fell upon the eunuch, (without the ceremony of the apostle's imposition of hands,) but the angel of the Lord caught away Philip.

2. Philip, v. 40. was found at Azotus or Ashdod, formerly a city of the Philistines; there the angel or Spirit of the Lord dropped him, which was above 30 miles from Gaza, whither the eunuch was going, and where Lightfoot thinks he took ship, and went by sea into his own country. But Philip, wherever he was, would not be idle; passing through, he preached in all the cities till he came to Cesarea: there he settled; and, for aught that appears, had his principal residence ever after; for at Cesarea we find him in a house of his own, ch. 21:8.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—9. Mention was made of Saul twice or thrice in the story of Stephen; and now, not quite taking leave of Peter, henceforward the sacred penman is mostly taken up with Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles. His name in Heb. was Saul,—desired; his Roman name was Paul,—little. He was born in Tarsus, a city of Cilicia, a free city of the Romans, and himself a freeman of that city. His father and mother were both native Jews, therefore he calls himself a Hebrew of the Hebrews; he was of the tribe of Benjamin, which adhered to Judah. His education was in the schools of Tarsus first, a little Athens for learning; there he acquainted himself with the philosophy and poetry of the Greeks. Thence he was sent to Jerusalem, to study divinity and the Jewish law; his tutor was Gamaliel, an eminent Pharisee; he had extraordinary natural parts, and improved mightily in learning; he had likewise a handicraft trade, was bred to tent-making; which was common with those among the Jews that were bred scholars, so Lightfoot, for the earning of their maintenance, and the avoiding of idleness.

This is the young man on whom the grace of God wrought this mighty change, about a year after the ascension of Christ, or little more. We are told,

I. How bad he was, how very bad, before his conversion; not that he was a man of ill morals: as touching the law he was blameless; but he was an inveterate enemy to Christianity, a blasphemer of Christ, a persecutor of Christians, and injurious to both, 1 Tim. 1:13. And so ill informed was his conscience, that he thought he ought to do what he did against the name of Christ, ch. 26:9. and that he did God service in it, as was foretold, John 16:2. His breathing out threatenings and slaughter intimates, that it was natural to him, and his constant business, that he still persisted in it; though it intimates, also, that he shall shortly be of another mind. To Damaseus was the Gospel now lately carried, by those that fled from the persecution at Stephen's death, who thought to be safe and quiet there, and were connived at by those in power there: but Saul cannot be easy if he knows a Christian is quiet; so resolves to give them disturbance, and applies himself to the high priest for a commission, v. 1. to go to Damascus, v. 2. The high priest was forward enough to do it; but it seems the young persecutor drove more furiously than the old one. Leaders in sin are the worst of sinners: and the proselytes which the Scribes and Pharisees make, often prove seven times more the children of hell than themselves. He saith, ch. 22:5. that this commission was had from the whole estate of the elders: and proud enough this furious bigot was, to have a commission to him directed, with the seal of the great Sanhedrim affixed.

Now the commission was, to empower him to inquire among the synagogues, or congregations, of the Jews at Damascus, whether any that belonged to them inclined to favor this new sect or heresy, that believed in Christ; and if he found any such, whether men or women, to bring them up prisoners to Jerusalem, to be proceeded against according to law, by the great council there. The high priest and Sanhedrim claimed a power over the Jews in all countries, and had a deference paid to their authority in matters of religion, by all their synagogues, even those that were not of the jurisdiction of the civil government of the Jewish nation.—And such a sovereignty the Roman pontiff now claims, as the Jewish pontiff then did, though he has not so much to show for it. By this commission, all that worshipped God in the way they called heresy, though agreeing exactly with the original institutes, even of the Jewish church, whether men or women, were to be persecuted. Thus was Saul employed when the grace of God wrought that great change in him. Let not us then despair of renewing grace for the conversion of the greatest sinners; nor let such despair of the pardoning mercy of God for the greatest sin; for Paul himself obtained mercy, that he might be a monument, 1 Tim. 1:13.

II. How suddenly and strangely a blessed change was wrought in him, not in the use of any ordinary means, but by miracles. The conversion of Paul is one of the wonders of the church.

1. He was near Damascus, almost at his journey's end, ready to enter the city, the chief city of Syria. Damascus had been infamous for persecuting God's people formerly, Amos 1:3. and now it was likely to be so again. The cruel edict and decree he had with him drew near to be put in execution; and now it was happily prevented. Christ has many ways of delivering the godly out of temptation, and sometimes does it by a change wrought in their persecutors, either restraining their wrathful spirits, Ps. 76:10. and mollifying them for a time, as the O. T. Saul, who relented toward David was an excellent harbor here, made by Herod; and after the destruction of Jerusalem it became the capital of the whole land of Judea. It must be always distinguished from Cesarea Philippi, which was an inland town not far from the springs of the Jordan. Whenever the word Cesarea occurs, without Philippi, the former is intended. As Philip preached in all the cities of Palestine till he came to Cesarea, he must have preached in the different cities of the Philistine country, Ashdod, Akkaren, and Jamnia, and also in the principal parts of Samaria; as these lay in his way from Gaza to Cesarea.

more than once, 1 S. 24:16. 26:21. or, renewing their spirits, and fixing on them durable impressions, as on the N. T. Saul, here. It was also a very great mercy to Saul himself, to be hindered from executing his wicked design, in which, if he had now proceeded, perhaps it had been the filling up of the measure of his iniquity. It is to be valued as a signal token of the divine favor, if God, either by the inward operations of his grace, or the outward occurrences of his providence, prevent us from prosecuting and executing a sinful purpose, 1 S. 25:32.

2. The appearance of Christ to him, in his glory; here it is only said, that there shined round about him a light from heaven; but it appears by what follows, v. 17. that the Lord Jesus was in this light, and appeared to him by the way. He saw that Just One, ch. 22:14. and see ch. 26:13. It is not inconsistent with what is said of the heavens' receiving Christ till the end of time, ch. 3:21. to suppose that He did, on such an extraordinary occasion as this, make a personal visit, but a very short one, to this lower world; it was necessary to Paul's being an apostle, that he should have seen the Lord, and so he did, 1 Cor. 9:1. 15:8. This light shined on him suddenly, when Paul never thought of any such thing, and without any previous warning. It shone round about him, on every side; and this was designed not only to startle him, and awaken his attention, for well may he expect to hear, when he is thus made to see something very extraordinary, but to signify the enlightening of his understanding with the knowledge of Christ. The first thing in this new creation, as in that of the world, is, light, 2 Cor. 4:6. Hence all Christians are said to be children of the light and of the day, Eph. 5:8.

3. The arresting of Saul, and his detachment; He fell to the earth, v. 4. Some think he was on foot, and that this light, which perhaps was accompanied with a thunder clap, so terrified him, that he fell on his face, usually a posture of adoration, but here of astonishment; but probably he was mounted, for he was now in a public post, in haste, and the journey was long, so it is not likely he should travel on foot. Being by the fall taken into custody, and as it were set to the bar, he heard a voice, (distinguishing to him only, for those with him heard a sound, v. 7. yet knew not the words,) ch. 22:9. the voice of Christ, ch. 22:14. Then the Word we hear is likely to profit us, when we hear it as the voice of Christ, 1 Thess. 2:13. No voice but his can reach the heart. He was called twice by his name, which brought the conviction home to his conscience, and put it past dispute to whom the voice spake this. Some think, allusion is had to Saul, David's persecutor. Calling him by name, intimates Christ's particular regard to him, Is. 45:4. Ez. 33:12. also Saul's deep sleep in sin. It is like Martha, Martha, Luke 10:41. or Simon, Simon, Luke 22:31. or O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, Mat. 23:37. He speaks to him as to one in imminent danger, at the pit's brink, and just ready to drop in, 'Saul, Saul, dost thou know whither thou art going, and what thou art doing?'

4. The charge against him, is, Why persecutest thou Me? Observe here, Before Saul was made a saint, he is made to see himself a sinner, a great sinner, a sinner against Christ. A humbling conviction of sin is the first step towards a saving conversion from sin. He is convinced of one particular sin, persecution, which he was most notoriously guilty of, and had justified himself in, and thereby way is made for his conviction of all the rest. It is a very affectionate expostulation, enough to melt a heart of stone. Observe, 1st. The person sinning; 'It is thou; not one of the ignorant, rude, unthinking crowd, but thou, that hast a learned education, and the knowledge of the Scriptures, which, if duly considered, would show thee the folly of it. It is worse in thee than in another.' 2dly. The person sinned against; 'It is I, who never did thee any harm, who came from heaven to earth to do thee good; who was not long since crucified for thee; and was not that enough, but must I afresh be crucified by thee?' 3dly. The kind and continuance of the sin. It was persecution, and he was at this time engaged in it; 'Not only thou hast persecuted, but thou persecutest, thou persistest in it.' They that are designing mischief, are, in God's account, doing mischief. 4thly. The question put to him on it; 'Why dost thou do it?' It is complaining language. 'Why dealest thou unjustly, thus unkindly, with my disciples?' Christ never complained so much of those who persecuted Him in his own person, as here of those who persecuted Him in his followers. It is convincing language, 'Canst thou give any good reason for it?' Why persecutest thou Me? He thought he was persecuting only a company of poor, weak, silly people, that were an offence and eye-sore to the Pharisees, little imagining that it was One in heaven that he was all this while insulting; for surely if he had known, he would not have persecuted the Lord of glory. Those who persecute the saints, persecute Christ Himself, and He takes what is done against them as done against Himself, and accordingly will be the judgment in the great day, Mat. 25:45.

5. Saul's question on his indictment, and the reply to it, v. 5. The name of Jesus he knew, but little did he think to hear it from heaven, or from the midst of such a glory as now shone round about him. Christ brings souls into fellowship with Himself, by manifesting Himself to them. He said, I am Jesus, a Savior, I am Jesus of Nazareth, so it is, ch. 22:8. Saul used to call Him so when he blasphemed Him; 'I am that very Jesus whom thou usedst to call in scorn Jesus of Nazareth: that Jesus whom thou persecutest, and therefore it is at thy peril if thou persist in this wicked course.' There is nothing more effectual to awaken and humble the soul than to see sin to be against Christ, an affront to Him, and a contradiction to his designs. Observe, how gentle his reproof; It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks, or goads; to spurn at the spur. Those kick at the goad, that stifle and smother the convictions of conscience, that rebel against God's truths and laws, that quarrel with his providences, and that persecute and oppose his ministers, because they reprove them, and their words are as goads and as nails.

6. His surrender of himself to the Lord Jesus, at length, v. 6. See here, (1.) The frame and temper he was in. He trembled as one in a great fright. Strong convictions set home by the blessed Spirit, will make an awakened soul tremble. How can those but tremble, that are made to see the eternal God provoked against them, the whole creation at war with them, and their own souls on the brink of ruin! He was astonished, filled with amazement, as one brought into a new world, that knew not where he was. The convincing, converting work of Christ, is astonishing to the awakened soul, and fills it with admiration. 'What is this that God has done with me, and what will He do?' (2.) His address to Jesus Christ, in this frame; Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do? Which may be taken, [1.] As a serious request for Christ's teachings. A serious desire to be instructed by Christ in the way of salvation, is an evidence of a good work begun in the soul. Or, [2.] As a sincere resignation of himself to the conduct and government of the Lord Jesus. This was the first word that grace spake in Paul, and with this began a spiritual life. Note, The great change in conversion is wrought on the will, and consists in the resignation of that to the will of Christ. (3.) The general direction Christ gave him, in answer to this; Arise, go into the city of Damascus, which thou art now near to, and it shall be told thee what thou must do. It is encouragement enough to have further instruction promised him. Christ manifests Himself to his people by degrees; and both what He does, and would have them to do, though they know not now, they shall know hereafter.

7. His fellow-travellers fell to the earth, as he did, but rose without being bidden, which he did not, for he lay under a heavier load; but when up, (1.) They stood speechless, as men in confusion, and that was all, v. 7. They were going on the same wicked errand he was, and, perhaps, to the best of their power, were as spiteful as he; yet we do not find that any of them were converted, though they saw the light, and were struck down, and dumb, by it. No external

V. 7. We find from the account [Paul] afterwards repeatedly gave of this transaction, that much more passed between the Lord and him, than is here recorded. 22:14-16. 26:16-18. 1 Cor. 15:3-11. SCOTT.

V. 8, 9. This effect [blindness] proved the whole transaction to have been a reality, and not merely an illusion of the imagination. It is impossible to describe what Saul thought, felt, and experienced, during this awful and important interval [of 3 days.] There is, however, abundant reason to conclude, that the Holy Spirit enlightened his mind, at this time, with a just view of the divine law, in its spirituality and excellency; and thus showed him the worthlessness of his pharisaical righteousness; and his exceedingly heinous guilt, not only in persecuting the Messiah, in his followers, but also in his whole conduct, and the state of his heart. This seems to be intimated in some parts of his epistles; and indeed was essentially necessary to a right understanding of that Gospel, which he was to spend the rest of his life in preaching. Rom. 7:9-12. Gal. 1:11-24. 2:17-21.—With this narrative in view, can we wonder, that one, thus 'saved by grace,' and made an apostle, at the very moment when he might most justly have been sent down 'quick into hell,' should especially delight in expatiating on the divine sovereignty, [48] and on the riches and freeness of 'the grace of our God and Savior,' in saving his chosen people? The same doctrines may be distinctly traced in the other parts of Scripture, and abundantly proved from them: but this apostle, snatched as a brand from the burning, and rejoicing with most grateful exultation in his stupendous deliverance and astonishing felicity, with a noble, but highly rational enthusiasm, delights in recurring to the source of all his hopes and joys, and in calling on his brethren, to ascribe unreservedly all the glory of their salvation to God alone. Were our humiliation equally deep, and our views of the way in which we have been 'called out of darkness into marvellous light,' as distinct as his were; few objections to these doctrines, or difficulties concerning them, would trouble our minds: and we should soon perceive the holy tendency and efficacy of them. (8) They led him by the hand.] This seems to imply, they were on foot, and not riding, as generally pictured. SC.

(8.) This blindness seems to have been inflicted, to typify to Paul the ignorance of his former state, and by withdrawing his attention from external objects, and turning his thoughts inward, to favor self-examination and promote repentance. We may suppose, too, that the scals, v. 18. were to make his blindness more manifest to others. BLOOM.

10 ¶ And there was a certain disciple at Damascus, named <sup>h</sup> Ananias; and to him said the Lord in a vision, Ananias. And he said, Behold, <sup>i</sup> I am here, Lord.

11 And the Lord said unto him, Arise, and go into the street which is called Straight, and inquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul of Tarsus: for behold, he prayeth, 12 And hath seen in a vision a man named Ananias coming in, and putting his hand on him, that he might receive his sight.

13 Then Ananias answered, Lord, I have heard by many of this <sup>i</sup> man, how much evil he hath done to thy saints at Jerusalem:

14 And here he <sup>j</sup> hath authority from the chief priests to bind all that call <sup>k</sup> on thy name.

15 But the Lord said unto him, Go thy way: for <sup>l</sup> he is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before <sup>m</sup> the Gentiles, and <sup>n</sup> kings, and the <sup>o</sup> children of Israel.

16 For I will shew him how great things he must suffer <sup>p</sup> for my name's sake.

17 And Ananias went his way, and entered into the house; and putting <sup>q</sup> his hands on him, said, Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and <sup>r</sup> be filled with the Holy Ghost.

18 And immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales; and he received sight forthwith, and arose, and was baptized:

means will, of themselves, change the soul, without the Spirit and grace of God, which distinguishes between some and others: among these that journeyed together, one is taken, and the others left. They stood speechless, but none of God's children are born dumb. (2.) They heard a voice, but saw no man; they heard Paul speak, but saw not Him to whom he spake, nor heard distinctly what was said to him; which reconciles it with ch. 22: 9. They saw the light, and were afraid; which they might do, and yet see no man in the light, as Paul did; and they heard not the voice of Him that spake to Paul, so as to understand what He said, though they did hear a confused noise. Thus they who came hither to be the instruments of Paul's rage against the church, serve for witnesses of the power of God over him.

8. Saul's condition after this, v. 8, 9. (1.) He arose from the earth, when Christ bid him, but, probably, not without help, the vision had made him so faint and weak; like Daniel, when, on the sight of a vision, no strength remained in him, Dan. 10:16, 17. (2.) When his eyes were opened, he found that his sight was gone, and he saw no man, none of the men that were with him, and began now to be busy about him. It was not so much this glaring light, that, by dazzling his eyes, had dimmed them; for then those with him would have lost their sight too; but it was a sight of Christ. Thus a believing sight of the glory of God, in the face of Christ, dazzles the eyes to all things here below. (3.) They led him by the hand into Damascus; thus he who thought to have led the disciples of Christ prisoners and captives to Jerusalem, was himself led a prisoner and a captive to Christ into Damascus. (4.) He lay without sight, and without food, neither did eat nor drink for three days, v. 9. I do not think, as some do, that now he had his rapture into the third heavens, which he speaks of, 2 Cor. 12. So far from that, we have reason to think he was, all this time, rather in the belly of hell, suffering God's terrors for his sins, which were now set in order before him: he was in the dark, concerning his own spiritual state, and so wounded in spirit for sin, that he could relish neither meat nor drink.

V. 10—22. Christ here takes care of the work of his own hands; He that hath torn, will heal; that hath smitten, will bind up; that hath convinced, will comfort.

I. Ananias is here ordered to go and look after Saul, to heal and help him. Ananias was a native of Damascus; for it is said, ch. 22: 12. he had a good report of all the Jews which dwelt there, as a devout man according to the law; he had lately embraced the Gospel, and, as it should seem, officiated as a minister, at least, on this occasion, though it does not appear he was apostolically ordained. He is directed to go and inquire at such a house, probably an inn, for one Saul of Tarsus. Two reasons are given him why: 1. Because this stranger prays, and his coming to him must answer his prayer. There is no question, saith Christ, but he is a true convert, for behold, he prayeth. Behold, notes the certainty of it; Assure thyself it is so; go, and see. It notes also the strangeness of it. Saul was a Pharisee, and we have reason to think he did, as the rest of them did, make long prayers in the synagogues, and in the corners of the streets? But now he began to pray after another manner; then he said his prayers, now he prayed them. Regenerating grace evermore sets people on praying; you may as well find a living man without breath, as a living Christian without prayer; if breathless, lifeless; and so if prayerless, graceless. Ananias must go to him with all speed; it is no time to linger, for behold, he prayeth; if the child cry, the tender nurse hastens to it. 'Oh! go to him quickly, and tell him he is a dear son, a pleasant child, and since I spake against him, for persecuting Me, I do earnestly remember him still,' Jer. 31:18—20. The setting of sin in order before us should drive us to prayer. He was blind and sick; and, Is any afflicted? Let him pray. Christ had promised him, it should be further told him what to do, v. 6. and he prays that one may be sent to instruct him. What God has promised, we must pray for; He will for this be inquired of, and particularly for divine instruction. 2. Because Ananias' coming to him must answer his dream, for it was of God, v. 12. He had, in prayer, spread the misery of his own case before God; and God presently manifests Himself, and the intentions of his grace to him; and it is very encouraging to know God's thoughts to us ward. He would readily welcome Ananias as a messenger from God, when told beforehand, in vision, that one of that name would come to him. See what a great thing it is to bring a spiritual physician and his patient together; here are two visions in order to it!

II. Ananias objects against going, and the Lord answers the objection. See, v. 15, 16. how condescendingly the Lord admits his servant to reason with Him. So, 1. Ananias delivered his message to Saul, v. 17. It was promised, as one of the signs that shall follow them that believe, that they should lay hands on the sick, and they should recover, Mark 16: 18. and it was for that intent that he put his hands on him. He called him brother, because he was made a partaker of the grace of God, though not yet baptized. He produces his commission from the same hand that had laid hold on him by the way, and now had him in custody. Ananias might deliver his message to Saul very appositely in the prophet's words, Hos. 6: 1, 2. He assures him, he shall not only have his sight, but be filled with the Holy Ghost: he must himself be an apostle, and in nothing come behind the chief of the apostles, and, therefore, must receive the Holy Ghost immediately, and not, as others did, by the interposition of the apostles;

V. 10—14. Ananias had previously been a 'devout' person, according to the law of Moses; . . . though it is not likely he was one of the seventy disciples. (22:6—16. vv. 12—16.) 'To call on the name of Jesus,' is here used as the distinguished characteristic of a believer.—'The unbelieving Jews say of him, preaching Christ in their synagogues, "Is not this he who wasted those, who called on that name in Jerusalem?"' (21.) Thus Paul writes to saints, . . . under the title of "all that call upon the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, in every place;" (1 Cor. 1:2.) and then, in the very next v., he himself prays, that "grace and peace may be derived on them from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ." . . . And he bids Christians "follow after peace with all those that call upon the Lord with a pure heart;" i. e., with all believers; it being the same thing to believe in, and to call upon, the name of the Lord Jesus. Hence, St. Paul saith, "He that believeth in Him shall not be ashamed, because it is written, Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved." (Joel 2:32.) And hence we learn, who that Lord is, whom Ananias bids Paul invoke, when he saith, "Arise and be baptized, calling upon the name of the Lord," even the Lord Jesus who appeared to him; (22:16.) . . . and what is meant by that phrase, namely, "Profess thy faith, by being baptized in, and by calling on his name." This was a thing so continually practised by the first Christians, that Pliny mentions it in his epistle to Trajan, telling him, that it was the custom of the Christians to sing a hymn to Christ, as God. For, Paul, in his first thirteen epistles, prays for "grace and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus;" and John, in his second epistle, v. 3. doth the same.' Whitby. Some indeed would render the clause, 'are called by thy name:' but the direct meaning of the original, the repetition of the same language in different connexions, and the remarks contained in the quotation just made, are sufficient to show, that this tr. is absolutely inadmissible.

(10, &c.) 'Many German commentators, as Eiehn., Heinr., Kuini., make a desperate attempt to imagine how the event, here, might have happened, (or in fact did happen.) in the regular course of ordinary life; and, what is more, they endeavor to reconcile and intermix this view of the subject with the extraordinary and preternatural method recorded by Luke. But surely never was there anything more hypothetical, contorted, and far-fetched; so totally dissimilar to the plain and obvious sense of the passage, as it would appear to any man of plain, good sense, reading it for the first time, and without any preconceived opinions.' Bl.

(12.) A man named Ananias: put instead of "thee," after the Heb. manner of putting proper names for pronouns, Job. 4:1. Luke 3:19. Gen. 4:23. Kuini. Indeed, it is a characteristic of the primitive style in general.'

V. 15, 16. It should be noted, that this precedes in the history the admission of any uncircumcised Gentiles into the church. Rom. 9:22, 23. 2 Cor. 4:7. 2 Tim. 2:20—22. Some think a distinct representation was made in a vision to Saul's mind of all the various persecutions he afterwards underwent: at least, he had such a discovery made of them, as rendered his subsequent ministry a lively copy of Christ's own example, who foresaw everything that He was to endure, from the very first. He did not, however, fully know the particulars, as many subsequent passages prove.

V. 17—22. 'Ananias, who at most is only supposed to have been one of the seventy disciples, only laid his hands on him, "that he might receive his sight;" and . . . he was replenished with the Holy Ghost by the immediate gift of Christ; he being an "apostle not of man, nor by man, but by Christ alone." Gal. 1:1.' Whitby, in Scott. This appears to have been the case; especially as the conferring of the Holy Spirit, in his miraculous gifts, seems in all cases, previous to that of Cornelius and his friends, to have taken place after baptism. (10:44—48.) 'It is more 19 And when he had received meat, he was strengthened. Then was Saul certain days with the disciples which were at <sup>s</sup>Damascus.

20 And straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that he is the Son of God.

21 But all that heard him <sup>t</sup>were amazed, and said, Is not this he <sup>u</sup>that destroyed them which called on this name in Jerusalem, and came hither for that intent, that he might bring them bound unto the chief priests ?

22 But Saul increased the more in strength, <sup>v</sup>and confounded the <sup>w</sup>Jews which dwelt at Damascus, proving that this is very Christ.

23 ¶ And after that many days were fulfilled, the Jews took counsel <sup>x</sup>to kill him.

24 But their laying await was known of Saul. And they watched <sup>y</sup>the gates day and night, to kill him.

25 Then the disciples took him by night, and let <sup>z</sup>him down by the wall, in a basket.

26 ¶ And when Saul was come to <sup>a</sup>Jerusalem, he assayed to join himself to the disciples : but they were all afraid of him, and believed not that he was a disciple.

27 But <sup>b</sup>Barnabas took him, and brought him to the apostles, and declared unto them how he had seen the Lord in the way, and that he had spoken to him, and how he had preached boldly <sup>c</sup>at Damascus in the name of Jesus.

28 And he was with them coming in and going out at Jerusalem.

29 And he spake boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus, and disputed against the Grecians : but they <sup>d</sup>went about to slay him.

30 <sup>e</sup>Which when the brethren knew, they brought him down to Cesarea, and sent him forth to Tarsus.

and Ananias' putting his hands on him before he was baptized, was for the conferring of the Holy Ghost.

2. Ananias saw the good issue of his mission, (1.) In Christ's favor to Saul. At the word of Ananias, Saul receives sight. He is delivered from the spirit of bondage, (comp. Is. 61 : 1. with Luke 4 : 18.) by his receiving sight, v. 18. signified by the falling of scales from his eyes; and this immediately, and forthwith: the cure was sudden, to show that it was miraculous. The cloud was scattered, and the Sun of righteousness probable, that Ananias did not lay hands on him a second time; as we do not elsewhere find, that any but the apostles had the power of conferring the Holy Spirit. Doddr., in Scorr. From his own account, it appears, that he received his complete knowledge of the Gospel, immediately by revelation from Jesus Christ. 1:11-14. Proving.] 16:10. 1 Cor. 2:16. For "Christ," many ancient MSS. and Verss. read "Jesus," which is approved by Grot., Mill, Bengel, Mich., Morus, Ros., Valck., &c., and rightly received in the text by Griesb. For that Christ was the Son of God, Paul had never denied, nor did the Jews deny that. They only denied that Jesus was the Son of God. Christon doubtless crept into the text from the marg. Kuin.

V. 23-30. It seems that Aretas, an Arabian king, had got possession rose on his soul, with healing under his wings. (2.) In Saul's subjection to Christ; he was baptized, and thereby submitted himself to the government of Christ, and cast himself on the grace of Christ: devoting himself entirely to his service and honor.

III. The good work begun in Saul, is carried on wonderfully, this new-born Christian, though he seemed as one born out of due time, yet presently comes to maturity. 1. He received his bodily strength, v. 19. his three days' fasting, with the mighty weight all that time on his spirits, having made him very weak. 2. He associated with the disciples at Damascus, went to their meetings, and joined in communion with them. Now the wolf dwells with the lamb, and the leopard lies down with the kid, Is. 11 : 6. Those that take God for their God, take his people for their people. 3. He preached Christ in the synagogues, v. 20. To this he had an extraordinary qualification, God having immediately revealed his Son to him and in him, that he might preach Him, Gal. 1:15,16. He was so full of Christ himself, that the Spirit within him constrained him to preach Him to others, and, like Elisha, to speak, that he might be refreshed, Job. 32:20. The Jews; they were to have the first offer; the synagogues were their places of concourse, and there he would face the enemies of Christ, where they were most daring; and openly profess Christianity where he had most opposed it. He preached Christ, nothing but Christ, and Him crucified. He preached concerning Christ, that He is the Son of God, his beloved Son, in whom He is well pleased, and with us in Him, and not otherwise. Doubtless this was looked upon by many, v. 21. as a great confirmation of the truth of Christianity, that such a notorious persecutor of it, came, on a sudden, to be such an intelligent, strenuous, and capacious preacher of it. This miracle on the mind of such a man, outshone the miracles on men's bodies; and giving a man such another heart, was more than giving men to speak with other tongues. 4. He confuted and confounded those that opposed the doctrine of Christ, v. 22. He signalized himself, not only in the pulpit, but in the schools, and showed himself supernaturally enabled, not only to preach the truth, but to maintain and defend it when he had preached it. Instead of being discouraged by the various remarks made on his conversion, he was thereby so much the more imboldened, finding he had enough at hand wherewith to answer the worst they could say of him. In all his discourses with the Jews, he was still proving that this Jesus is very Christ, is the Christ, the Anointed of God, the true Messiah promised to the fathers. He was proving it, affirming it and confirming it; teaching with perswasion. And we have reason to think he converted many.

V. 23-31. Luke here makes no mention of Paul's journey into Arabia, which he tells us himself was immediately after his conversion, Gal. 1 : 16, 17. And what is recorded here, took place three years after his conversion, on his return to Damascus. Here are,

I. Difficulties at Damascus, and a narrow escape of being killed. Observe, 1. His danger, v. 23. The Jews took counsel to kill him, being more enraged at him than at any other preachers of the Gospel; not only because of his zeal and success, but because he had been such a remarkable deserter, and his being a Christian was a testimony against them. Saul was no sooner a Christian than a preacher; no sooner a preacher than a sufferer; so quick did he rise to the top of his preferment! Where God gives great grace, He commonly exercises it with great trials. 2. How he was delivered. The design against him was discovered by some intelligence, whether from heaven or from men, we are not told. The disciples contrived to help him away, hid him, it is likely, by day, and in the night the gates being watched, that he could not get away through them, they let him down by the wall, in a basket, as he himself relates it, 2 Cor. 11 : 33. This story, as it shows us that when we enter into the way of God we must look for temptation, and prepare accordingly; so it shows, that the Lord knows how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and will, with the temptation, also make a way to escape, that we may not be by it deterred or driven from the way of God.

II. Difficulties at Jerusalem, the first time he went thither, v. 26. He came to Jerusalem. This is thought to be that journey to Jerusalem which he himself speaks of, Gal. 1:18. But I rather incline to think it was a journey before that, because his coming in and going out, his preaching and disputing, v. 28, 29. seem to be more than would consist with his 15 days' stay; and besides, now he came a stranger, but then he came, to confer with Peter, as one he was intimate with; however, it might possibly be the same. Now observe,

1. How shy his friends were of him, v. 26. they were afraid of him. Now might Paul be tempted to think himself in an ill case, when the Jews had abandoned and persecuted him, and the Christians would not receive and entertain him. They thought him only a spy, and not a disciple. They knew what a bitter persecutor he had been, and had heard nothing of him since, to the contrary. The disciples of Christ need to be cautious whom they admit into communion with them. Believe not every spirit: yet methinks it is safer to err on the charitable side, because it is an adjudged case, that it is better the tares should be among the wheat, than that the wheat should any of it be rooted up, and thrown out of the field. This jealousy was removed, v. 27. by Barnabas' taking him to the apostles themselves, who were not so scrupulous as the inferior disciples, to whom he first assayed to join himself; and he declared to them how Christ had showed Himself to him in the way, and spoken to him; and what He said; also, what he had since done for Christ. How Barnabas came to know this, more than the rest of them, we are not told; Paul having brought no testimonials from the disciples at Damascus, thinking he needed not, as some others, epistles of commendation, 2 Cor. 3:1. The introducing of a young convert into the communion of the faithful, is a very good work, and which, as we have opportunity, we should be ready to.

2. How shy his friends were of him, v. 26. they were afraid of him. Now might Paul be tempted to think himself in an ill case, when the Jews had abandoned and persecuted him, and the Christians would not receive and entertain him. They thought him only a spy, and not a disciple. They knew what a bitter persecutor he had been, and had heard nothing of him since, to the contrary. escape of being killed. Observe, 1. His danger, v. 23. The Jews took counsel to kill him, being more enraged at him than at any other preachers of the Gospel; not only because of his zeal and success, but because he had been such a remarkable deserter, and his being a Christian was a testimony against them. Saul was no sooner a Christian than a preacher; no sooner a preacher than a sufferer; so quick did he rise to the top of his preferment! Where God gives great grace, He commonly exercises it with great trials. 2. How he was delivered. The design against him was discovered by some intelligence, whether from heaven or from men, we are not told. The disciples contrived to help him away, hid him, it is likely, by day, and in the night the gates being watched, that he could not get away through them, they let him down by the wall, in a basket, as he himself relates it, 2 Cor. 11 : 33. This story, as it shows us that when we enter into the way of God we must look for temptation, and prepare accordingly; so it shows, that the Lord knows how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and will, with the temptation, also make a way to escape, that we may not be by it deterred or driven from the way of God.

II. Difficulties at Jerusalem, the first time he went thither, v. 26. He came to Jerusalem. This is thought to be that journey to Jerusalem which he himself speaks of, Gal. 1:18. But I rather incline to think it was a journey before that, because his coming in and going out, his preaching and disputing, v. 28, 29. seem to be more than would consist with his 15 days' stay; and besides, now he came a stranger, but then he came, to confer with Peter, as one he was intimate with; however, it might possibly be the same. Now observe,

SCOTT. ED. BLOOMF.

31 Then <sup>e</sup> had the churches rest throughout all Judea and Galilee and Samaria, and were <sup>f</sup> edified; and walking <sup>g</sup> in the fear of the Lord, and in the <sup>h</sup> comfort of the Holy Ghost, were <sup>i</sup> multiplied.

32 ¶ And it came to pass, as Peter passed throughout all quarters, he came down also to the saints which dwelt at Lydda.

33 And there he found a certain man named Eneas, which had kept his bed eight years, and was sick of the palsy.

34 And Peter said unto him, Eneas, Jesus Christ maketh <sup>k</sup> thee whole; arise, and make thy bed. And he arose immediately.

35 And all that dwelt in Lydda and <sup>l</sup> Saron saw him, and turned <sup>m</sup> to the Lord.

36 ¶ Now there was at Joppa a certain disciple named Tabitha, which by interpretation is called <sup>n</sup> Dorcas: this woman was full <sup>o</sup> of good works and alms-deeds which she did.

37 And it came to pass in those days, that she was sick, and died: whom when they had washed, they laid <sup>p</sup> her in an upper chamber.

38 And forasmuch as Lydda was nigh to Joppa, and the disciples had heard that Peter was there, they sent unto him two men, desiring <sup>q</sup> him that he would not <sup>r</sup> delay to come to them.

2. How sharp his enemies were upon him. It vexed the unbelieving Jews, to see Saul a trophy of Christ's victory, and a captive to his grace, who had been such a champion for their cause; to see him coming in, and going out, with the apostles, v. 28. and to hear them glorying in him, or rather glorifying God in him. He appeared vigorous in the cause of Christ, and this was yet more provoking to them, v. 29. The Grecians, or Hellenist Jews, were most offended at him, because he had been one of them; and they drew him into a dispute, in which, no doubt, he was too hard for them, as he had been for the Jews at Damascus. For that same natural quickness [force] and fervor of spirit, which, while he was in ignorance and unbelief, made him a furious, bigoted persecutor of the faith, made him a most zealous, courageous defender of the faith.

This brought him into peril of his life, with which he narrowly escaped. That is a bad cause, that has recourse to persecution for its last argument. But notice was given of this conspiracy too, and effectual care taken to secure this young champion,

V. 31. When Saul, the grand instrument of persecution, was become a zealous preacher, other causes likewise concurring, the persecution was suspended, and the churches were left in peace. The conversion of Saul, from a furious and most active persecutor, to a zealous, unwearied, and self-denying preacher of the Gospel, and his subsequent labors and sufferings in the cause, for a long course of years, is an undoubted fact, which ought to be accounted for by all, who have the least doubt of the divine original of Christianity. If his own narrative be admitted, Christianity is without doubt divine, and the only true religion; and those who hesitate to admit his testimony in its full latitude, are required, in support of their cause, to give some other rational and probable account of so unparalleled an event.

V. 34. 'In comparing this with the manner of Christ's miracles, "The different characters of the servant and the Son, the creature and the God, are everywhere apparent." 'The beds [at Aleppo, &c.] consist of a mattress, laid on the floor, and over this a sheet, (in winter a carpet, or some such woollen covering,) the other sheet being sewed to the quilt. A divan cushion often serves for a pillow and bolster. The mattresses

v. 30. Yet it was also by direction from heaven that he left Jerusalem at this time, as he tells us himself, ch. 22: 17, 18. that Christ now appeared to him, and ordered him to go quickly out of Jerusalem, for he must be sent to the Gentiles, v. 21.

III. The churches had now a comfortable gleam of liberty and peace, v. 31. Then, when Saul was converted, so some; or, then, when he was gone from Jerusalem, the fury of the Grecian Jews was a little abated, and they were the more willing to bear with the other preachers, now Saul was gone out of the way. Observe, 1. The churches had rest. The churches that were already planted, were mostly in Judea, Galilee, and Samaria, within the limits of the Holy Land. There were the first Christian churches, where Christ had Himself laid the foundation. 2. Instead of growing secure, they abounded more in their duty, and made a good use of their tranquillity; they were more exemplary, and lived so as that all who conversed with them might say, Surely the fear of God reigns in those people. They were not only faithful, but cheerful in religion. Observe the connexion of these two; when they walked in the fear of the Lord, then they walked in the comfort of the Holy Ghost. Those are most likely to walk cheerfully, that walk circumspectly. 3. God blessed it to them for their increase in number. Sometimes the church multiplies the more for its being afflicted, as Israel in Egypt; yet at other times its rest contributes to its growth, as it enlarges the opportunity of ministers, and invites those in, who at first are afraid of suffering. Or, then, when they walked in the fear of God and his comforts, then they were multiplied. Thus they that will not be won by the Word, may be won by the conversation of professors.

V. 32-35. Here we have, 1. The visit Peter made to the churches newly planted by the dispersed preachers, v. 32. as an apostle, to confirm the doctrine of inferior preachers, to confer the Holy Ghost on them that believed, and to ordain ministers. Reference is had, in the word all, to the churches of Judea, Galilee, and Samaria, mentioned in the foregoing ch. He came to the saints at Lydda; this seems the same with Lod, a city in Benjamin, mentioned 1 Chr. 8: 12. Ezra 2: 33. The Christians are called saints, not only some particular eminent ones, as Peter and Paul, but every sincere professor of the faith of Christ. These are the saints on the earth, Ps. 16: 3.

II. The cure Peter wrought on Eneas, a man that had been bedrid eight years, v. 33. and we may suppose he and all about him despaired of relief for him. Christ chose such patients, whose diseases were incurable in a course of nature, to show how desperate the case of fallen mankind was, when He undertook their cure. When we were without strength, as this poor man, He sent his Word to heal us. 2. His cure was very admirable, v. 34. (1.) Peter does not pretend to do it himself, by any power of his own, but declares it to be Christ's cure, immediate and entire. He does not express himself by way of prayer to Christ, that He would make him whole, but as one having authority from Christ, and that knew his mind, he declares him made whole. 'Arise and make thy bed, that all may see thou art thoroughly cured.' Let none say, that because Christ, by the power of his grace, works all our works in us, therefore we have no work, no duty, to do.

III. The good influence this had upon many, v. 35. We can scarcely think every individual in those countries, took cognizance of the miracle, and was wrought upon by it, but [the phrase all is, after a common figure, meaning] many, the generality of the people. 1. They all made inquiry into the truth of the miracle, saw him that was healed, and saw that it was a miraculous cure that was wrought upon him by the power of Christ, in his name, and with a design to confirm and ratify that doctrine of Christ now preached to the world. 2. They all submitted to the convincing proof and evidence there was in this of the divine original of the Christian doctrine, and turned to the Lord, to the Lord Jesus; from Judaism to Christianity; embraced the doctrine of Christ, and submitted to his ordinances; and turned themselves over to Him, to be ruled and taught and saved by Him.

V. 36-43. Here we have a greater miracle wrought by Peter, to confirm the Gospel,—the raising of Tabitha to life, when she had been for some time dead. Here is,

1. The life, death, and character of Tabitha, on whom this miracle was wrought, v. 36, 37. Tabitha, in Heb., in Greek, is Dorcas; both signify a doe, or hind, or deer, a pleasant creature: the wife, to the kind and tender husband, is as the loving hind, and as the pleasant roe, Prov. 5: 19. She was one that had embraced the faith of Christ and was baptized; and not only so, but was eminent above many for works of charity. Observe, she is praised not only for the alms which she gave, but for the alms-deeds which she did. Those that have not estates wherewith to give in charity, may yet be able to do in charity, working with their hands, or walking with their feet, for the benefit of the poor. And they who will not do a charitable deed, whatever they may pretend, if they were rich would not bestow a charitable gift. She was full of alms-deeds; there is an emphasis on her doing them, because what her hand found to do of this kind she did with all her might, and persevered in. 2 Cor. 8: 11. 9: 7. This is the life and character of a certain disciple, and should agree to all the disciples of Christ; for if thus we bear much fruit, then are we his disciples indeed, John 15: 8. She was removed in the midst of her usefulness, v. 37. It is promised to those who consider the poor, not that they shall never be sick, but that the Lord will strengthen them upon the bed of languishing, at least with strength in their soul, and so will make all their bed in their sickness, will make it easy, Ps. 41: 1, 3. They cannot hope that they shall never die, but they may hope they shall find mercy of the Lord in that day, 2 Tim. 1: 18. Her friends and those about her did not presently bury her, as usual, because they were in hopes Peter would come and raise her to life again; but they washed the dead body, according to the are rolled up, carried away, and placed in cupboards at night.' See Bush's Illustrations.

V. 35. Lydda, a town near the shore of the Mediterranean. Saron is supposed to have been a plain or valley, extending from Cesarea to Joppa.—The success of the Gospel, on this occasion, seems to have been very great; for it is supposed, that the neighborhood was populous.—Philip preached in the cities, from Azotus (or Ashdod) to Cesarea; and Lydda and Saron doubtless were among them. (8:40.) It is highly probable, that the Gospel was introduced at Lydda by his ministry: and that Eneas was made known to Peter, as an afflicted person favorable to the Gospel.

V. 36-43. 'The reason why Luke gives this interpretation seems to be this, that she being a græcizing Jewess, was called Tabitha by the Jews, and Dorcas among the Greeks.' Whitby. In performing this miracle Peter was doubtless assured, that this request was granted, before he addressed Dorcas. His words were not, 'I say unto thee, Arise,' in the language of authority, but simply, 'Tabitha, arise,' as an intimation that Jesus had restored her life: and it should also be remembered, that 39 Then Peter arose, and went with them. When he was come, they brought him into the upper chamber: and all the widows stood by him weeping, and shewing the coats and garments which Dorcas made while she was with them.

40 But Peter put them all forth, and kneeled down, and prayed: and turning him to the body, said, 'Tabitha, arise. And she opened her eyes: and when she saw Peter, she sat up.

41 And he gave her his hand, and lifted her up: and when he had called the saints and widows, he presented her alive.

42 And it was known throughout all Joppa; and many believed in the Lord.

43 And it came to pass, that he tarried many days in Joppa, with one Simon a tanner.

custom, which, they say, was with warm water, which, if there were any life remaining in the body, would recover it; so that this was done to show that she was really and truly dead; they tried all the usual methods to bring her to life, and could not,—the last cry was uttered. They laid her out in her grave-clothes, in an upper chamber; probably, so Lightfoot, the public meeting-room for the believers of that town, that Peter, if he would come, might raise her to life the more solemnly in that place.

2. The request her Christian friends sent to Peter, to come to them with all speed, not to attend the funeral, but, if it might be, to prevent it, v. 38. Lydda, where Peter now was, was nigh to Joppa, and the disciples at Joppa had heard that Peter was there, and that he had raised Eneas from a bed of languishing; therefore, they sent to him two men, to make the message the more solemn and respectful.

3. The posture in which he found the surviving, when he came to them, v. 39. They did not tell him what they wanted him for, yet he was willing to go with them, believing it was on some good account he was sent for. Let not faithful ministers grudge to be at every body's beck, as far as they have ability, when the great apostle made himself the servant of all, 1 Cor. 9:19. He found the corpse in the upper chamber, and attended by widows, (probably of the church, poor widows,) (1.) Commending the deceased; a good work, when there was that in them which was truly commendable, and recommendable to imitation, and it is done modestly and soberly, and without flattery of the survivors, or any sinister intention, but purely for the glory of God, and the exciting of others to that which is virtuous and praiseworthy. The commendation of Tabitha was like her own virtues, not in word, but in deed. Here were no encomiums of her in orations, or poems inscribed to her memory; but the widows showed the coats and garments which she made for them, and bestowed on them while she was with them, Job 31:20. And it is much more honorable to clothe a company of decrepit widows, with needful clothing for night and day, who will pray for their benefactors when they do not see them, than to clothe a company of lazy footmen with rich liveries, who, perhaps, behind their backs, will curse them that clothe them, Eccl. 7:21. and it is what all that are wise and good will take a greater pleasure in; for goodness is true greatness, and will pass better in the account shortly. They showed the coats. Those are horribly ungrateful, indeed, who have kindness shown them, and will not make at least an acknowledgment of it, by showing it. Those who receive alms, are not obliged so industriously to conceal it, as those are who give alms. When the poor reflect on the rich, as uncharitable and unmerciful, they ought to reflect on themselves, and consider whether they are not unthankful and ungrateful. Their showing, tended to the praise not only of her charity, but of her industry, according to the character of the virtuous woman, Prov. 31:19—22. (2.) They were here lamenting the loss of her; the widows stood by Peter, weeping. Observe, they notice the good Dorcas did while she was with them; those that are charitable will find that the poor they have always with them; but it is well if those that are poor, find that the charitable they have always with them. It should seem, the widows wept before Peter, as an inducement to him, if he could do anything, to have compassion on them and help them, and restore one to them that used to have compassion on them.

4. She was raised to life, (1.) Privately; it should seem, there was great crowding about the dead body, in the upper room, in expectation of what would be done; but Peter put them all forth, all the weeping widows, all but some few relations of the family, or perhaps the heads of the church, to join with him in prayer; as Christ did, Mat. 9:25. Thus Peter declined everything that looked like vainglory and ostentation; and might with the more freedom pour out his soul before God in prayer upon this occasion, and not be disturbed with the [usual] noisy and clamorous lamentations. (2.) By prayer; in his healing Eneas there was an implicit prayer; but in this greater work he addressed himself to God, by solemn prayer, as Christ, when He raised Lazarus. (3.) By the word, a quickening word, a word which is spirit and life; he turned to the body, (intimating that when he prayed he turned from it, lest the sight of it should discourage his faith,) and spake in his Master's name, and according to his example, 'Tabitha, arise; return to life again.' Power went with this word, and she came to life, opened her eyes which death had closed; he gave her his hand and lifted her up; thus as it were welcoming her to life again. And lastly, he called the saints and widows, who were all in sorrow for her death, and presented her alive to them, to their great comfort, particularly of the widows, who laid her death much to heart, v. 41.

5. The good effect of this miracle. (1.) Many were by it convinced of the truth of the Gospel, that it was from heaven, and not of men, and believed in the Lord, v. 42. The thing was known throughout all Joppa; it would be in every body's mouth, quickly, and it being a town of seafaring men, [the port of Jerusalem, through which Palestine traded with Europe,] the notice of it would be the sooner carried from thence to other countries; and though some never minded it, many were wrought upon by it. This was the end of miracles, to confirm a divine revelation. (2.) Peter was hereby induced to continue some time in this city, v. 43. Not in the house of Tabitha, though she was rich, lest he should seem to seek his own glory; but he took up his lodgings with one Simon:

PRACT. OBS. The power of doing evil has seldom been adequate to the inclination, even in those who have been most successful persecutors and destroyers in the church, or in the world; for could scourges of God execute their threatenings, as readily as they utter them, their very breath would be fatal to mankind, and especially to the disciples of the Lord.—Even when sinners are most eager to execute their rebellious purposes, the Lord sometimes discovers his designs of mercy towards them: and thus the extremity of their wickedness illustrates the infinite riches and power of his grace.—The manifested light and glory of the divine justice, holiness, and power, would sink the stoutest rebel on earth to despair at once, if it were not accompanied with some indications of mercy and grace: but the Lord sends convictions and terrors to abase men in the dust, that their hearts may be prepared for 'peace and joy in believing.' When a sinner is brought to a proper sense of his own state, character, and conduct, he will submit, without reserve; allowing that he might justly be left to perish; casting himself wholly on the mercy of the divine Savior, and inquiring what He would have him to do. This will thenceforth be the language of his heart and prayers continually.—Under great remorse of conscience, and when the soul is deeply engaged about eternal things, a man loses his desire after animal recreation: so that fasting in such circumstances is often a matter of course, rather than an imposed duty. But happy are they, who thus sow in tears, that they may reap in joy! 'Behold he,' the proud Pharisee, or the prouder infidel, 'prayeth;' in that manner which the Savior notices with cordial approbation! Behold the licentious profligate, the iniquitous publican, the unmerciful oppressor, or the daring blasphemer, 'prayeth!' What happy tidings are these, when well authenticated, to such as understand the nature and efficacy of prayer; of such prayer, as the humbled sinner presents before a merciful God, for the blessings of eternal salvation!—Converting grace renders believers the children of the same Father, abolishes their former distinctions, and terminates their enmities: and, when the bitterest foe, or the vilest malefactor, becomes a real disciple, we are required to own and to love him as a 'brother,' without any upbraidings, prejudice, or resentment; and we should rejoice to be useful to him, either in his temporal or spiritual concerns.—The efficacious teaching of the Holy Spirit, causes 'the scales' of ignorance, prejudice, and pride to fall from the eyes of the understanding, which before excluded the clear light of the Gospel: then the sinner receives his sight, and professes the faith which once he despised: then he passes from the kingdom of Satan to that of God; (Notes, Eph. 1:15—23, vv. 15—18. Col. 1:9—14.) and, being a new creature, he lives in a new element, and joins himself to new companions. (Note, 1 Sam. 10:10—13.) and, as he has opportunity and ability, he endeavors to recommend Jesus, the anointed Savior and the Son of God, to the attention of his former associates in iniquity or infidelity: and this is often done with an energy of argument and persuasion, which confounds those, who are the most hardened against the truth: but while many, who witness the effects of the Gospel, are amazed, only a few in comparison are effectually convinced by them. Even Saul's conversion, though it is, not this day, a real demonstration of the truth of Christianity, a fact that can neither be doubted, nor accounted for on any other principle; even when it first took place, and when it concurred with his convincing arguments, and most stupendous miracles, could not of itself effect the conversion of one enemy to the Gospel: for nothing can produce true faith, but that power which new creates the heart.—When believers walk conscientiously, 'in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit,' they appear to be an excellent and happy people, and are generally multiplied: and it behooves us to watch against dejection or melancholy, as much as against known sin; for it prejudices the minds of unbelievers against the truth, and renders them afraid of it, as only productive of dejection and discomfort.—How mean is the grovelling ambition of those numerous females, who aspire to no higher distinction, than that of external personal decoration and accomplishment, and who waste their lives in trifling pursuits; when multiplied charities, and labors of love, might have rendered them, at less expense of time and treasure, a blessing to multitudes, and an ornament to Christianity!

SCOTT.

there was no witness to the transaction. It is remarkable, that there is no instance in Scripture of a prophet, or eminent minister of religion, being raised from the dead; (for it does not appear, that Paul was entirely dead, when he had been stoned at Lystra, 14:19, 20.) and but few of their miraculous recoveries from sickness: though we should perhaps have thought, that these were the most proper cases for a divine interposition.

(41.) Widows.] Dr. A. C. thinks, that 'in the primitive times the widows formed a distinct part of the Christian church.' Where polygamy prevailed, widows would be numerous; and where, as in the E., women and though Peter might seem to be buried in obscurity, here in the house of a poor tanner, [a trade stigmatized by the Jews, Schoettg.] by the sea-side, yet hence God fetched him to a noble piece of service in the next ch.; for those that humble themselves shall be exalted.

CHAP. X. V. 1—8. The story of this ch. gives to the Acts a turn very new and remarkable; hitherto, both at Jerusalem and everywhere else, where the ministers of Christ came, they preached the Gospel only to the Jews, or Greeks circumcised and proselyted to the Jews' religion; but now, Lo, we turn to the Gentiles; and to them are not taught to read and write, they would peculiarly need protection. And such a state of society, as is well known, more exposes them to temptation. Ed.

NOTES. CHAP. X. V. 1, 2. It may be supposed, that Cornelius, if a native of Italy, would think it a trial, to be sent so far from his country and all his connexions; for the Cornelii were an illustrious family at Rome. Yet in Judea, he became acquainted with the true God; and, renouncing idolatry, he worshipped Him with reverence and obedient attention.—Many writers are very full and exact, about two sorts of proselytes to the Jewish religion; and others argue against that distinction; but the nature of the case, and the facts recorded in Scripture render it evident, that some of the Gentiles were circumcised, professed obedience to the whole Mosaic law, and were completely incorporated among the native Jews; and that others became worshippers of the true God, and professed obedience to the moral precepts, who were not circumcised, nor observant of the ceremonial law. Of this latter description Cornelius was; and therefore considered entirely as a Gentile, though of good report among the Jews.—‘The Jews accounted them unclean, as well as the other Gentiles: . . . yet . . . they deemed the alms they gave to the Jews clean; . . . and because Cornelius was free in giving to the Jews of Cesarea, he was a man of good report among them all.’ (22) Whitby. There was evidently a preparation in the heart of Cornelius, for the reception of the Gospel; he had doubtless a true faith in the Word of God, as far as he understood it, though he had not an explicit faith in Christ. (8:26—31.) This preparation and faith were the fruits of the regenerating Spirit of God, who was given to him through the mediation of Jesus, even before he knew Him; and this indeed is the case with every man, when ‘God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith He loved him, even when dead in sin,’ at first ‘quickens him together with Christ.’ Eph. 2:4—10, vv. 4, 5. Had it been possible for Cornelius, in this state of mind, to have refused the salvation of Christ when proposed to him; he would not have been saved by his works; but this could not be, for God had prepared and inclined him to welcome the Gospel, because He intended to call him to believe it; so that he could neither be saved without faith in Christ, nor could he perish through want of it. It is mere trifling to inquire, as many have done, what his estate would have been, had he died after his prayers were heard, and before he had believed in Christ; for it goes on the absurd supposition of the Lord's beginning a work, and not bringing it to the intended completion. It is a universal rule, that whatever is from God, of a spiritual and holy nature, will for Christ's sake be accepted by Him; but it may be doubted whether He ever communicates regenerating grace to an adult person, where He has not given, or does not mean to send, some measure of the light of His Word; though it does not behoove us to limit His mercy; nor can we tell how small a portion of divine truth may be the seed or the food of divine life in the soul. This we may know certainly, that no regenerate man will finally reject the Gospel, when proposed to him.—Many objections and reasonings, and much perplexity on this subject, among persons of contrary systems, seem to arise from inattention to this truth; that nothing spiritually good, or acceptable to God, can be produced from the heart of fallen man, except by the regenerating Spirit of Christ: where that is communicated, all things necessary to salvation will in due time follow; yet when, or in what order, cannot be previously ascertained. John 1:10—13, vv. 12, 13. 3:3—8. But many things good, in the estimation of man, and many specious appearances of evangelical religion, are as distinct from spirituality and holiness, or the choice and love of the holy excellency of God and heavenly things, as polished brass, in its highest perfection, is different from pure gold. Luke 16:14, 15. Perhaps these observations may assist the reader, in understanding this interesting ch.; which cannot easily be made to accord with the exactness of systematical writers of different creeds, on these subjects.—(1.) The Italian band.] ‘Many, with Grotius, have explained this, as if the meaning were, that Cornelius was a centurion of one of the cohorts belonging to the Italian legion. . . . But I refer the reader to the many learned and judicious things which Mr. Biscoe has said, (Boyle's Lectures), to show that the Italian legion did not exist at the door of faith is here opened: good news indeed to us sinners of the Gentiles. Peter is the first man employed to admit uncircumcised Gentiles into the Christian church; and Cornelius, a Roman centurion or colonel, is the first that, with his family and friends, is so admitted. It is not unlikely some Gentiles might, before now, have stepped into a synagogue of the Jews, and heard the Gospel preached; but the Gospel was never yet designedly preached to the Gentiles, nor any of them till now baptized. And here we have,

I. An account of Cornelius; he was a great man and a good man; two characters that seldom meet; and where they do, they put a lustre on each other; goodness makes greatness truly valuable, and greatness makes goodness much more serviceable.

1. He was an officer of the army, v. 1; at present quartered in Cesarea, a strong city, lately re-edified and fortified by Herod the Great, and called Cesarea, in honor of Augustus Cæsar. It lay on the sea-shore, very convenient for correspondence between Rome and its conquests in those parts. The Roman governor, or proconsul, ordinarily resided here, ch. 23:23, 24. 25:6. [Note, 8:40.] Here was a band, or cohort, or regiment, of the Roman army, which probably was the governor's life-guard, and is here called the Italian band; because, that they might be the more sure of their fidelity, they were all native Romans, or Italians. The name, Cornelius, was much used among the Romans, among some of the most ancient and noble families. He was an officer of considerable rank and figure, a centurion. Mat. 8:10. When a Gentile must be pitched upon to receive the Gospel first, it is not a Gentile philosopher, much less a Gentile priest, (who are bigoted to their notions and worship, and prejudiced against the Gospel of Christ,) but a Gentile soldier, who is a man of more free thought; and he that truly is so, when the Christian doctrine is fairly set before him, cannot but bid it welcome. Fishermen, unlearned and ignorant men,* were the first of the Jewish converts, but not so of the Gentiles; for the world shall know, that the Gospel has that in it which may recommend it to men of polite learning and a liberal education, as we have reason to think this centurion was. Let not soldiers and officers of the army plead, that their employment frees them from the restraints some others are under, and, giving them an opportunity of living more at large, may excuse them if they be not religious; for here was an officer of the army that embraced Christianity, and yet was neither turned out of his place, nor turned himself out. And lastly, it was a mortification to the Jews, that not only the Gentiles were taken into the church, but, that the first who was taken in, was an officer of the Roman army, this time. . . . I think it exceedingly probable, for the reasons which he urges, that this was a cohort different from any of the legiourary ones; (the life-guard of the governor, perhaps;) and consequently that Luke has here expressed himself with his usual accuracy; and that the mistake lies, as it generally does, in those who think they have learning enough to correct him. It is probable, that this was called the Italian cohort, because most of the soldiers belonging to it were Italians.’ Doddr. Instead of generally, always would have been more proper. S.

(1.) Cesarea.] Note, 8:40. Band.] ‘Speira: cohort. This consisted sometimes of 555 infantry and 66 cavalry; but the cohors prima, or first cohort, of 1105 infantry, and 132 cavalry, in the time of Vegetius. But the horse are to be considered, not as a part of it, but as a company joined to it. A Roman legion had 10 cohorts; the first was most honored.’ Dr. A. C. In Gruter's inscriptions (found in the Forum Sempronii), a volunteer cohort of Italian soldiers in Syria is mentioned. Jos. relates, that most of the recruits were derived from Syria, for the legions serving there. But this was of Romans, the others being provincials. Arrian mentions an Italian cohort; Tacitus and others, an Italian legion. See Bl. ‘We learn, from the Roman historians, that the 5th, 10th, and 15th legions were stationed in Judea; and the 3d, 4th, 6th, and 12th, in Syria.’ Dr. A. C. Ed.

(2.) Feared God.] 1. ‘Phoboumenos ton Theon: “a name given to proselytes of the gate, see 13:16. 26:43. For proselytes of justice, i. e. Gentiles, who had embraced the Jewish faith and undergone circumcision, were considered as having become part of the Jewish people, and were called Jews. 2. Cornelius offered up his prayers at the hours usual among the Jews, (see 3:30.) and had read the O. T., for Peter appeals to it as known to him. He had, too, conferred many benefits on the people, (v. 2.) not only Gentiles, but Jews. 3. Although the Jews did not refuse to mix with the proselytes of the gate, (as we learn from Jos., War. 6, 3, 3.) yet the more rigid ones despised them, since they had not undergone circumcision, nor used to observe the precepts of the Mosaic law concerning clean and unclean meats.” But the above reasons (adduced by Fecht, Hamm., Wolf, Benson, Maschius, Ernesti, Ziegler, &c.) seem, says Kuin., not very convincing. For, (1.) The words phoboumenos, or sebomenos ton Theon, or eulabeis, are also used of any persons studious of piety, and filled with reverence towards God. Sec Acts 18:11. 19:27. 22:12. Luke 1:50. 2:25. 2 Pet. 2:9. Rev. 11:13. (2.) Cornelius is called by Peter, alophulos, [tr. of another nation,] with whom it was not lawful for Jews to associate, 10:28. But there was nothing in the whole law which forbade the holding society with proselytes of the gate. Nay, the Law of Moses permitted to foreigners a perpetual abode among Jews, on condition that they should renounce idolatry, and abstain from whatever had reference thereto; as meats offered up to idols, food formed from blood. See Lev. 17:10. 11:13. The Law had moreover enjoined the Israelites to treat such proselytes as fellow-countrymen, and love them as themselves, Lev. 19:33, 34. See Mich. and Nitch. Hence also to such was permitted free access to the synagogues (Acts 14:1.) and familiar intercourse with the Jews. (Luke 7:3. note, Mat. 8:5.) Besides, had Cornelius been a proselyte of the gate, the news of his conversion would not have occasioned such astonishment to the apostles and others, 11:1, &c. (3.) Cornelius is, in 11:1. expressly numbered with Gentiles. See also 10:34, 35. Now what is predicted of Cornelius is transferred to the Gentiles; and in the council of Jerusalem Peter claims to himself the glory of first preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles, 15:7. On all which accounts it seems far more probable that Cornelius was a Gentile.’ Kuin. BL.—‘One that feared God.’ ‘It is a very unwarrantable liberty, in the vers. of 1727, to tr. this clause a proselyte. . . . There is no sufficient authority for the distinction, so generally admitted by learned men, between proselytes of righteousness, who by circumcision became debtors to the whole law, and proselytes of the gate, who, worshipping the true God, renouncing idolatry, and submitting themselves to the observation of the 7 (supposed) precepts of Noah, were allowed, though uncircumcised, to live among the Jews, and converse familiarly with them.’ Doddr.—See on chapter 11:2. Ed.

3 He saw in a vision evidently, about the ninth hour of the day, an angel of God coming in to him, and saying unto him, Cornelius.

4 And when he looked on him, he was afraid, and said, What is it, Lord? And he said unto him, Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God.

5 And now send men to Joppa, and call for one Simon, whose surname is Peter.

6 He lodgeth with one Simon a tanner, whose house is by the seaside: he shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do.

7 And when the angel which spake unto Cornelius was departed, he called two of his household servants, and a devout soldier of them that waited on him continually:

8 And when he had declared all these things unto them, he sent them to Joppa.

9 ¶ On the morrow, as they went on their journey, and drew nigh unto the city, Peter went up upon the house-top to pray, about the sixth hour:

which was to them the abomination of desolation.

2. He was, according to the measure of the light he had, a religious man; a very good character is given of him, v. 2. He was no idolater, nor allowed himself in any of those immoralities the greater part of the Gentile world were given up to, to punish them for their idolatry. (1.) He possessed a principle of regard to the true and living God, was devout, and feared God; he believed in one God, the Creator of heaven and earth, revered his glory and authority, and dreaded offending Him by sin; and though a soldier, it was no diminution to the credit of his valor to tremble before God. (2.) He kept up religion in his family; he feared God, with all his house. He would not admit any idolaters under his roof; but took care that not himself only, but all his, should serve the Lord. (3.) He was a very charitable man; he gave much alms to the people, the people of the Jews, notwithstanding the singularities of their religion. Though a Gentile, he was willing to contribute to the relief of one that was a real object of charity, without asking what religion he was of. (4.) He was much in prayer; he prayed to God always. He kept up stated times for prayer, and was constant to them. Wherever the fear of God rules in the heart, it will appear both in works of charity and of piety, and neither will excuse us from the other.

V. 3—8. Philip, the evangelist, seems to have been at Cesarea, at this time; yet it did not please God to employ him in the case of Cornelius, as he had done in that of the Ethiopian treasurer. It does not appear, that Cornelius had the least acquaintance with the Christians at or near Cesarea.—His intercourse with the unbelieving Jews was suited rather to increase than remove his prejudices; and, as far as it can now be judged, the reading of the Greek translation of the Scriptures was the principal and almost sole means, by which effects so beneficial and excellent had been produced.

(3.) Evidently.] Phanerōs: added, to show that Cornelius was awake. Lightf.—He saw, &c.] The text is as plain as it can be, that an angel of God did appear to Cornelius. It was something similar to the angelic appearance made to Daniel, ch. 9:20—23. and that especially to Zachariah, the father of John the Baptist. Luke 1:11, &c.] Dr. A. C.

(6.) By the sea.] The ancients had their tanners' houses and workshops apart (50 cubits at least, so the Jewish Mischna) from towns, (on account of the fetid odor,) and near rivers, for convenience of water, necessary in preparing the skins. Simon was not a currier, but a tanner. Kuin. Perhaps, then, Peter chose this house, partly for its retirement. Ed.—What thou oughtest to do.] From this it appears, that matters of great moment had occupied the mind of Cornelius. He was not satisfied with the state of his own soul, nor with the degree he possessed of religious knowledge. . . . Perhaps he had heard of Jesus, and had been perplexed with the different opinions that prevailed concerning

II. The orders given him from heaven.

1. He had a vision, about 3 of the clock in the afternoon, with us an hour of business and conversation; but then, because it was in the temple the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, it was made by devout people an hour of prayer, to intimate that all our prayers are to be offered up in the virtue of the great Sacrifice. Cornelius was now at prayer, v. 30. and saw an angel, evidently with his bodily eyes, not in a dream, presented to his imagination, but in a vision, presented to his sight. He called him by his name, Cornelius, to intimate the particular notice God took of him. This put Cornelius for the present into some confusion, v. 4. Therefore Cornelius cries, What is it, Lord? What is the matter? This he speaks as one afraid of something amiss, and longing to be eased of that fear, by knowing the truth; or as one desirous to know the mind of God, and ready to comply with it.

2. The message. (1.) He is assured God accepts of him in walking according to the light he had, v. 4. Observe, prayers and alms must go together. Cornelius prayed, and gave alms, not as the Pharisees, to be seen of men, but in sincerity, as unto God; and he is here told, that they were come up for a memorial before God. The sacrifices under the law are said to be for a memorial. See Lev. 2:9, 16. 5:12. 6:15. And prayers and alms are our spiritual offerings, which God is pleased to take cognizance of, and have regard to. The divine revelation communicated to the Jews, as far as the Gentiles were concerned in it, not only as it directed and improved the light and law of nature, but as it promised a Messiah to come, Cornelius believed and submitted to; what he did, he did in that faith, and was accepted of God in it; for the Gentiles, to whom the law of Moses came, were not obliged to become circumcised Jews, as those to whom the Gospel of Christ comes, are to become baptized Christians. (2.) He is appointed to inquire after a further discovery of divine grace, now lately made to the world, v. 5, 6. Cornelius prays and gives alms in the fear of God; is religious himself, and keeps up religion in his family, and all this so as to be accepted of God in it; yet there is something further, that he ought to do; it is indispensably necessary that he embrace the Christian religion, now that God has established it among men. He that believed the promise of the Messiah, must now believe the performance of that promise. Now that God had given a further record concerning his Son than what had been given in the O. T. prophecies, He requires that we receive that, when it is brought to us. And now, neither our prayers nor our alms come up for a memorial before God unless we believe in Jesus Christ; for it is that further which we ought to do. This is his commandment, that we believe; prayers and alms are accepted from those that believe that the Lord is God, and have not opportunity of knowing more. But from those to whom it is preached, that Jesus is Christ, it is necessary to the acceptance of their persons, prayers, and alms, that they believe that, and rest on Him alone for acceptance. Cornelius has now an angel from heaven talking to him, yet he must not receive the Gospel from him, nor be told by him what he ought to do; but all that the angel has to say, is, Send for Peter, and he shall tell thee. As the former observation puts a mighty honor on the Gospel, so does this on the gospel-ministry. And as it was an honor to the apostle, that he must preach what an angel might not, so it was a further honor, that an angel was despatched on purpose from heaven to order him to be sent for. To bring a faithful minister and a willing people together, is a work worthy of an angel, and what therefore the greatest of men should be glad to be employed in.

III. His immediate obedience, v. 7, 8. Having a family, and kinsmen, and friends, v. 24. a little congregation of them, that could not go with him to Joppa, he sends for Peter; and that as soon as ever the angel was departed. Where souls are concerned, no time is to be lost. He sent two of his household servants, who all feared God, and a devout soldier, one of them that waited on him continually. A devout centurion had devout soldiers; officers in an army, that have such a great power over the soldiers as we find the centurion had, Mat. 8:9. have a great opportunity of promoting religion, at least of restraining vice and profaneness, in those under their command, if they would but improve it. When this centurion was to choose some of his soldiers to attend his person, and to be always about him, he pitched on such of them as were devout; they shall be preferred and countenanced, to encourage others to be so; he went by David's rule, Ps. 101:6. As Peter's coming was a thing in which they were all concerned, for they had souls to save as well as he, v. 8. he does not only tell them where to find Peter, but on what errand he was to come, that they might importune him.

V. 9—18. Here Peter, to remove his difficulty about going to Cornelius, because Cornelius was a Gentile, and to prepare him to go, has a vision, as Ananias had to prepare him to go to Paul. The Scriptures of the O. T. had spoken plainly of the bringing in of the Gentiles into the church; Christ had given plain intimations of it, when He ordered them to teach all nations; yet even Peter himself, who knew so much of his Master's mind, cannot understand it, till it is here revealed by vision, that the Gentiles should be fellow heirs, Eph. 3:6.

I. The circumstances of this vision. God is pleased often to bring things to the minds of his ministers, which they had not thought of, just then when they have occasion to use them. It was when Peter, who was much in prayer, went up to pray, after David's example, Ps. 55:17. about noon. From morning

Him; and now prayed to God that he might know what part to take.

Dr. A. CLARKE.

(8.) House-top.] That the Jews were accustomed to offer their prayers on the roofs of their houses, is plain from 2 K. 23:12. Jer. 19:13. 32:15. Zeph. 1:5. Neh. 8:16. Job. 3:11, 17. Dan. 6:10. [where, see note and cut.] Ps. 55:17. So also Taanith, (cited by Wetst.) "Let us go up to the roof, and implore mercy,—they went upon the roof, and he stood in one corner, and she stood in the other, &c." BL.

V. 9—16. Peter, after he had received the Holy Spirit, needed to make daily proficiency in the knowledge of the benefit of Christ. Beza, in Scott.—While his senses were closed to external objects, invisible things were presented to his mind, as if he saw them with his eyes.—(15) Call not thou common.] Do not thou pollute. Gr. 'It was the priests' office, in case of leprosy, and other matters of a like nature, to pronounce the thing or person under examination, clean or unclean. In the Heb. it is thus expressed, "The priest shall cleanse," "The priest shall pollute him." What God hath cleansed, i. e. by this vision and command declared to be clean, do not thou pollute, i. e. pronounce unclean. Whitby. To inform a Jew, that God had cleansed those animals, which before had been declared unclean, and that they were no longer to be deemed common, or rejected as such, was, in fact, to announce the abrogation of the Mosaic law, and the introduction of another and more enlarged dispensation: and it plainly intimated, that uncircumcised Gentiles, whom God cleansed by faith and grace, were to

10 And he became very hungry, and would have eaten: but while they made ready, he fell into a trance,

11 And saw <sup>k</sup> heaven opened, and a certain vessel descending unto him, as it had been a great sheet, knit at the four corners, and let down to the earth;

12 Wherein were all manner of four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air.

13 And there came a voice to him, Rise, Peter; kill, and eat.

14 But Peter said, Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten any thing that is <sup>l</sup> common or unclean.

15 And the voice spake unto him again the second time, What God hath <sup>m</sup> cleansed, that call not thou common.

16 This was done thrice: and the vessel was received up again into heaven.

17 ¶ Now while Peter doubted in himself what this vision which he had seen should mean, behold, the men which were sent from Cornelius had made inquiry <sup>n</sup> for Simon's house, and stood before the gate, to night we should think too long to be without meat; yet who thinks it too long to be without prayer? He prayed upon the house-top, [Note and cut, Dan. 6: 10.] where he could neither hear nor be heard, and so might avoid both distraction and ostentation. He had this vision immediately after he had prayed, as an answer to his prayer for the spreading of the Gospel; and because the ascent of the heart to God in prayer is an excellent preparative to receive the discoveries of the divine grace and favor. He had it when very hungry, waiting for his dinner, v. 10. probably, he had not eaten before that day, though doubtless he had prayed before; be received into the church, without regard to the ceremonial law, or to their uncleanness according to it.

18 And called, and asked whether Simon, which was surnamed Peter, were lodged there.

19 While Peter thought on the vision, the Spirit <sup>o</sup> said unto him, Behold, three men seek thee.

(9, 10.) Eighth.] A usual time for prayer among the Jews. So Schabboth (cited by Wetst.) All operatives eat at the 5th hour, but the disciples of the wise, at the 6th. Eaten.] The Gr. is perpetually used of taking a meal, without reference to any precise quantity; of which examples in abundance are in Limb., Elsn., Raph., and Valck. Made ready.] The Gr. is perpetually used, (as here,) to denote cooking. Trance.] Ekstasis: properly, a removal of anything from any former state: but it is especially applied to that alienation, or (as we call it) absence, of mind, by which, even though awake, our senses are so far from conveying to us the impression of external objects, that the mind seems, as it were, to have retired from the body, and to be wholly absorbed in the contemplation of internal and spiritual images or objects. So Dodd., who observes, that the word properly signifies such a rapture of mind, as gives the person who falls into it a look of astonishment, and renders him insensible of the external objects round him, while in the mean time his imagination is agitated in an extraordinary manner with some striking scenes which pass before it, and take up the attention. See some extraordinary instances, mentioned by Gualtperius; [and by the 2d commission of the French Academy, appointed to report on "Animal Magnetism." Ed.]—Light. observes, that there were 7 ways in which God formerly revealed himself to men; 1. by dreams: 2. by apparitions while they were awake: 3. by visions while they slept: 4. by a voice from heaven: 5. by Urim: 6. by inspiration, or auricular revelation: 7. by a sort of rapture or ecstasis; of all the other modes the most excellent, by which a man was snatched into heaven, (2 Cor. 12: 2.) and was in the Spirit: (Rev. 1:10.) and which is the one here meant, as in Gen. 2:21.

(9.) 'From Joppa to Cesarea was about 12 or 15 leagues; the messengers could not have left the house of Cornelius till about 2 hours before sunset; therefore they must have travelled part of the night, in and now he would have eaten, lit. have tasted, which intimates his great moderation and temperance in eating. Now, this hunger was a proper inlet to the vision about meats, as Christ's hunger in the wilderness was to Satan's temptation to turn stones into bread.

II. The vision; not so plain as that to Cornelius, but more figurative and enigmatical, to make the deeper impression.

1. He fell into a trance or ecstasis, not of terror, but of contemplation, which was so great that he quite lost himself to this world, and so had his mind entirely free for converse with divine things; as Adam in innocency, when the deep sleep fell upon him.

2. He saw heaven opened; that he might be sure that his authority to go to Cornelius was indeed from heaven; that it was a divine light which altered his sentiments, and a divine power which gave him his commission.

3. He saw a great sheet full of all manner of living creatures, let down to him, to the roof of the house. Some make this sheet, thus filled, to represent the church of Christ. All the benefit we have from the inferior creatures, comes down to us from heaven; it is the gift of God, Ps. 8: 4—8. How should it double our comfort in the creatures, and our obligations to serve God in the use of them!

4. Peter was ordered, by a voice from heaven, to use this plenty and variety, v. 13. The distinction of meats which the law made, was intended to put a difference between Jew and Gentile, that it might be difficult to them to dine and sup with a Gentile, because they would have that set before them, which they were not allowed to eat; and now, the taking off of that prohibition was a plain allowance to converse with the Gentiles, and to be free and familiar with them.

5. Peter stuck to his principles, though hungry, v. 14. not knowing at first but that kill, and eat, was a command of trial, whether he would adhere to the more sure Word, the written law; and if so, his answer had been very good, Not so, Lord. Temptations to eat forbidden fruit must not be parleyed with, but peremptorily rejected: and if God, by his grace, has preserved us from gross sin unto this day, we should, like Peter, use that as an argument with ourselves, to abstain from all appearance of evil. So strict were the pious Jews in this matter, that the seven brethren, those glorious martyrs under Antiochus, chose rather to be tortured to death in the most cruel manner, than to eat swine's flesh.

6. God, by a second voice from heaven, proclaimed the repeal of the law in this case, v. 16. He that made the law, might alter it when He pleased, and reduce the matter to its first state. God had, for reasons suited to the O. T. dispensation, restrained the Jews from eating such and such meats, which, while that dispensation lasted, they were obliged in conscience to submit to; but He has now, for reasons suited to the N. T. dispensation, taken off that restraint, and set the matter at large, and we ought to make use of, and stand fast in, the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, and not call that common or unclean, which God has now declared clean: welcoming it as a great mercy, that we are freed from the distinction of meats, which was made by the law of Moses, and that now every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused; chiefly because conscience is hereby freed from a yoke, in things of this nature, that we might serve God without fear. Though the Gospel has made duties which were not so by the law of nature, yet it has not, like the law of Moses, made sins that were not so. Those who command to abstain from some kinds of meat, at some times of the year, and place religion in it, call that common which God hath cleansed; and, in that error, more than in any truth, are the successors of Peter.

7. This was done thrice, v. 16; but, whether Peter's refusal was repeated the second and third time, is not certain; surely not, when his objection had the first time received such a satisfactory answer. The doubling of Pharaoh's dream, and so the trebling of Peter's vision, were to show that the thing was certain, and engage him so much the more to notice it. But at last the vessel was received up into heaven. Those who make this vessel to represent the church, including both Jews and Gentiles, as this did both clean and unclean creatures, make this very aptly to signify the admission of the believing Gentiles into the church, and into heaven too, into the Jerusalem above.

III. The providence which very opportunely explained this vision to Peter, v. 17, 18. 1. Peter had no reason to doubt the truth of it, as a heavenly vision; all his doubt was concerning the meaning. 2. Yet he was made to know presently, for the men sent from Cornelius were just now come to the house. God knows what services are before us, and therefore how to prepare us; and we then better know the meaning of what He has taught us, when we find what occasion we have to use it.

V. 19—33. We have here the meeting between Peter and Cornelius. Paul was designed to be the apostle of the Gentiles, and to gather in the harvest among them, and Peter to be the apostle of the circumcision; yet it is ordered, that Peter shall reap the first-order to arrive at Joppa next day towards noon.' Calmet, in Dr. A. C. 'Joppa was 9 [Germ.] miles [above 40 Eng.] from Cesarea. On the day that the angel had appeared to Cornelius, when fasting and praying, he sent messengers to Peter (3—7.) The messengers on the 2d day are received with hospitality (v. 23.); and on the 3d day they return with Peter to Cesarea. On the 4th day they approach to Cesarea, v. 24, 30.'

(10.) Hungry.] 'It appears they were making ready for the family.—The dinner, among the ancients, was a very slight meal; and they had no breakfast; their supper was their principal meal: and in very ancient times they ate only once in the day. The supper was the meal at which they saw their friends, their daily business being finished.' Dr. A. C.

(12.) 'The apostles, while they thought that the distinction of clean and unclean animals and meats was to continue, and the Gentiles were unclean, had forgotten, or never understood, the contrary declaration of Christ, in Mat. 15:17, 18. Nay, even our Lord's precept, "Go, proselyte all nations, baptizing them," &c. (Mat. 28:19.) they had misunderstood, thinking the command applied only to those who had previously embraced the Jewish religion: for which reason they had hitherto avoided the society of Gentiles, and had not communicated to them the doctrines of Christ. [So we see how necessary it was, that this intention of God should be manifested more strongly than language could do it, by a most impressive exhibition of the thing itself, which could not be mistaken. Ed.] The removal of the distinction of meats need not have seemed strange to the apostles, since we find from the Rabbinical writings, that the Jewish masters maintained, that this would take place in the time of the Messiah. See the citations in Wetst.'

V. 17—23. Peter did not readily understand the import of this vision; though he knew that it contained some weighty instruction, which he diligently applied his mind to discover. (Marg. Ref. n.) Whilst he was thus engaged in deep reflection, the messengers of Cornelius arrived and inquired for him; but to satisfy his mind more fully, in a case that 20 Arise therefore, and get thee down, and go with them, doubting nothing: for I have sent them.

21 Then Peter went down to the men which were sent unto him from Cornelius; and said, Behold, I am he whom ye seek: what is the cause wherefore ye are come?

22 And they said, Cornelius the centurion, a just man, and one that feareth God, and of good report among all the nation of the Jews, was warned from God by an holy angel, to send for thee into his house, and to hear words of thee.

23 Then called he them in, and lodged them. And on the morrow Peter went away with them, and certain brethren from Joppa accompanied him.

24 And the morrow after they entered into Cesarea. And Cornelius waited for them, and had called together his kinsmen and near friends.

25 ¶ And as Peter was coming in, Cornelius met him, and fell down at his feet, and worshipped him.

26 But Peter took him up, saying, Stand up; I myself also am a man.

27 And as he talked with him, he went in, and found many that were come together.

28 And he said unto them, Ye know how that it is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company, or come unto one of another nation; but God hath shewed me that I should not call any man common or unclean.

29 Therefore came I unto you without gainsaying, as soon as I was sent for. I ask, therefore, for what intent ye have sent for me?

fruits of the Gentiles; that the believing Jews, who retained too much of the old leaven of ill-will to the Gentiles, might be the better reconciled to their admission into the church, when they were first brought in by their own apostle, which Peter urgeth against those that would have imposed circumcision on the Gentile converts, ch. 15:7.

1. Peter is directed by the Spirit to go with Cornelius' messengers, v. 19, 20, and now the riddle is unriddled. So far from being shy of them, he went to them himself, and told them he was the person they were inquiring for! And, with abundance of openness and condescension he asks, what their business is, and they frankly tell him their errand, v. 22, how that Cornelius, an officer of the Roman army, a very honest gentleman, and one who, though not a Jew himself, is of good report among all the people of the Jews, as a conscientious, sober, charitable man, so that it will be no discredit to thee to be seen in his company; he was warned, lit. had an oracle from God, sent him by an angel, by which he was ordered to send for thee to his house, (where he is expecting thee, and ready to bid thee welcome,) and to hear words of thee: they know not what words, but they are such as he may hear from thee, and not from any one else so well. Faith comes by hearing. When Peter repeats this, he tells us more fully, they are words whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved, ch. 11:14. He kindly entertained the messengers, v. 23, as it becomes Christians and ministers to be hospitable.

2. He went with them to Cornelius, accompanied by certain brethren from Joppa, v. 23, six, as we find, ch. 11:12. This was one way in which the primitive Christians very much showed their respect to their ministers, they accompanied them in their journeys, to keep them in countenance, to be their guard, and, as there was occasion, to minister to them; with a further prospect, not only of doing them service, but of being edified by their converse. It seems it was above a day's journey, near two, from Joppa to Cesarea; for it was the day after they set out that they entered into Cesarea, v. 24, and the afternoon of that day, v. 30. Probably they travelled on foot; the apostles generally did so. When they came, Peter found Cornelius waiting for them, and that he was expected by many. As Peter brought some with him, so Cornelius had called together, not only his own family, but his kinsmen and near friends, which would give Peter a larger opportunity of doing good. It ought to be both given and taken as a kindness and respect to our kindred and friends, to invite them to join us in religious exercises, to go with us to hear a good sermon.

3. At the first interview, Cornelius, instead of embracing Peter as a friend, which would have been very acceptable, fell at his feet, and worshipped him; some think, as a prince, and a great man, according to the usage of the eastern countries; [cut, Is. 49:23.]; others, as an incarnate deity, or as if he took him to be the Messiah Himself. His worshipping a man was indeed culpable; but, considering his present ignorance, it was excusable, nay, an evidence of something in him very commendable,—a great veneration for divine and heavenly things: no wonder if, till he was better informed, he took him to be the Messiah, and therefore worshipped him, whom he was ordered to send for by an angel from heaven. But the worshipping of his pretended successor, who is not only a man, but a sinful man, the man of sin himself, is altogether inexcusable, and such an absurdity as would be incredible, if we were not told before, that all the world would worship the beast, Rev. 13:4. But Peter shrunk [with horror] from this worship; as did the angel, Rev. 19:10, 22:9. And how careful was Paul that no man should think of him above what he saw in him! 2 Cor. 12:6. Christ's faithful servants could better bear to be vilified than deified.

4. The account Peter and Cornelius give to each other, and to the company, of the hand of heaven in bringing them together, v. 27. Peter went in, talking familiarly with Cornelius; endeavoring, by the freedom of his converse, to take off that dread he seemed to have of him. Those Gentiles, v. 28, 29, knew it had never been allowed by the Jews, but always looked upon as unlawful, for a native Jew, to keep company, or come unto one of another nation, a stranger, an uncircumcised Gentile. It was not made so by the law of God, but by the decree of their wise men, which they looked upon to be no less obliging. They did not forbid them to converse or traffic with Gentiles, but to eat with them, Gen. 43:32, Dan. 1:8. They might not come into the house of a Gentile, for they looked upon it to be ceremonially polluted. Thus scornfully did the Jews look upon the Gentiles, who were not behindhand in contempt, as appears by many implied in its consequences the abolition of the ritual law, which God Himself had given to Israel, this fact was immediately revealed to him; and he was ordered to go with the messengers without scruple or hesitation.—God had directed Cornelius, by the angel, to send these messengers, yet 'the Spirit said to Peter, I have sent them;' this is the language of Deity and personality. 20. Peter took with him [in a matter so weighty, note, v. 9—16, lat. part.] some of the believers, who dwelt at Joppa, that they might witness, and be ready to attest, the whole of what passed on this unprecedented occasion.

(23.) 'It was reckoned 15 hours from Cesarea to Joppa.' BL.—In the E. has a man from a distant village some business with you, he comes not alone, but brings a large company of his neighbors and friends. Ask why they came, the answer is "because he did." People are often thus seen far from their homes, with no other reason than "we came with him." See the man going to a court of justice, he is accompanied by a large band of his acquaintances, who canvass all the probabilities of the case, and have a salvo for every exigency. Perhaps a love of show is one motive; but the desire to have witnesses of what is said or done, or to have help at hand in case of any emergency, are other reasons for their love of company. The Oriental is like the granivorous animals of his native deserts, who are all more or less gregarious in their habits; and as it is, so it was in the most remote antiquity. Comp. Ps. 34:7, Prov. 27:17, and many other scriptures.

V. 25, 26. 'If Cornelius had desired to kiss Peter's toe, would Peter have allowed him? Yet truly it is Peter's vicegerent, who requires kings to kiss his slipper!' Beza.

(25.) Worshipped. 'Proskunein denotes, a total and reverential prostration of the body to the earth: a mark of profound respect, which the Jews and other Orientals rendered, not to kings only, but also to persons of high dignity. But the Romans yielded this homage to the Deity only; and therefore Peter declines it, by saying, I myself also am a man. Yet it does not follow that Cornelius meant to have transferred the honor due to the Deity, to Peter; for he was devout and fearing God, (v. 2.) but, struck with reverential awe at the sight of a divine legate, he could not preserve the due distinction between the honor to be rendered to the ambassador and the Principal. Quin. So Chrysostom. There is no reason to suppose, (with Grot.) that Cornelius took Peter for an angel, whatever the Lystrians might do, 14:11, 13. Moreover, if Peter was justified in declining this mark of profound respect, knowing that among the Romans it was reserved for divinities only, yet the centurion may be held in some degree excused for offering it; knowing, as he did, that the custom of the E. allowed of such reverential homage from man to man; though Peter, most judiciously, discourages it, as leading to evil.' BL.—The Codex Bezae, and the latter Syriac, in the margin, read this very differently from all other MSS. and vers.; thus, But as Peter drew nigh to Cesarea, one of the servants ran before, and told that he was come: then Cornelius leaped up, and met him, and falling at his feet he worshipped him.

V. 28. 'Schoettgen and Mich. observe, that there is no command in the Law of Moses, forbidding familiar intercourse with the Gentiles, [comp. on v. 2.] but that this was an interdict of the Jewish Doctors, who had burdened the Mosaic Law with many added injunctions. Bp. Pearce, here, cites Jos. "those strangers who came to us on any other account but that of religion, he (Moses) permitted not to be mixed with us in any familiarities." And so elsewhere in Jos. Tacitus says, the Jews entertained "Apud ipsos fides obstinata, misericordia in promptu, adversus omnes alios hostile odium." [Among one another obstinate faith, ready mercy; towards all others hostility and hate.]—Schoettgen remarks, that even the Jews acknowledged, that God would not wholly reject the Gentiles; citing Schemoth Rabba, on Joh 31:32. (The stranger did not lodge in the street.) "For God doth not account any one profane, but receiveth all. The gates are open at all hours, (comp. Acts 14:27.) and he that will, may enter."—Now (says Schoett.) considering that the above tradition was not unknown among the Jews, it may justly be thought strange, that Peter should have been censured, 11:3. But, the truth in question, though, beyond all doubt, known to the more ancient Jews, was afterwards choaked by the arrogance of the Pharisees, of which our Lord often complains. This pernicious prejudice, therefore, the Jewish converts having first contracted from the Pharisees, still retained."

V. 29. 'Peter asks, "for what, &c." hecnise (and so Chrysostom) he wished them to make confession, and become engaged to the faith. Quin., too, observes, it was done to inform his companions. And so Doddr., who with his accustomed good taste observes, that the repetition of the circumstance gives a dignity and spirit to Peter's succeeding discourse, beyond what we could otherwise so sensibly receive. Id.

30 And Cornelius said, Four days ago I was fasting until this hour; and at the ninth hour I prayed in my house; and, behold, a man stood before me in bright clothing, 31 And said, Cornelius, thy prayer is heard, and thine alms are had in remembrance in the sight of God.

32 Send therefore to Joppa, and call hither Simon, whose surname is Peter: he is lodged in the house of one Simon a tanner, by the seaside; who, when he cometh, shall speak unto thee.

33 Immediately therefore I sent to thee: and thou hast well done that thou art come. Now therefore are we all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God.

34 ¶ Then Peter opened his mouth, and said, Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons:

35 But in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him.

36 The word which God sent unto the children of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ; (he is Lord of all;)

37 passages in the Latin poets. Ceremonial characters were abolished, that more regard might be had to moral ones. Peter thought it necessary to let them know, how he came to change his mind in this matter, by a divine revelation, lest he should be upbraided with lightness. God having thus taken down the partition-wall, he assures them of his readiness to do them all the good offices he can, and inquires wherein he may be serviceable to them. Cornelius, on the other hand, declares, it was purely in obedience to God's directions that he had sent for him: directions received while he was fasting, by which it appears, that religious fasting, in order to the greater seriousness and solemnity of praying, was used by devout people that were not Jews; as at Jonah 3: 5. He describes the messenger, (Comp. 1: 10. Luke 24: 4.) and repeats the message that was sent him, v. 31, 32. just as we had it, v. 4—6. Only here it is said, Thy prayer is heard. We are not told what his prayer was, but we may suppose, that, finding the deficiency of natural light, it was that God would make some further discoveries of Himself to him, and of the way of salvation. 'Peter shall give thee such a discovery.' He declares his own and his friends' readiness to receive the message he had to deliver, v. 33. Observe, The religious, serious state of their minds, their reverent respect, and their docility, v. 33. The truths of Christ were not communicated to the apostles to be published or stifled as they thought fit, [nor are they to us,] but intrusted with them [and us] to be published to the world. [Note, Luke 24: 36—48.]

V. 34—43. We have here an abstract or summary of Peter's sermon to Cornelius and his friends. It is admirably suited to the circumstances of those to whom he preached it.

I. Because they were Gentiles: he shows that, notwithstanding, they were interested in the Gospel of Christ, which he had to preach, and entitled to the benefit of it, on an equal foot with the Jews. It was necessary that this should be cleared, or else with what comfort could either he preach or they hear? He therefore lays down this as an undoubted principle, that God is no respecter of persons; doth not know favor in judgment, as the Heb. phrase is; which magistrates are forbidden to do, Deut. 1: 17. 16: 19. Prov. 24: 23. and are blamed for doing, Ps. 82: 2. And it is often said of God, that He doth not respect persons, Deut. 10: 17. 2 Chr. 19: 7. Job 34: 19. Rom. 2: 11. Col. 3: 25. 1 Pet. 1: 17. He doth not give judgment in favor of a man, for the sake of any external advantage foreign to the merits of the cause. God, as a Benefactor, gives favors arbitrarily and by sovereignty, Deut. 7: 7, 8. 9: 5, 6. Mat. 20: 10. but not, as a Judge;

but in every nation, and under every denomination, he that fears God, and works righteousness, is accepted of Him, v. 35.

The case is plainly thus. Though God has favored the Jews, above other nations, yet He will not therefore accept any particular persons, if they allow themselves in immoralities contradictory to their profession; and particularly in persecution, which was now, more than any other, the national sin of the Jews. He never did, nor ever will, reject or refuse an honest Gentile, who, though he has not the privileges and advantages the Jews have, yet, like Cornelius, fears God, and worships Him, and works righteousness, is just and charitable towards all men, who lives up to the light he has, both in a sincere devotion, and in a regular conversation, whatever nation he is of, though ever so far remote from kindred to the seed of Abraham; though ever so despicable, nay, though in ever so ill a name, that shall be no prejudice to him. God judges of men by their hearts, not by their country or parentage; and wherever He finds an upright man, He will be found an upright God, Ps. 18: 25. Observe, Fearing God, and working righteousness, must go together; for as righteousness toward men is a branch of true religion, so religion toward God is a branch of universal righteousness. Not that any man, since the fall, can obtain the favor of God, otherwise than through the mediation of Jesus Christ, and by the grace of God in Him; but those that have not the knowledge of Him, and therefore cannot have an explicit regard to Him, may yet receive grace from God for his sake, to fear God, and to work righteousness; and wherever God gives grace to do so, as He did to Cornelius, He will, through Christ, accept the work of his own hands.

Now, I. This was always a truth, before Peter perceived it; it was the fixed rule of judgment from the beginning, Gen. 4: 7. God will not ask, in the great day, what country men were of, but what they were, what they did, and how they stood affected toward Him and toward their neighbors. 2. Yet now it was made more dear than it had been; this great truth had been darkened by the covenant of peculiarity made with Israel; the ceremonial law was a wall of partition between them and other nations; in it,

V. 31. Thy prayer is heard.] 'Cornelius prayed and fasted and gave alms. It was in this way he looked for salvation; not to purchase it: a thought of this kind does not appear to have entered into his mind; but these were the means he used to get his soul brought to the knowledge of the truth.'

V. 33. The circumstances, preceding Peter's coming to Cornelius and his friends, rendered an implicit faith in his words most reasonable and proper, even previous to a comparison of them with the sacred oracles, the standard and test of truth.

V. 34, 35. 'To respect persons,' is entirely different from discriminating characters, or conferring unmerited favors on one man, and not on another. A judge respects persons, if he condemns one and acquits another, or decides in favor of the injurious party, from partiality to his friend, or to one of his own nation, sect, or party: yet in private life, he may send a present to what friend he pleases, or dispense his alms to what poor persons he chooses, without giving others a ground for charging him with 'respect of persons.' Mat. 20: 1—16, v. 15. [So the Creator, who maketh men, and maketh them to differ from each other, from brutes, trees, or angels, may make them to differ in privileges.] If God had accepted a man's worship because he was a Jew, and rejected that of another man, of exactly the same dispositions and character, because he was a Gentile; there would have been some reason to assert, that He was 'a respecter of persons;' or if He had favored a proud, wicked, or hypocritical Jew, merely on account of his circumcision, or relation to Abraham; and rejected a humble, pious, believing, sincere worshipper, because of his uncircumcision, or his Gentile extraction; there would have been an evident ground for the charge. Yet the Jews in general carried their ideas of God's special favor to their nation so far, as fully to involve these consequences. It does not, however, follow, that God will accept from any man that service, which is destitute of spiritual good; or that any man will do what is spiritually good, without 'regenerating grace;' or that God is bound in justice to give his special grace to an unconverted man, because of his external decency of character, or formal services; or that He may not confer this unmerited favor on any one, as He sees good, without 'respecting persons;' or that the fruits of grace can claim, or meet acceptance, on any other ground, than that of the covenant of mercy, through the righteousness and atonement of our Divine Surety. In short, where the essence of true religion is found, God graciously accepts it without regarding names, forms, or sects.—'I think this text proves, that God would sooner send an angel to direct pious and upright persons to the knowledge of the Gospel, than suffer them to perish by ignorance of it. But so far from intimating, that such persons may be found among those that reject Christianity, . . . it determines nothing as to their existence in every nation.' Doddr. Rom. 2: 7—16. Does universal history, ancient and modern, bring to our knowledge one person, who, without revelation, in some way or degree, was a humble penitent, a spiritual worshipper of God, a conscientious worker of righteousness, in his habitual conduct; in one word, a Cornelius? If it do not, all advanced from this passage about virtuous heathens is wholly foreign to the purpose. Their virtue was not and is not good 'before God.'

(35.) 'Let it be observed, that no man can be accepted with God, who does not live up to the advantages of that state in which Providence has placed him. . . . Many irreligious men, in order to get rid of the duties and obligations of Christianity, quote this v. in their favor, while they reject all the Gospel besides, and roundly assert, as they think on the authority of this text, that they need neither believe in Jesus Christ, attend to his Gospel, nor use his ordinances; for if they fear God and work righteousness, they shall infallibly be accepted of Him. Let such know . . . that, as they are born and live under the Gospel of Jesus Christ, God, the Judge, will require that they fear Him, and work righteousness, according to the LIGHT afforded by that very GOSPEL. . . . In the face of such a requisition as this, how will the poor heathen virtue of one born in the pale of Christianity appear?' Dr. A. CLARKE.

V. 36—43. The apostle next proceeded to state the substance of the instruction, he was sent to communicate. This indeed would scarcely have been necessary, if Cornelius had been so 'accepted' for his good works, as not to need the righteousness and atonement of Christ; or if, as numbers argue, every man might be saved by his own religion, if sincere in it.—This should be considered as only an abstract of Peter's discourse; and as he was interrupted in it, by the descent of the Holy Spirit, we need not wonder, that various points of Christian doctrine are not explicitly stated in it; for they were left to be communicated afterwards, and by degrees.—(41) Chosen before.] Here only. Our Lord 'called whom He would . . . and He ordained twelve.' Mark 3: 13, 14. Thus they were 'chosen of God:' for says Jesus, 'I and the Father are One.'

(36, 37.) 'Passing over rash emendations, I accede to Erasmus, (adopted by the Eng. vers., Schmid, Heumann, Bolten, Beck, Heinr., and Kuin.) and tr. "The doctrine which God caused to be delivered to the Israelites, announcing salvation by Jesus Christ, (He is the Lord of all.) you yourselves know; the doctrine, I say, which was promulgated through all Judea," &c.—Lord of all.] And so intends the salvation of all.—Know.] Ositate: here, not full and accurate knowledge, but, in a

it was true, God favored that notion, Rom. 3:1,2. 9:4. and from thence particular persons among them were ready to infer, that they were sure of God's acceptance, though they lived as they listed ; and that no Gentile could possibly be accepted of God. God had said a great deal by the prophets to prevent and rectify this mistake, but now at length He doth it effectually, by abolishing the covenant of peculiarity, and repealing the ceremonial law, and so setting the matter at large, and both Jew and Gentile on the same level before God ; and Peter is here made to perceive it, by comparing the vision which he had with that Cornelius had. Now in Christ Jesus, it is plain, neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, Gal. 5:6. Col. 3:11.

II. Because they were Gentiles, inhabiting a place within the confines of the land of Israel, he refers them to what they themselves could not but know concerning the life and doctrine, the preaching and miracles, the death and sufferings of our Lord Jesus ; for these were things, the report of which spread into every corner of the nation, v. 37, &c.

1. They knew in general the Word, i. e. the Gospel, which God sent to the children of Israel, v. 37. Though the Gentiles were not admitted to hear it, yet they could not but hear of it, it was all the talk, both of city and country. We are often told in the gospels, how the fame of Christ went into all parts of Canaan, when He was on earth, as afterward the fame of his Gospel went into all parts of the world, Rom. 10:18. That Word, that Divine Word, that Word of power and grace, you know, what the purport of this Word was, peace by Jesus Christ ; reconciling the world to Himself : and to whom it was sent, to the children of Israel, in the first place : this all their neighbors heard of, Ps. 126:3.

2. They knew the several matters of fact relating to this Word of the Gospel sent to Israel. (1.) The baptism of repentance, which John preached by way of introduction to it, Mark 1:1. What an extraordinary man John was, and what a direct tendency his preaching had to prepare the way of the Lord. (2.) That immediately after John's baptism, the Gospel of Christ, that word of peace, was published throughout all Judea, and that it took rise from Galilee. (3.) That Jesus of Nazareth, when here on earth, went about doing good, both to the souls and the bodies of men, and never did hurt to any. (4.) More particularly, that he healed all that were oppressed of the devil ; by this it appeared, not only that He was sent of God, as it was a kindness to men ; but that He was sent to destroy the works of the devil ; for thus He obtained many a victory over him. (5.) They knew the Jews put Him to death ; slew Him, by hanging Him on a tree.

All this they knew ; but lest they should think it was only a report, and magnified, as reports usually are ; Peter, for himself and the rest of the apostles, attests it, v. 39. We are witnesses, eyewitnesses, and earwitnesses of the doctrine He preached.

3. They did know, or might know, by all this, that He had a commission from heaven to preach and act as He did. This he still takes occasion to hint to them. Let them know, (1.) That this Jesus is Lord of all ; it comes in in a parenthesis, but is the principal proposition intended to be proved, that Jesus Christ, by whom peace is made between God and man, is Lord of all ; not only as God over all blessed for evermore, but as Mediator, all power both in heaven and in earth is put into his hand, and all judgment committed to Him. He is Lord of angels, Lord of the powers of darkness, for He hath triumphed over them. He is King of nations, has a power over all flesh ; He is King of saints, all the children of God are his scholars, his subjects, his soldiers. (2.) That God anointed Him with the Holy Ghost and with power, He was both authorized and enabled to do what He did by a divine anointing ; whence He was called Christ,—i. e. the Messiah,—i. e. the Anointed One. The Holy Ghost descended on Him, at his baptism, and He was full of power, both in preaching and working miracles, which was the seal of a divine mission. (3.) That God was with Him, v. 38. His works were wrought in God ; God not only sent Him, but was present with Him all along, owned Him, stood by Him, and carried Him on in all his services and sufferings. Those whom God anoints He will accompany ; He will Himself be with those to whom He has given his Spirit.

III. Because they had heard no more for certain concerning this Jesus, Peter declares to them his resurrection from the dead, and the proofs of it. Probably, they had heard at Cesarea—some talk of this ; but it was soon silenced by that vile suggestion of the Jews, that his disciples came by night and stole Him away. Therefore Peter insists on this, as the main support of that Word which preacheth peace by Jesus Christ.

1. The power by which He rose is incontestably divine, v. 40. Him God raised up the third day ; which not only disproved all the calumnies and accusations He was laid under by men, but effectually proved God's acceptance of the satisfaction He made for the sin of man by the blood of his cross.

2. The proofs of his resurrection were incontestably clear ; for God showed Him openly. He gave Him to be made manifest, to be visible, evidently so ; so He appears, as that it appears beyond contradiction to be He, and not another. It was such a showing of Him, as amounted to a demonstration of the truth of his resurrection. He showed Him not publicly, indeed, (it was not open in that sense,) but evidently ; not to all the people, who had been the witnesses of his death ; but a sufficient number saw Him, to attest the truth of his resurrection ; the testator's declaring his last will and testament need not be before all the people, it is enough that it be before a competent number of credible witnesses ; so the resurrection of Christ was proved before sufficient witnesses. (1.) They were not so by chance, but were chosen before of God to be witnesses of it, and, in order to that, had intimate converse with Him ; that, having known Him so intimately before, they might the better be assured it was He. (2.) They had not a sudden and transient view of Him, but a great deal of free conversation with Him ; they did eat and drink with Him, after He rose from the dead ; they saw Him without any terror or consternation, which might have rendered them incompetent witnesses, for they saw Him so frequently, and He conversed with them so familiarly, that they did eat and drink with Him. It is brought as a proof of the clear view the nobles of Israel had of the glory of God, Ex. 24:11. that they saw God, and did eat and drink.

IV. He concludes with an inference from all this, that therefore that which they all ought to do, was, to believe in this Jesus. Observe,

1. Why ; faith has reference to a testimony, and the Christian faith is built on the foundation of us the apostles, and the prophets, popular way, "hear and know ;" as in 2:22. 5:7. 9:13. and so Kuiv. Philip had preached at Cesarea, 8:42.

(37.) That word.] 'The report concerning Jesus they had heard.' Doddr. But, says BL., rēma is here put for logos, doctrine ; as in Rom. 10:8. Eph. 5:26. Heb. 6:5. John 3:34.

(38.) Anointed.] 'Echrisen : chriein properly signifies to sprinkle, anoint with oil, or unguents : and since anointing formed a solemn rite of inaugurating and appointing kings, so it came to denote generally, create, appoint, &c. : and as unction was supposed to confer certain powers, so the word came to mean, as here, invest, endue with power. In the phrase, "with the Holy Ghost and with power," we have an hendiadis for "the powers and endowments of the Holy Spirit." BL.

(41.) Not to all.] Compelled belief loses its moral value, and ceases to be an index of the character : the state of the heart, the will, has much to do with belief. Now the tendency to believe spiritual truth, on sufficient evidence, indicates a preparedness to profit by it, and to digest and assimilate it, till it becomes a part of the immortal nature : not so, when truth is thrust upon the unwilling ; then the greatest miracles only harden, excite opposition, shut out truth, in fact : the whole N. T. is full of instances. Besides, if each one then living had a right to demand ocular, logical, or mathematical demonstration, instead of moral, then each person now has a right to demand, horrid thought ! that Christ should be again crucified before his eyes, and that he should, with those same eyes, see Him ascend to heaven ! ED.—Not to all the people.] 'Many valuable writers (see Ditton, Burnet, Sykes, Fleming, Blackwall, Atterbury, &c.) have vindicated the wisdom and righteousness . . . which ordered, that Christ should not appear publicly after his resurrection. . . . I shall only observe, in one word, that as God was by no means obliged to give that perverse people, the Jews, the highest and most striking degree of evidence that could be imagined ; so it is certain, that the evidence He gave of this fact [the resurrection of Christ] by the miraculous gifts conferred on chosen witnesses of it, was of a nature capable of being conveyed to the world in general, in a much more convincing manner, than Christ's appearance in the temple, for several succeeding days, could have been.' Doddr.

V. 41—43. (11:4—17.) It does not appear that the descent of the Holy Spirit, on this occasion, was accompanied by the same circumstances, as on the day of Pentecost ; but the effects were evident, and similar to those then produced.—(47) Forbid water, &c.] 'These words contain a plain and convincing demonstration of the falsehood of the Quaker's doctrine, that water-baptism is unnecessary to them, who have received the inward baptism of the Spirit : since the apostle here not only declares, that water-baptism ought therefore to be administered to these persons, because they had already been baptized with the Holy Ghost ; but also commands them to be baptized on that account.' Whitby.—It was not necessary for the sacred historian, on such occasions, to 44 ¶ While Peter yet spake these words, the Holy Ghost <sup>r</sup> fell on all them which heard the word.

45 And <sup>q</sup> they of the circumcision which believed were astonished, as many as came with Peter, because that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost :

46 For they heard them <sup>r</sup> speak with tongues, and magnify God. Then answered Peter, 47 Can <sup>r</sup> any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we ?

48 And he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord. Then prayed they him to tarry certain days.

to whose writings we have reason to think Cornelius and his friends were no strangers.

2. What they must believe concerning Him. (1.) That we are all accountable to Christ as our Judge; this the apostles were commanded to testify to the world; that this Jesus is ordained of God to be the Judge of the quick and dead, v. 42. He hath assured us of this, in that He hath raised Him from the dead, ch. 17:31. so that it is the great concern of every one of us, in the belief of this, to seek his favor, and to make Him our Friend. (2.) That if we believe in Him, we shall all be justified by Him as our Righteousness, v. 43. The prophets, when they spake of the death of Christ, did witness this, that through his name, for his sake, and on the account of his merit, whosoever believeth in Him, Jew or Gentile, shall receive remission of sins. That is the great thing we need, without which we are undone, and which the convinced conscience is most inquisitive after, which the carnal Jews promised themselves from their ceremonial sacrifices and purifications, yea, and the heathen, too, [did and do,] from their atonements, but all in vain; it is to be had only through the name of Christ, and only by those that believe in his name; and they that do so, may be assured of it; their sins shall be pardoned, and there shall be no condemnation to them. And the remission of sins lays a foundation for all other favors and blessings, by taking that out of the way, that hinders them.

V. 44—48. Here is the issuic of Peter's sermon.

I. God's owning Peter's word, by conferring the Holy Ghost on the hearers, immediately on their hearing it, v. 44. while Peter was yet speaking, even as on the apostles at first; so Peter saith, ch. 11:15. Therefore, some think, it was with a rushing mighty wind, and in cloven tongues, as that was. Observe,

1. When the Holy Ghost fell on them; while Peter was preaching. Thus were the signs of an apostle wrought among them, 2 Cor. 12:12. Though Peter could not give the Holy Ghost, yet the Holy Ghost being given along with the word of Peter, by that it appeared he was sent of God. The Holy Ghost fell on others after they were baptized, for their confirmation; but on these Gentiles before they were baptized: to show that God is not tied to a method, nor confines Himself to external signs. The Holy Ghost fell on those that were neither circumcised nor baptized; for it is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing.

2. How it appeared that the Holy Ghost was fallen upon them, v. 46. They spake with tongues which they never learned; perhaps it intimated that they were all designed for ministers, and by this first descent of the Spirit on them were qualified (both to read the O. T. and) to preach the Gospel. But observe, when they spake with tongues, they magnified God, they spake of Christ and the benefits of redemption, which Peter had been preaching of, to the glory of God. Thus did they on whom the Holy Ghost first descended, ch. 2:11. With whatever gift we are endued, we ought to honor God, and particularly with the gift of speaking, and all the improvements of it.

3. What impression it made on the believing Jews that were present, v. 45. those six that came with Peter; it surprised them exceedingly, perhaps gave them some uneasiness, because that upon the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost, which they thought had been appropriated to their own nation. Had they understood the Scriptures of the O. T., which pointed at this, it would not have been such an astonishment to them; but by our mistaken notions of things, we create difficulties to ourselves in the methods of divine providence and grace.

II. Peter's owning God's work, in baptizing those on whom the Holy Ghost fell. Observe,

1. Though they had received the Holy Ghost, yet it was requisite they should be baptized; though God is not tied to instituted ordinances, we are; and no extraordinary gifts set us above them, but rather oblige us so much the more to conform to them. Some in our days would have argued, 'These are baptized with the Holy Ghost, and therefore what need have they to be baptized with water? It is below them.' No; it is not below them, while water-baptism is an ordinance of Christ, and the door of admission into the visible church, and a seal of the new covenant.

2. Though Gentiles, yet, having received the Holy Ghost, they might be admitted to baptism, v. 47. The argument is conclusive; can we deny the sign to those who have received the thing signified? Surely, they that have received the Spirit as well as we, ought to receive baptism as well as we; for it becomes us to take those into communion with us, whom God hath taken into communion with Himself. Now it appears, why the Spirit was given them before they were baptized,—because otherwise Peter could not have persuaded himself to baptize them, any more than to have preached to them, if he had not been ordered to do it by a vision; at least,

PRACT. OBS. What will become of those who, without one tenth of the external appearance of Cornelius' piety and charity, presume that they shall go to heaven on the score of their good works, and reject the way of salvation, by faith in Jesus Christ?—The sublime subjects, which pertain to redemption through the blood of the Son of God, seem more proper for the tongues of angels to proclaim, than for us poor worms of the earth. Doubtless in many respects, they could preach them unspeakably better: yet our humiliating and thankful experience may balance something on the other side. In that case, however, it would not be so evident, that 'the excellency of the power,' which makes the Word successful, is wholly 'of God:' nor would their presence and language be so suited to man's weakness, or so conducive to his comfort.—When pious persons conscientiously deny themselves, in obedience to what they deem the command of God, without self-righteousness or spiritual pride; their conduct may evidence their sincerity, and exhibit to others a very useful example; even should it appear that they were mistaken in their scruples; and in this view, the apostle's readiness to endure hunger rather than eat forbidden food, and his scrupulous exactness in this respect, during his whole past life, convey to us important and humiliating instructions.—The company of those, who are collected together into the church of God, being truly converted, will become all of 'one mind and judgment,' in the grand concerns of religion; they have the same faith, hope, and love, and the same motives and distinguishing principles; and their several natural dispositions, being corrected, regulated, and moderated by sanctifying grace, render them more qualified in different ways to serve the common cause of the Gospel. Let us then learn 'not to call those common' whom God has cleansed, or to despise those whom He has received; and not to neglect or despair of those, whom He may yet call to the knowledge of Himself.—But how strong must prejudice be, when so many divine motions were requisite, to induce an apostle to attend on a man of fair character and good report, who by the warning of an angel had sent for him, that he might receive the instructions of life from his lips!—This inward baptism of the Spirit is especially to be valued; yet outward ordinances should not be neglected; and those who conclude that they have no occasion for the external signs, because they have received the internal grace of the covenant, speak and act in a very unscriptural manner, and give reason for suspecting that they deceive themselves; yet if we have both the 'outward sign and the inward spiritual grace,' it is not of much importance, in what order we have received them.—But surely, we sinners of the Gentiles should read this ch. with peculiar gratitude and admiring praise: thus the partition-wall was broken down, the law of ordinances that was against us was abolished, the door of mercy was opened to us; that we might become fellow-heirs with the ancient people of God, in all the blessings of his covenant and salvation. May the Lord speedily recal the Jews into the church, and bring in the 'fulness of the Gentiles;' that 'his name may be hallowed,' his kingdom established, and 'his will done,' throughout the whole earth, as it is by all the angels and saints in heaven!

repeat the appointed form [if there was any, ED.] of Christian baptism; and therefore the special confession of Jesus, as the Messiah, the Son of God, is alone noticed. But there seems no ground to doubt, that the form also was adhered to. It is rather taken for granted, that the apostles, and primitive teachers, adhered to the instruction of their Lord just before his ascension; and it was therefore needless to mention that circumstance in the narrative.—It is not said, that the brethren who accompanied Peter were pastors; but it is probable, that some of them were. There had been Christians at Joppa for a considerable time: and either those who first collected a church in that city, appointed pastors; or, Peter, when he went thither, 'set in order this which was wanting.' Tit. 1:5—9. Now it is most natural to suppose, that on so interesting an occasion, Peter would take with him, as witnesses, some of the pastors of the church, and not exclusively private Christians. Ananias is not said to have been a minister, or pastor; yet it can scarcely be doubted that he was.—(49) To tarry, &c. It cannot be supposed, but that Peter lived with these converted Gentiles, according to their usual habits, as to eating, and other things of that nature, after all which had preceded his going among them, without any special regard to the ceremonial law. This may be of use, if recollected, in forming our judgment on some other portions of this history. SCOTT.

(44—46.) 'Peter must be understood as meaning, that they had received the miraculous effusion of the Holy Spirit, as he himself had, and the rest of the apostles.'

(45.) They of the circumcision,—were astonished. 'The Jews had long ago a proverb among them, "That the Holy Spirit never rests on a heathen." This astonishment shows, that notion prevailed even in these Christians, whether the proverb was so old or not.' DODDR.

(47.) Can any man forbid water, &c. 'It seems most natural to understand this as Dr. Whitby does, "who can forbid that water should be brought?" In which view of the clause, one would naturally conclude, they were baptized by pouring water upon them, rather than by plunging them into it.' Id.—This is in Doddridge's usual style of modest courtesy; but the case in our day justifies and even requires a more decided and positive manner. Not only is Whitby's understanding of the passage 'most natural,' but there is no propriety in supposing it can be consistently understood in any other sense; and sprinkling may as 'naturally' be supposed as pouring: in no sense is plunging ever to be thought of as having been the method; the application of the element to the subject, and not the subject to the element, is necessarily and plainly implied.

CHAP. XI.

AND the apostles and brethren, that were in Judea, heard that the Gentiles had also received the word of God.

<sup>5</sup> I was in the city of Joppa, praying: and in a trance I saw a vision, A certain vessel descend, as it had been a great sheet let down from heaven by four corners; and it came even to me:

<sup>6</sup> Upon the which when I had fastened mine eyes, I considered, and saw four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air.

<sup>8</sup> But I said, Not so, Lord: for nothing common or unclean hath at any time entered into my mouth.

<sup>10</sup> And this was done three times: and all were drawn up again into heaven.

<sup>11</sup> And, behold, immediately there were three men already come unto the house where I was, sent from Cesarea unto me.

<sup>12</sup> And the Spirit <sup>b</sup> bade me go with them, nothing doubting. Moreover, these six brethren accompanied me; and we entered into the man's house:

<sup>13</sup> And he shewed us how he had seen an angel in his house, which stood and said unto him, Send men to Joppa, and call for Simon, whose surname is Peter;

<sup>17</sup> Forasmuch then as God <sup>g</sup> gave them the like gift as he did unto us who believed on the Lord Jesus Christ, what <sup>h</sup> was I, that I could withstand God?

he could not have avoided the censure of those of the circumcision that believed. Thus is there one unusual step of divine grace taken after another to bring the Gentiles into the church. How well is it for us, that the grace of God is so much more extensive than the charity even of good men!

<sup>3</sup> Peter did not baptize them himself, but commanded them to be baptized, v. 48. Probably some of the brethren, who came with him, did it by his order, and he declined it for the same reason Paul did,—lest those baptized by him should think the better of themselves for it; or he should seem to have baptized in his own name, 1 Cor. 1:15. The business of baptizing was ordinarily devolved on the inferior ministers; these acted by the orders of the apostles, who might therefore be said to do it.

Lastly, Their owning both Peter's work and God's work in their desire of further advantage by Peter's ministry. They prayed him to tarry certain days. Note, 1. Those who have some acquaintance with Christ, cannot but covet more. 2. Even those that have received the Holy Ghost, must see their need of the ministry of the Word.

CHAP. XI. V. 1-18. I. Intelligence of the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles, was presently brought to the church in Jerusalem, and thereabouts. Some for good-will, and some for ill-will, would spread the report; so that before Peter was returned to Jerusalem, the apostles and the brethren there, and in Judea, heard that the Gentiles also had received the Word of God, i. e. the Gospel of Christ; which is not only a word of God, but the Word of God; for it is the summary and centre of all divine revelation. They received Christ; for his name is called, the Word of God, Rev. 19:13. Not only that dispersed Jews and proselyted Gentiles, but Gentiles themselves, with whom [Jewish bigotry] had hitherto thought it unlawful to hold common conversation, were taken into church communion, had received the Word of God. It is likely they had got a notion, that if the Gospel were preached to the Gentiles, it would be to no purpose, because the proofs of the Gospel were fetched so much out of the O.T. which the Gentiles did not receive; they looked upon them as not inclined to religion, nor likely to receive the impressions of it; and therefore were surprised to hear that they had. We are too apt to despair of doing good to those who yet, when [properly] tried, prove very tractable.

II. Offence was taken at it by the believing Jews, v. 2, 3. They of the circumcision, Jewish converts that still retained a veneration for circumcision, contended with Peter, charged it on him as a crime, that he went into men uncircumcised, and did eat with them; so far were they from looking upon him as infallible, or as the supreme head of the church that all were accountable to, and he to none. See here, 1. How much it is the bane and damage of the church, to monopolize it, and to exclude those from it, and from the benefit of the means of grace, that are not in everything as we are. These men were of Jonah's mind, who, in a jealousy for his people, was angry that the Ninevites received the Word of God, and justified himself in it. 2. Christ's ministers must not think it strange, if they be censured and quarrelled with, not only by their professed enemies, but by their professing friends; and not only for their follies and infirmities, but for their good actions, seasonably and well done; but if we have proved our own work, we may have rejoicing in ourselves, as Peter had, whatever reflections we may have from our brethren. Those that are zealous and courageous in the service of Christ, must expect to be censured by those who, under pretence of being cautious, are cold and indifferent. Those who are of catholic, generous, charitable principles, must expect to be censured by such as are conceited and strait-laced; who say, Stand by thyself, I am holier than thou.

III. Peter gave such a full and fair account of the matter of fact, as was sufficient, without any further argument or apology, both to justify him, and to satisfy them, v. 4. for it appeared all along God's own work, and not his. It is a good reason why we should be moderate in our censures, and sparing of them, because if we rightly understood that which we are so forward to run down, perhaps we should see cause to run in with it. And when we see others do that which looks suspicious, instead of contending, we should inquire of them what ground they went upon; and if we have not an opportunity to do that, should ourselves put the best construction on it that it will bear, and judge nothing before the time. But it is a debt we owe both to ourselves and to our brethren, to set those actions of ours in a true light, which at first looked ill, and gave offence; that we may remove stumbling-blocks out of our brethren's way.

Peter pleads, 1. That he was instructed by a vision no longer to keep up the ceremonial distinctions; he relates the vision, vs. 5, 6, 13, &c. as we had it before, ch. 10: 9, &c. That which put the matter past all dispute, was, the descent of the Holy Ghost on the Gentile hearers; this completed the evidence, that it was the will of God that he should take the Gentiles into communion. As the apostle argues, Gal. 3:2.

2. By the descent of the Holy Ghost, Peter was put in mind of a saying of his Master's, when leaving them, ch. 1:5. John baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost, v. 16. This plainly intimated, that the Holy Ghost was the gift of Christ, the product and performance of that great promise He left them when He went to heaven, and the gift of it a kind of baptism, more excellent than that of even the Baptist himself. Comparing that promise, so worded, with this gift just now conferred, when the question was started, whether these persons should be baptized or no, he concluded, that the question was determined by Christ Himself, v. 17. Forasmuch then as God gave them the like gift as He did to us; gave it to us as believing in the Lord Jesus Christ, and to them on their believing in Him, What was I, that I could withstand God? Those who hinder the conversion of souls, withstand God; and those take too much upon them, who contrive how to exclude those from their communion, whom God has taken into communion with Himself.

IV. This account not only satisfied them, but turned their censures into praises to God, for what He had done by and with Peter's ministry; Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life! Note, 1. Re-

NOTES. CHAP. XI. V. 1-3. If the believers from among the Jews were so alarmed and offended at Peter, for eating, on such an occasion, with persons of so good a report as Cornelius and his friends; what must have been the thoughts of the Jews in general, concerning the state of the idolatrous and licentious Gentiles? (10:34,35.)—It is not said, that 'the apostles contended' with Peter on this account: yet, if the general opinion had not been unfavorable to his conduct, none would have publicly called him to an account, or have warmly contested the point with him.—This fact is likewise an unanswerable proof, that the primitive church had no idea of Peter's supremacy and infallibility: indeed, the persons concerned by no means rendered due respect to his apostolical authority.

V. 14. Thou, &c.] This is far more full and explicit than the narrative in the preceding ch. Cornelius must himself be saved, not by his prayers and alms, his piety and equity, and charity; but by the words which Peter would speak to him, and by faith in those words; and thus also salvation would come to his family.

Id.

18 When they heard these things, they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles<sup>i</sup> granted repentance unto life.

19 ¶ Now they<sup>j</sup> which were scattered abroad, upon the persecution that arose about Stephen, travelled as far as Phenice, and Cyprus, and Antioch, preaching the word to none but<sup>k</sup> unto the Jews only.

20 And some of them were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, which, when they were come to Antioch, spake unto the<sup>l</sup> Grecians, preaching the Lord Jesus.

21 And the<sup>m</sup> hand of the Lord was with them: and a great number believed, and turned<sup>n</sup> unto the Lord.

22 ¶ Then tidings of these things came unto the ears of the church which was in Jerusalem: and they sent forth<sup>o</sup> Barnabas, that he should go as far as Antioch.

repentance, if true, is unto life, spiritual life; all that truly repent of their sins, evidence it by living a new life, a holy, heavenly, and divine life. 2. Repentance is God's gift; it is not only his free grace that accepts it, but his mighty grace that works it in us; that takes away the heart of stone, and gives us a heart of flesh. The sacrifice of God is a broken spirit; it is He that provides Himself that Lamb. 3. Wherever God designs to give life, He gives repentance; for that is a necessary preparative for the comforts of a sealed pardon and a settled peace in this world, and for the seeing and enjoying of God in the other world. 4. It is [infinite] comfort to us, that God hath exalted his Son Jesus, not only to give repentance to Israel, and the remission of sins, ch. 5:31. but to the Gentiles also.

V. 19—26. We have here an account of the planting and watering of a church at Antioch, the chief city of Syria, reckoned afterward the third city of the empire, only Rome and Alexandria being preferred before it; next to whose patriarch that of Antioch took place. It stood where Hamath or Riblah did, which we read of in the O. T. It is suggested that Luke, the penman of this history, and Theophilus, to whom he dedicates it, were of Antioch; which might be the reason why he takes more notice of the success of the Gospel at Antioch; as also because there it was Paul began to be famous, toward the story of whom he is hastening.

Now concerning the church at Antioch, observe,

1. The first preachers of the Gospel there, were such as were dispersed from Jerusalem by persecution, that persecution which arose five or six years ago, as some compute, at the time of Stephen's death, v. 19. 1. They travelled, preaching, as far as Phenice. When they had preached successfully in Judea, Samaria, and Galilee, they got out of Canaan, and travelled into Phenicia, into the island of Cyprus, and into Syria; though the further they travelled, the more they exposed themselves. Therefore God suffered them to be persecuted, that thereby they might be dispersed in the world. Those that fled from persecution, did not flee from their work; nay, they threw themselves into a larger field of opportunity than before. They carried their religion along with them, not only that they might take the comfort of it themselves, but that they might communicate it to others. Thus the wrath of man is made to praise God.

2. They preached the Word to none but the Jews only, who were dispersed in all those parts, and had synagogues of their own; they did not yet understand that the Gentiles were to be fellow-heirs, but left them either to turn Jews, and so come into the church, or else remain as they were.

3. They particularly applied themselves to the Hellenist Jews, here called the Grecians, that were at Antioch. Many of the preachers were natives of Judea and Jerusalem; some of them, by birth, of Cyprus and Cyrene, as Barnabas himself, ch. 4:36. and Simon, Mark 15:21. but they had had their education in Jerusalem; and these, being themselves Grecian Jews, had a particular concern for those of their own denomination, and applied themselves closely to them at Antioch. Lightfoot says, they were there called Hellenists, or Grecians, because they were Jews of the corporation or enfranchisement of the city; for Antioch was a Syro-grecian city. To them, they preached the Lord Jesus. That was the constant subject of their preaching; what else should the ministers of Christ preach, but Christ, Christ and Him crucified; Christ, and Him glorified?

4. They had wonderful success, v. 21. (1.) The hand of the Lord was with them; which some understand of power to work miracles to confirm their doctrine, Mark 16:20. Heb. 2:4.; but I, rather, of the power of divine grace working on the hearts of the hearers, and opening them, as Lydia's heart was opened, because many saw the miracles who were not converted; but when by the Spirit the understanding was enlightened, and the will bowed to the Gospel of Christ, that was a day of power, in which volunteers were enlisted under the banner of the Lord Jesus, Ps. 110:3. These were not apostles, but ordinary ministers, yet they had the hand of the Lord with them, and did wonders. (2.) Abundance of good was done; A great number believed, and turned unto the Lord; many more than could have been expected; some of all sorts. Observe, what the change was. They believed; they were convinced of the truth of the Gospel, and subscribed to the record God had given in it concerning his Son. The effect and evidence of this was, that they turned unto the Lord; they could not be said to turn from the service of idols, for they were Jews, worshippers of the true God only; but they turned from a confidence

V. 18. It may hence be inferred, that even the disciples did not before consider the professed repentance of a Gentile, however attended with 'works meet for repentance,' to be acceptable with God, unless it led him unreservedly to embrace the religion of the Jews. This proves, that many things, which learned men have stated concerning the proselytes of the gate, and their privileges, rather show what ought to have been the case, than what it really was.—Whitby has here a long note, to evince, that the language of this v. and of similar passages, which state, that repentance and faith are the gift of God, does not imply that they are not conditional, and that they give encouragement to those alone, who perform the conditions; in which important truths are contained, but blended, as it appears to me, with much error.—That repentance and faith, and every kind of obedience, are the duties of every man; that means should be used, by such as desire to perform these duties; and that none receive the gift and grant of God, who live and die in the neglect of the appointed means of grace; are propositions not in the least to be contested. But this learned divine, and many others, seem to forget, that 'the heart of stone,' 'the uncircumcised heart,' 'the carnal mind which is enmity against God,' effectually prevents every man from doing these duties, or properly using those means, or even heartily desiring spiritual blessings, till it be removed by regeneration. 7:51—53. Deut. 30:1—10. Jer. 4:3,4. Ez. 11:17—20. 36:25—27. Rom. 8:5—9. Eph. 2:4—10. Phil. 2:12,13. Hence it is 'God, who worketh in us to will,' as well as to do. 'We have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will.' Art. x.—'He has not only made them the overtures of it; but has graciously wrought it in some of their hearts.' Doddr., in Scott. The inseparable connexion of repentance and eternal life should not pass unnoticed, in this place. SCOTT.

V. 19—21. The words here tr. 'preaching,' do not necessarily imply a public and authoritative proclamation. 8:4, 32—35. 'Speaking the Word to none, but unto the Jews only.' 'They spake unto the Grecians, declaring the glad tidings concerning the Lord Jesus.'—'As in this place the Hellenists are opposed to the Jews; and as the church of Antioch was, as it were, a new Jerusalem for the Gentiles; it appears, that under this term, those were included who had so far profited by their acquaintance with the dispersed Jews, that, condemning idolatry, they acknowledged God, who had spoken by Moses and the prophets, though they remained uncircumcised; of which description Cornelius was, as it is evident from the preceding history.' Beza.—'Instead of Hellenistas, Hellenists, the Alexandrian manuscript, which is favored by the Syriac and some other ancient versions, reads Hellenas, Greeks; which common sense would require us to adopt, even if it were not supported by the authority of any manuscript at all. For as the Hellenists were Jews, there would, on the received reading, be no opposition between the conduct of these preachers, and those mentioned in the preceding verse. Here undoubtedly we have the first account of preaching the Gospel to the idolatrous Gentiles: for it is certain, there is nothing in the word Greeks, to limit it to such as were worshippers of the true God. . . As the Greeks were the most celebrated of the Gentile nations near Judea, the Jews called all the Gentiles by that general name. Rom. 10:12. Gal. 3:23. Col. 3:11.' Doddr.—'It would, in my mind, be far preferable to leave the point undecided, or even to adopt Beza's exposition; than to alter the text, 'without the authority of any manuscript;' for who can say, how far men may proceed in altering the Scriptures by conjectural criticisms, pleading at the same time, that 'common sense requires it?' This, however, is not here the case, for there is good ground to conclude that Greeks is the genuine reading. [So Grot., Beng., Ros., Heinr., Kuin., &c.] The distance of Antioch and Cyprus from Jerusalem, renders it probable, that no worshippers of God, according to the law, except 'Grecians,' or Jews using the Greek and not the Heb. or Syr. language, and reading the Greek translation of the Scriptures in their synagogues, resided in those parts; (Note, 6:1.) and if there were synagogues of Jews, who used the Heb. or Syr., no good reason can be assigned, why the Word of God should be spoken to them only, and not to their brethren, who differed from them in nothing but language. It is, therefore, highly probable, that the persons spoken of addressed, for a considerable time, none but Jews and circumcised proselytes: but that at length, the report of Cornelius' conversion having reached Antioch, which cannot be shown to have been even improbable; some of them were encouraged to preach to uncircumcised persons also: and their great success, by the immediate power of the Lord, accompanying the Word, gave a divine sanction to their proceedings. Upon the whole it is most likely, that at Antioch, and about this time, the Gospel was first preached to idolatrous Gentiles.—Was not the extraordinary success of the Word, and the holy effects which followed by 'the hand of the Lord,' as real a sanction, both to the mission of the preachers, and to their conduct in preaching to the Gentiles, as outward miracles would have been? SCOTT.

(20.) 'Grot., Beng., Ros., Heinr., &c., maintain, that Hellenas, (Greeks,) which is found in some very ancient MSS. Verss. and Fathers, is to be adopted, [instead of Hellenistas,] as being confirmed by the whole context; since Luke, after having narrated the conversion of Cornelius, (v. 19, &c.) goes on to say that, from this time, the Christian doctrine was more widely propagated among the Gentiles, and first at Antioch. Thither, after the martyrdom of Stephen, certain Jerusalemite Christians had come, 8:1. but preached the doctrine of Christ to Jews only. Afterwards, however, when the conversion of Cornelius had been noised abroad, some Cyprians and Cyreneans, converted to Christianity by these Jerusalemite Christians, came to Antioch, and, as being Hellenists, dwelling among Gentiles, and thus so much the more disposed to tolerate and admit pagans, they communicated the doctrine of Christ to the Gentiles dwelling at Antioch.' BLOOMF.

V. 22. 'The apostles do not rashly condemn the extraordinary vocation, but judge of it by its effects.' Beza. SCOTT.

23 Who, when he came, and had seen the grace of God, was glad, and exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord.

24 For he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith: and much people was added unto the Lord.

25 Then departed Barnabas to Tarsus, for to seek Saul:

26 And when he had found him, he brought him unto Antioch. And it came to pass, that a whole year they assembled themselves with the church, and taught much people. And the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch.

in the righteousness of the law, to rely only on the righteousness of Christ; the righteousness which is by faith: they turned from a loose, careless, carnal way of living, to live a holy, heavenly, spiritual, and divine life; they turned from worshipping God in show and ceremony, to worship Him in the spirit, and in truth. They turned to the Lord Jesus, and He became all in all with them.

II. The good work thus begun at Antioch, was carried on to a great perfection; and this church, thus founded, grew to be a flourishing one, by the ministry of Barnabas and Saul; who built on the foundation the other preachers had laid, and entered into their labors, John 4:37, 38.

1. The church at Jerusalem sent Barnabas thither, to strengthen the hands both of preachers and people, and put a reputation on the cause of Christ there. (1.) The apostles there were inquisitive how the work went on, in the countries about; and, it is likely, kept up a correspondence with all parts where preachers were, so that the good tidings of these things, of the great numbers that were converted at Antioch, soon came to the ears of the church that was in Jerusalem, v. 22. Those that are in the most eminent stations in the church, ought to concern themselves for those in a lower sphere. (2.) They despatched Barnabas to them with all speed; they desired him to go, and assist and encourage these hopeful beginnings. They sent him forth, as a representative of their body, to congratulate them on the success of the Gospel among them, as matter of rejoicing both to preachers and hearers, and with both they rejoiced. It was a great way, but, far as it was, he was willing to undertake the journey for a public service. It is probable Barnabas had a particular genius for work of this kind, was active and conversable, and loved to be in motion, delighted in doing good abroad, as much as others in doing good at home, was as much of Zebulun's spirit, who rejoiced in his going out, as others are of Issachar's, who rejoiced in his tent; and his talent lying this way, he was fittest to be employed in this work. God gives various gifts for various services. (3.) Barnabas was wonderfully pleased to find that the Gospel got ground, and that some of his countrymen, men of Cyprus, of which country he was, ch. 4:36. were instrumental in it, v. 23. We must be glad to see the grace of God in others, and the more, when we see it there where we did not expect it. (4.) He did what he could to fix them; to confirm them in the faith, who were converted to the faith. He exhorted them. It is the same word with that by which the name of Barnabas is interpreted, ch. 4:36. a son of exhortation; his talent lay that way, and let him that exhorteth, attend to exhortation, Rom. 12:8. Or, being a son of consolation, (for so we render the word,) he comforted, or encouraged them with purpose of heart to cleave to the Lord. To cleave to the Lord Jesus, is to live a life of dependence on Him, and devotedness to Him; not only to hold Him fast, but to hold fast by Him, to be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. (5.) Herein he gave a proof of his good character, v. 24. He showed himself to be a good man, a good-tempered man, of a very sweet, affable, courteous disposition, that had himself, and could teach others, the art of obliging. Ministers that are so, recommend themselves and their doctrine very much to those that are without. He was a good man, i.e. charitable; so he had approved himself, ch. 4:37. By this it appeared, that he was richly endued with the gifts and graces of the Spirit. The goodness of his natural disposition, would not have qualified him for this service, if he had not been full of the Holy Ghost, and so full of power, by the Spirit of the Lord. He was full of faith, of the Christian faith, of the grace of faith, and the fruits of that faith that works by love; sound in the faith, and therefore pressed others to be so. (6.) He was instrumental to do good, by bringing in those that were without, as well as by building up those that were within; much people were added.

2. The last news we heard of Saul, was, that when his life was sought at Jerusalem, he was sent away to Tarsus, the city where he was born; and, it should seem, he continued there ever since, doing good, no doubt. But now Barnabas takes a journey on purpose to Tarsus, to see what was become of him; to tell him what a door of opportunity was opened at Antioch, and to desire him to come and spend some time with him there, v. 25, 26. And here also it appears, that Barnabas was a good sort of a man, in that he would take so much pains to bring an active, useful man out of obscurity; and, who, being a chief speaker, ch. 14:12.

and, probably, a more popular preacher, would be likely to eclipse him there; but Barnabas is very willing to be so when it is for the public service. If God by his grace enables us to do what good we can, according to the ability we have, we ought to seek the things of Christ more than our own things, and rejoice if others, that have also larger capacities, have larger opportunities, and do more good than we can.

Now here we are further told,

(1.) What service was now done to the church at Antioch. Paul and Barnabas continued a whole year, presiding in their religious assemblies, and preaching the Gospel, v. 26. Observe, the church frequently assembled. Ministers were the masters of those assemblies, and teaching the people is one part of the work of ministers, when they preside in religious assemblies. They are not only to be the people's mouth to God in prayer and praise, but God's mouth to the people in opening the Scriptures, and teaching out of them the good knowledge of the Lord. It is a great encouragement to ministers, when they have opportunity of teaching much people; for preaching is not only for the conviction and conversion of those that are without, but for the instruction and edification of those that are within. A constituted church must have its teachers.

(2.) What honor was now put on the church at Antioch; there the disciples were first called Christians. Probably they called themselves so, incorporated themselves by that title; whether by some solemn act of the church, or ministers, or whether this name insensibly obtained there by its being frequently used in their praying and preaching, we are not told; but it should seem that two such great men as Paul and Barnabas, continuing there so long, being exceedingly followed, and meeting with no opposition, Christian assemblies made a greater figure there than anywhere, and became more considerable, which was the reason of their being called Christians, first, there; which, if there were to be a mother-church to rule over all other churches, would give Antioch a better title to the honor than Rome can pretend to. Hitherto, they who gave up their names to Christ, were called disciples, learners, scholars, trained up under Him, in order to their being employed by Him; but now henceforward they were called Christians. 1st. Thus the reproachful names, their enemies had hitherto branded them with, would, perhaps, be wiped away, and disused. They called them Nazarenes, ch. 24:5. the men of that way, that by-way, which had no name; and thus they prejudiced people against them; to remove which prejudices they gave themselves a name, which their enemies could not but say was proper. 2dly. Thus they, who before their conversion had been distinguished by the names of Jews and Gentiles, might after their conversion be called

V. 24. Good.] 'Agathos: integrity, benignity, and gentleness, united.' Bloomf.

V. 25, 26. Nothing is recorded of [Paul's] success at Tarsus. Mat. 15:54—58. There were, however, churches in Cilicia. (15:36—41.)—(26) Were called Christians.] 'It came to pass, that they' (Paul and Barnabas) 'called the disciples Christians.' This is indisputably the natural construction of the v.—But the word [tr. 'called'] implies, that this was done by divine revelation: for it has generally this signification in the N. T., and is tr. 'warned from God,' or 'warned of God' even when there is no word for God in the Gr. 'The believing Jews and Gentiles, being made one church, that the name of Jew and heathen might no more continue the distance that was betwixt them, this new name was given to them both; as some conceive, according to the prophecy mentioned, Is. 65:15. 'Whitby, in Scott. Their enemies had hitherto called them Nazarenes, or Galileans; and the disciples had called each other 'brethren,' 'believers,' and 'saints;' which names were not sufficiently distinguishing; but the word Christian, aptly denoted their reliance on that anointed Prince and Savior, who was generally rejected with disdain by Jews and Gentiles: it also implied, that they were partakers of an unction by the Holy Spirit, [Temples of that Spirit.] Doubtless it was afterwards used as a term of reproach by their persecutors, though it was so honorable in its meaning and original. At present it is applied promiscuously to so vast and heterogeneous a multitude, that it scarcely implies either honor or reproach: and those who seriously profess to believe and obey Christ are generally distinguished by other names, whether they are spoken of with respect, or in derision. Scott.

(26.) Christians.] 'Was this name given by themselves or others?

That they first applied it to them selves, is not only devoid of authority, but may be disproved by many weighty arguments. For, 1. They would thereby have excited a greater enmity against themselves. 2. Luke, had the Antioch Christians done so, in recording the origin of the name, would undoubtedly in the rest of his work have so employed it; which he has not done. On the contrary, he calls them the believers, the disciples, the brethren, &c.; the very same names by which he had, in the former part of his book, designated them. Furthermore, if at the time when Paul was teaching at Antioch, Christ's followers had voluntarily taken this name, he would have used it in his Epistles; whereas he always employs other terms. Finally, whenever in the N. T. the term Christians occurs, it is applied by persons not professing the Religion; as Acts. 26:23. 1 Pet. 4:14, 16. which see. The name seems meant, therefore, for a reproach. Was it then given by the Jews? Certainly not. By them they were called Nazarenes, Acts 24:5. and, indeed, they would have called them by any name, rather than that which would seem to admit the pretensions of Jesus to the Messiahship.—Beyond all controversy the name was given them by Gentiles, and, very probably, the Romans dwelling at Antioch; as indeed the very Latin form of it suggests: for by that were characterized the partizans of any great man; as Cesariani, Pompeliani, &c. Now by the Antiochians (who, as we learn from Zosimus, and Amm. Marcel., and others cited by Wetst., were not a little prone to scoffs and coarse jokes) they were called Christiani, in derision of the pretensions of Jesus to be King of the Jews. Tacitus says: 'Nero punished with refined cruelty those, hated for their crimes,

27 ¶ And in these days came prophets from Jerusalem unto Antioch.

28 And there stood up one of them, named Agabus, and signified by the Spirit that there should be great dearth throughout all the world: which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cesar.

29 Then the disciples, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea:

by one and the same name; which would help them to forget their former dividing names, and prevent their bringing their former marks of distinction, into the church. 3dly. Thus they studied to do honor to their Master, and showed that they were not ashamed to own their relation to Him, but gloried in it; as the scholars of Plato called themselves Platonists, and so the scholars of other great men. They took their denomination, not from the name of his person, Jesus, but of his office, Christ.—Anointed; so putting their creed into their name, that Jesus is the Christ; and they are willing all the world should know that this is the truth they will live and die by. 4thly. Thus they now owned their dependence on Christ, and their receivings from Him; not only that they believed in Him who is the Anointed, but that through Him they themselves had the anointing, 1 John 2:20, 27. And God is said to have anointed us in Christ, 2 Cor. 1:21. 5thly. Thus they laid on themselves, and all that should ever profess that name, a strong and lasting obligation to submit to the laws of Christ, to follow the example of Christ, and to devote themselves entirely to the honor of Christ; to be to Him for a name, and a praise. Are we Christians? Then we ought to think, and speak, and act, in everything, as becomes Christians, and to do nothing to the reproach of that worthy name by which we are called; that that may not be said to us, which Alexander said to a soldier of his own name, that was noted for a coward,—Either change thy name, or mend thy manners. And as we must look upon ourselves as Christians, and carry ourselves accordingly, so we must look upon others as Christians, and carry ourselves toward them accordingly. A Christian, though not in everything of our mind, should be loved and respected for his sake whose name he bears, because he belongs to Christ. 6thly. Thus whom the vulgar called Christiani. The author of this name, Christ, (i. e. they got their name from the name of their Leader,) was punished by the procurator Pontius Pilate, while Tiberius was emperor. The Christians, however, felt no aversion to the name, but rather reckoned it an honor and retained it. Kuin., Wetst. 'In this view of the subject, I must, upon the whole, acquiesce. The common opinion, however, is, that they applied the name to themselves, or had it given them by Barnabas, or Saul, or Enodius, the first bishop of Antioch. But this is destitute of authority. I must not omit to notice a strange mistake into which Doddr. has fallen, misled by Benson, who explains chrēmatisai [tr. were called] "was done by divine direction;" [so does Dr. A. C.] Into such errors do those commentators run, who, without attending to the usus loquendi, [the current meaning,] dwell on some fancied etymological sense.' Bloomf. 'How very few of those who profess this religion are satisfied with this title! When all return to the spirit of the Gospel, they will probably resume the appellation of Christians.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

V. 27—30. These prophets were evidently endowed by the Holy Spirit, with the power of foretelling future events; and were a superior order of extraordinary ministers, however the word may sometimes be used. The scarcity, predicted by Agabus, was to extend 'throughout all the world,' as the Roman empire was ostentatiously called. Some, indeed, would explain it of the land of Judea and Galilee; but the expression is incapable of that meaning: and the famine might be very general, and severely felt in the various provinces of the empire; though some places might be less straitened than others.—'Eusebius saith of this famine, that it oppressed almost the whole empire; and that it was recorded by historians most averse to our religion; viz. by Suetonius, in the life of Claudius, who saith, it happened (ob assiduas sterilitates) through a long barrenness. Josephus saith, that it raged so much in Judea, .. that many perished for want of victuals: and Dion Cassius, the Scripture was fulfilled, for so it was written, Is. 62:2. concerning the gospel-church, Thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the Lord shall name. And, Is. 65:15. it is said to the corrupt and degenerate church of the Jews, the Lord God shall slay thee, and call his servants by another name.

V. 27—30. I. A visit some prophets made to Antioch, v. 27. In these days, during that year that Barnabas and Saul lived at Antioch, there came prophets from Jerusalem to Antioch; we are not told how many, nor is it certain whether these were any of those prophets that we afterward find in the church at Antioch, ch. 13:1. Barnabas came to exhort them, and they, having received the exhortation well, now have prophets, (a great confirmation to Christianity,) sent them to show them things to come, as Christ had promised, John 16:13. The faithful in little, shall be intrusted with more.

II. A particular prediction of a famine approaching, by one of these prophets, his name Agabus; we read of him again, prophesying Paul's imprisonment, ch. 21:10. Here he stood up, probably in one of their public assemblies, and prophesied, v. 28. Observe, 1. Whence he had his prophecy: by the Spirit, the Spirit of prophecy; as Joseph, by the Spirit enabling him, understood Pharaoh's dreams, foretold the famine in Egypt; and Elijah—the famine in Israel in Ahab's time. Thus God revealed his secrets to his servants the prophets. 2. The prophecy: There should be great dearth, not in one particular country, but through all the world, all the Roman empire, which they in their pride, like [the Persians, and] Alexander before them, [and Jenghiz Khan and Tamerlane since,] called the world. 3. Its accomplishment; in the days of Claudius Cesar; it began in the second year of his reign, and continued to the fourth, if not longer; several of the Roman historians make mention of it, as does also Josephus. God sent them the Bread of life, and they rejected it, therefore God justly broke the staff of bread, and punished them with famine; and herein He was righteous.

III. Their good use of this prediction. When told of a famine at hand, they did not, as the Egyptians, hoard up corn for themselves; but, as became Christians, every man, according to his ability, laid by for charity to relieve others, which is the best preparative for our own sufferings and want. It is promised to those that consider the poor, that God will preserve them, and keep them alive, and they shall be blessed upon the earth, Ps. 41:1, 2. Many give it for a reason why they should be sparing, but the Scripture gives it as a reason why we should be liberal, to seven, and also to eight, because we know not what evil shall be upon the earth, Eccl. 11:2. Observe, 1. The persons recommended to them as objects of charity, were, the brethren that dwell in Judea, v. 29. Though we must, as we have opportunity, do good to all men, yet we must have a special regard to the household of faith. Gal. 6:10. The care which every particular church ought to take of their own poor, we were taught by the early instance of that in the church at Jerusalem, where the ministration was so constant, that none lacked, ch. 4:31. But the communion of saints, in that instance, is here extended farther, and provision is made by the church at Antioch for the relief of the poor in Judea, whom they call their brethren. It seems it was the custom of the Jews of the dispersion, to send money to those Jews which dwelt in Judea, for the relief of the poor that were among them, and to make collections for that purpose. Tully speaks of such a thing in his time, Orat. pro Flacco, which supposes there were many poor in Judea, more than in other countries, so that the rich among them were not able to bear the charge of keeping them from starving; either, because their land was grown barren, though it had been a fruitful land, for the iniquity of them that dwell therein, [which prevented their developing the resources of the country,] or because they had no traffic with other nations. Now we may suppose that the greatest part of those who turned Christians, in that country, were the poor, Mat. 11:5. and it were easy to foresee, that if there came a famine, it would go very hard with them; and if any of them should perish for want, it would be a great reproach to the Christian profession; and therefore this early care was taken, on notice of this famine coming, to send them a stock beforehand, lest, if deferred till the famine came, it should be too late. 2. The agreement among the disciples about it; that every man should contribute, according to his ability. The Jews, in other countries, grew rich by trade, and many rich Jews became Christians, whose abundance ought to supply the want of their poor brethren at a great distance; for the case of such ought to be considered, and not only theirs that live among us. What may be said to be according to our ability, we must judge for ourselves, but must be careful that we judge righteous judgment.

They not only talked of this, but did as they determined, v. 30. The collection was made, and was so considerable, that they thought it worth while to send Barnabas and Saul to Jerusalem, to carry it to the elders there, though they should want their labors in the mean time at Antioch. Josephus tells us, that at this time King Izates sent his that it was a very great famine.' Whitby.—This is the first time 'elders' are mentioned in the church of Christ; but we shall have more favorable opportunities of considering several questions relative to their office, 20:17. Without doubt they were pastors of the Christian church; and as both Peter and John call themselves Elders, 1 Pet. 5:1, 2. 2 John 1. it is not clear that the apostles were not included. (30) The Elders. Tous Presbyterous: 14:23. 15:2. 20:17. Presbyteros, whence comes presbyter, and by contraction prester: hence the English word priest; which by no means signifies a sacrificer, as many suppose. SCOTT.

(27.) Prophets. Commentators agree not on its exact sense. It seems to denote teachers, who, with more or less of the afflatus Divinus, applied themselves to both public preaching and teaching, and appear to have occasionally foretold future events. In dignity inferior to the apostles, but superior to other teachers. Eph. 2:20. 3:5. BLOOMF.

(28.) World. I. e. land: Judea alone is meant, (so most modern commentators,) as in Luke 2:1. note. From v. 39, 40, (so Bp. Pearce,) it appears, the dearth was not expected in Syria where Antioch was: besides, when Jos. speaks of this dearth in Claudius' reign, as having happened in Judea, he not only says nothing of it elsewhere, but tells us, large quantities of corn [grain] were sent up to Jerusalem from other countries; for the feast of unleavened bread. See Lardn. and Doddr. Kuin., to prove the words must be meant of Palestine only, describes, from the original historians, four famines of the reign of Claudius. 1. At Rome, in his 1st and 2d yr. See Dio Cassius, and Aurel. Vict. Its principal cause was the difficulty of importing provisions to Rome by sea, during the winter (see Dio); which induced Claudius to form, at a great expense, the port of Ostia. 2. Towards the end of his 4th yr. It especially afflicted Judea; and was alleviated by Helena, queen of Adiabene, who had embraced Judaism. (See Scal. on Euseb., and Wesseling.) Of this, mention is made in Jos. 3. In Greece, in his 9th yr. So Euseb. 4. At Rome, in his 11th yr. So Sueton. and Tac. Id.

30 Which also they did, and sent it to the elders by the hands of Barnabas and Saul.

1 King Herod persecuteth the Christians, killeth James, and imprisoneth Peter : whom an angel delivereth upon the prayers of the church. 20 In his pride, taking to himself the honor due to God, he is stricken by an angel, and dieth miserably. 24 After his death, the Word of God prospereth.

NOW about that time, Herod the king stretched forth his hands, to vex certain of the church.

2 And he killed James the brother of John with the sword.

charity to the chief men of Jerusalem, for the poor of that country; and Helena, queen of the Adiabeni, being now at Jerusalem, and hearing of many that died of famine there, and in the country about, sent for provisions from Cyprus and Alexandria, and distributed them among the people; so says Lightfoot, who also computes, by the date of Paul's rapture, '14 years before he wrote the second Epistle to the Corinthians,' 2 Cor. 12:1, 2. that it was in this journey of his to Jerusalem, with these alms and offerings, that he had his trance in the temple, which he speaks of, ch. 22:17. and in that trance was rapt up into the third heaven; and then it was, that Christ told him He would send him from thence unto the Gentiles; which accordingly He did, as soon as ever he came back to Antioch. It is no disparagement, in an extraordinary case, for ministers of the Gospel to be messengers of the church's elarity; though, to undertake the constant care of that matter, would ordinarily be too great a diversion from more needful work, to those who have given themselves to prayer, and the ministry of the Word.

CHAP. XII. V. 1—4. Ever since the conversion of Paul, we have heard no more of the agency of the priests in persecuting the saints at Jerusalem, and here the storm arises from another point; the civil power, PRACT. OBS. The imperfection of human nature, even in its best estate, appears, when pious persons are offended and grieved at those things, which should excite in them the most lively joy and gratitude. Sometimes true believers are displeased to hear, even of the Word of God being preached and received, because the peculiarities of their own church, sect, or system, have not been adhered to: and they are ready to find fault with the Lord's plan of bringing sinners to repentance, and faith in Christ, and with those who execute it; because their own plan and prejudices have been broken in upon. Jon. 4:1—4. Mark 9:38—40. Luke 9:46—50, v. 50. Hence it is, that the zealous servant of God may expect to be censured, on account of those very things, in which his Master has peculiarly prospered him, and by those whom he most esteems and loves! We should, however, meekly bear with the infirmities of our brethren: and, instead of taking offence, or answering with warmth, we ought candidly to explain our motives, and show the nature of our proceedings, in order to satisfy and conciliate their minds.

(30.) Elders.] Presbyterous: here first mentioned in the Christian Church, which was (as Vitrina and Casaubon observe) formed almost wholly on the model of the Synagogue. Hammond has here a profoundly learned, curious, and instructive annotation, on the origin and various uses of this important word, in which he proves, that these elders were the same in office with those called episcopoi: [tr. bishops:] and he thinks there is no certain evidence from Scripture, that the name of elders or presbyters was given so easily [early] to another order between them and deacons.

NOTES. CHAP. XII. V. 1—4. This Herod, surnamed Agrippa, [also Major] was grandson to Herod the Great, by Aristobulus; [slain by his own father;] nephew to Herod Antipas, who slew John the Baptist; brother to Herodias, his incestuous paramour; and father to king Agrippa, of whom we shall read hereafter. 25:13—27. 26: Mat. 14:1—5. The emperor Caligula made him tetrarch of Galilee; and Claudius afterwards made him king of Judea, because he had been serviceable to him in obtaining the empire. [He was made king by Caligula, and put in possession of all the territories formerly held by his uncle Philip, and by Lysanias; viz. Iturea, Traehonitis, Abilene, with Gaulonitis, Bataanea, and Paneas. To these, Claudius afterward added Judea and Samaria, which were nearly all the dominions possessed by his grandfather Herod the Great. Dr. A. C.] Judea had been before, and was again, soon after, under the dominion of a Roman governor. Herod being invested [64] not now, as usual, stirred up by the ecclesiastics, acts by itself in the persecution. Herod, though originally of an Edomite family, yet seems to have been a proselyte to the Jewish religion; for Josephus says, he was zealous for the Mosaic rites, a bigot for the ceremonies. He was not only (as Herod Antipas was) tetrarch of Galilee, but had also the government of Judea committed to him by Claudius the emperor, and resided most at Jerusalem, where he was at this time. Three things he did:

1. He stretched forth his hands to vex certain of the church, v. 1. laid hands upon some of the church to afflict them, so some read it. He began with some of the members of the church, certain of them that were of less note and figure; but afterward flew at the apostles themselves. His spite was at the church, and with regard to those he gave trouble to, it was not on any other account, but because they belonged to the church, and so belonged to Christ. He began with vexing them only, or afflicting them, imprisoning them, fining them, spoiling their houses and goods, and other ways molesting them; but afterward he proceeded to greater instances of cruelty. Christ's suffering servants are thus trained up by less troubles for greater, that tribulation may work patience, and patience experience.

II. He killed James the brother of John; so called, to distinguish him from the other James, the brother of Joses. This was called, James the greater; that, the less. This was one of the first three of Christ's disciples, one of those that were the witnesses of his transfiguration and agony, one of those whom Christ called Boanerges,—Sons of thunder; one of those sons of Zebedee, whom Christ told, that they should drink of the cup that He was to drink of, and be baptized with the baptism that He was to be baptized with, Mat. 20:23. And now those words of Christ were made good in him; but it was in order to his sitting at Christ's right hand; for, if we suffer with Him, we shall reign with Him. But why would God permit it? Perhaps hereby to awaken the rest of the apostles to disperse themselves among the nations, and not to nestle any longer at Jerusalem; and to show them what they must expect, that they might prepare accordingly. The Romish tradition, that this James had been before this in Spain, and had planted the Gospel there, is altogether groundless. His head was cut off with a sword, which was looked upon by the Romans to be a more disgraceful way of being beheaded than with an axe; so Lorinus. Beheading was not ordinarily used among the Jews; but when kings gave verbal orders for private and sudden executions, this manner of death was used, as most expeditious; and it is probable this Herod killed James, as the other Herod killed John Baptist, privately in the prison. Thus this martyr sealed to us the truth with his blood.

III. He imprisoned Peter, also, for blood to the blood-thirsty does but make them more so; and the way of persecution, as of other sins, is downhill; they that take one bold step in a sinful way [strengthen the erring propensity, and] give Satan advantage against them to tempt them to take another step, and provoke God to leave them to themselves, to go from bad to worse. It is therefore our wisdom, to take heed of the beginnings of sin.

1. He did this, because he saw it pleased the Jews. Observe, The Jews made themselves guilty of the blood of James by showing themselves well pleased with it afterward, though they had not excited Herod to it; they will be reckoned with as persecutors, who take pleasure in others' persecuting, for they thus encourage persecutors, and harden their own hearts. Herod, though he had no reason to fear displeasing the Jews, yet he hoped to please them by doing as he did, and so to make amends for displeasing them in something else. Those make themselves an easy prey to Satan, who make it their business to please men.

2. Notice is taken of the time; the days of unleavened bread, the feast of the passover, when their celebrating the memorial of their typical deliverance should have led them to the acceptance of their spiritual deliverance; instead of that, they, under pretence of zeal for the law, were most violently fighting against it, and, in the days of unleavened bread, were most soured and embittered, with the old leaven of malice and wickedness. At the passover, when the Jews came from all parts to Jerusalem to keep the feast, they irritated one another against the Christians and Christianity, and were then more violent than at other times.

3. Here is an account of Peter's impris-

When the Lord Jesus is preached in simplicity, and according to the Scripture; his power will attend the Word to give it success: and when sinners are brought 'to believe, and turn unto the Lord;' 'good men,' who are 'full of faith and of the Holy Ghost,' will discern, admire, and rejoice in the grace of God bestowed on them; and exhort all, who profess the Gospel, 'to cleave to the Lord' Jesus, 'with purpose of heart,' knowing how many efforts Satan and his servants will employ to draw them aside. We, at this day, are called by the name given to these ancient disciples: may we be anointed with the same Spirit, and walk in their steps! Such Christians will sympathize with their brethren in all their afflictions: the various dispensations of Providence will give them opportunity of showing their love, by distributing, according to their ability, to 'the necessity of the saints;' thus God will be glorified, the harmony among believers promoted, the faith and hope of the poor encouraged, their prayers and praises excited; and fruit brought forth, which will abound to the account of those by whom it is produced. Sc.

with his new dignity, endeavored by all means to ingratiate himself with the Jews: and this probably combined with his hereditary enmity to the Gospel, in exciting him to persecute the church. Even if Easter were observed at that time, in the Christian church, of which nothing is mentioned in the sacred records; Herod would certainly pay no regard to it; it is therefore surprising, that the venerable translators of the Bible should have used that word, instead of 'the passover,' in this connexion!—This Herod 'was a great zealot for the Mosaic law, dwelt much at Jerusalem, and was fond of all opportunities of obliging the Jews. This early execution of one of the apostles, would illustrate the courage of the rest in going on with their ministry; as it would evidently show, that all their miraculous powers did not secure them from dying by the sword of their enemies.' Dodd.

(2.) Killed.] Aneile: i. e. "beheaded him." For he had the power of life and death, as had the Roman procurators before him. Wetst. here cites Sanhedrim 52, 2. Beheading was considered among the Jews the most ignominious kind of death. "The accuracy of the sacred writer, (says Paley,) in the expressions he uses, is, in this instance, remarkable. There was no portion of time for thirty years before, or ever afterwards, in which there was a king at Jerusalem, a person exercising that authority in Judea, or to whom that title could be applied, except the three last years of this Herod's life, within which period the transaction here recorded took place." See also Watch. Bloomf. Dr. A. C., also, at 10:1.

4 And when he had apprehended him, he put him in prison, and delivered him to four quaternions of soldiers, to keep him; intending after Easter to bring him forth to the people.

5 Peter therefore was kept in prison; but prayer was made without ceasing of the church unto God for him.

6 And when Herod would have brought him forth, the same night Peter was sleeping between two soldiers, bound with two chains; and the keepers before the door kept the prison.

7 And, behold, the angel of the Lord came upon him, and a light shined in the prison: and he smote Peter on the side, and raised him up, saying, Arise up quickly. And his chains fell off from his hands.

8 And the angel said unto him, Gird thyself, and bind on thy sandals: and so he did. And he saith unto him, Cast thy garment about thee, and follow me.

9 And he went out, and followed him; and wist not that it was true which was done by the angel; but thought he saw a vision.

10 When they were past the first and the second ward, they came unto the iron gate that leadeth unto the city, which opened to them of his own accord; and they went out, and passed on through one street; and forthwith the angel departed from him.

For, instant and earnest prayer was made. 2 Co. 1:11. Ep.

ment, v. 4. some say, in the same prison into which he and the other apostles were cast some years before, ch. 5: 18. He was delivered to four quaternions of soldiers, i. e. to 16, who were to guard him, 4 at a time, that he should not escape, or be rescued. Thus they thought they had him fast.

4. Herod's design was, after Easter, to bring him forth unto the people. Probably, he had put James to death privately; which the people had complained of, not because it was unjust to put a man to death, without a public hearing, but because it deprived them of the satisfaction of seeing him executed; therefore Herod, now that he knows their minds, will gratify them with the sight of Peter in bonds, of Peter on the block, that they might feed their eyes with such a pleasing spectacle. And very ambitious surely he was to please the people, who was willing thus to please them! He would do this after Easter, pascha, the passover, certainly so it ought to be read, for it is the same word that is always so rendered; and to insinuate the introducing of a gospel-feast, instead of the passover, when we have nothing in the N. T. of such a thing, is to mingle Judaism with our Christianity. Herod would not condemn him till the pass-over was over, some think, for fear lest he should have such an interest among the people, that they should demand the release of him, according to the custom of the feast: or, after the hurry of the feast was over, and the town was empty, he would entertain them with Peter's public trial and execution. Thus was the plot laid, and both Herod and the people long to have the feast over, that they may gratify themselves with this barbarous entertainment.

V. 5—19. We have here an account of Peter's deliverance, by which Herod's design against him was defeated, and his life preserved for further service, and a stop given to this bloody torrent.

1. What magnified his deliverance, was, 1. It was a signal answer to prayer, v. 5. Prayers and tears are the church's arms; therewith she fights, not only against her enemies, but for her friends: and to those means they have recourse. (1.) Delay gave time for prayer. Probably James was hurried off, so suddenly, so privately, they had not time to pray for him; but Peter must be continued to them, and therefore prayer for him is stirred up, and time is given them for it, by Herod's [apparently casual] putting off of the prosecution. (2.) They were very particular and fervent in their prayers for him; the death of James alarmed them to a greater fervency in their prayers for Peter; they fear the enemy will make a full end. Prayer was made without ceasing; it was fervent prayer; it is the word used concerning Christ's praying in his agony more earnestly; it is the fervent prayer of the righteous man that is effectual, and availeth much. Some think, it denotes the constancy and continuance of their prayers; so we take it; they prayed without ceasing: it was an extended prayer; they prayed in public, then in their families, then in their closets, and so without ceasing: or first one knot of them, and then another, and then a third, kept a day of prayer, or rather a night of prayer, for him, v. 12. Times of public distress and danger should be praying times with the church; we must pray always, but then especially.

2. That when the king's commandment and decree drew near to be put in execution, then his deliverance was wrought, as Esth. 9: 1, 2.; the very night before Herod designed to bring him forth. God's time to help is, when things are brought to the last extremity, when there is none shut up or left, Deut. 32: 36. Further, it was when he was fast bound with two chains, between two soldiers; so that if he offer to stir, he wakes them; and besides this, though the prison doors, no doubt, were locked and bolted, yet, to make sure work, the keepers before the door kept the prison, that no one might so much as attempt to rescue him. Never could the art of man do more to secure a prisoner! It was, too, when he was sleeping between the soldiers; fast asleep; not terrified with his danger, though very imminent, and there was no visible way of escape; not expecting deliverance. Thus the church, Ps. 126: 1. We were like them that dream.

3. That an angel was sent from heaven on purpose to rescue him; which made his escape both practicable and warrantable. (1.) The angel of the Lord came upon him, lit. stood over him; he seemed as one abandoned by men, yet not forgotten of his God. Gates and guards keep all his friends from him, but cannot keep the angels of God from him, who invisibly encamp round about them that fear God, to deliver them, Ps. 34: 7. Wherever the people of God are, and however surrounded, they have a way open heavenward, nor can anything intercept their intercourse with God. (2.) A light shined in the prison; Peter shall see his way clear. The soldiers, to whom Peter was chained, were either struck into a deep sleep for the present, (as Saul and his soldiers were when David carried off his spear and cruse of water,) or struck with consternation, as the guard set on Christ's sepulchre. (3.) The angel awaked Peter, by a blow on his side, a gentle touch, enough to rouse him, though the light that shone on him did not awake him. The language of this stroke, was, Arise up quickly; not as if the angel feared coming short by his delay, but Peter must not be indulged in it. (4.) His chains fell from his hands: for it seems they had handcuffed him, to make him sure. Tradition tells a formal story about these chains, that one of the soldiers kept them for a sacred relic, and they were long after presented to Eudoxia the empress, and I know not what miracles are said to be wrought by them; and the Romish church keep a feast on the first of August, yearly, in remembrance of Peter's chains,—The feast of Peter's chains; whereas this was at the pass-over. Surely they are thus fond of Peter's chains, in hopes with them to enslave the world! (5.) He was ordered to dress himself presently, and follow the angel; and he did so, v. 8, 9.

It is said, when Peter went out after the angel, he wist not that what was done by the angel, was really matter of fact, but thought he saw a vision; by this it appears that a heavenly vision was so plain, and carried so much of its own evidence along with it, that it was hard, to distinguish between what was done in fact, and what was done in vision. Ps. 126: 1. Peter thought the news was too good to be true. (6.) He was led safe by the angel out of danger, v. 10. Guards were kept at one pass and at another, but Peter and the angel made their way through without opposition; nay, for aught that appears, without any discovery; so it was, they safely passed the first and second ward. But still there is an iron gate, after all, that will stop them, no, it opened to them; they did not so much as put a hand to it, but it opened of

V. 4, 5. 'Herod had his own soldiers in the city (see Jos.), and they guarded Peter in the mode usual with the Romans, whose customs (except in matters of religion) Agrippa, who had been educated at Rome, studiously imitated. See Jos. Among the Romans, the night watch was distributed among quaternions, or detachments of four soldiers, each of whom watched three hours; and since Herod chose that Peter should be watched by four soldiers, of whom two should be in the prison, and two he stationed at the gates, four quaternions were necessary. See Veget. A quaternion was the regular number for a guard, as a file is with us. So Polyb. Philo.'

(4.) Easter.] 'A Saxon goddess, whose festival was in April; how improper and absurd then is this translation!' Dr. A. C. Similar is the objection made to the use of the idol names of the months and days of the week.

V. 6. 'It was the Roman custom, to fasten the prisoner with a small and light chain to some soldier, who was appointed to guard him; one end of which chain was fastened to the right hand of the prisoner, and the other end of it to the left hand of the soldier. Seneca, Pliny, and Lucian, allude to the custom. Two chains connected to two soldiers were used for the better securing Peter.' Pearce.

V. 7. 'Hezel thinks the light here mentioned was lightning, which melted Peter's chains, and caused the doors to open, &c.!! Wolf conjectures the prison had an outer iron gate, v. 10. and was in the city, near the judgment-hall. De Dieu and Fessel (from Adrichomius), suppose it was Herod's private prison, in his palace court; and from this area and prison, (F. thinks,) extended a street, through which was the outlet from the palace to the city, closed by an iron gate. Walch observes, from Jewish writers, that Jerusalem had three walls, the interior and most ancient having sixty, the outer ninety towers, and the middle fourteen; in one of which, with an iron entrance-gate, Peter was confined. This, Knin. thinks not improbable, as jails were formerly in towers. On the side.] The usual method of waking one, see examples Id.

V. 8. Sandals, &c.] Cnts, end of Jer. 'Thus the angel reassures him, hinting his deliverance is certain, and cannot be hindered during his preparation.'

V. 10. The wards or watches here mentioned, seem to have included the stated guard of the prison, as well as the soldiers especially appointed to keep Peter.

11 And when Peter was come to himself, he said, Now I know of a surety that the Lord hath sent<sup>k</sup> his angel, and hath<sup>l</sup> delivered me out of the hand of Herod, and from all the expectation of the people of the Jews.

12 And when he had considered the thing, he came to the house of Mary the mother of John, whose surname was Mark; where many<sup>m</sup> were gathered together, praying.

13 And as Peter knocked at the door of the gate, a damsel came<sup>n</sup> to hearken, named Rhoda.

14 And when she knew Peter's voice, she opened not the gate for gladness, but ran in, and told how Peter stood before the gate.

15 And they said unto her, Thou art mad. But she constantly affirmed that it was even so. Then said they, It is his<sup>o</sup> angel.

16 But Peter continued knocking: and when they had opened the door, and saw him, they were astonished.

17 But he beckoning<sup>p</sup> unto them with the hand, to hold their peace, declared unto them how the Lord had brought him out of the prison. And he said, Go, shew these things unto James, and to the brethren. And he departed, and went into another place.

its own accord, by an invisible power; and, probably, shut again of itself, that none of the guards might pursue Peter. When God will work salvation for his people, no difficulties are insuperable. (7.) When this was done, the angel departed from him, and left him to himself; for he was out of danger, knew where he was, and how to find out his friends. Miracles are not to be expected, when ordinary means are to be used.

II. Having seen how his deliverance was magnified, we are next to see how it was manifested both to himself and others.

1. So many strange and surprising things coming together upon a man, just waked out of sleep, put him for the present into some confusion; so that he knew not where he was, what he did, nor whether it was fancy or fact; but, at length, Peter came to himself, was thoroughly awake, and found that it was not a dream, but a real thing. Thus souls who are delivered out of a spiritual bondage, are not at first aware what God has wrought in them; many have the truth of grace, that want the evidence of it. But when the Comforter comes, whom the Father will send, sooner or later, He will let them know of a surety what a blessed change is wrought in them, and what a happy state they are brought into.

2. Peter came to his friends, and told them the particular account of this, and it is very entertaining.

(1.) He considered the thing, v. 12. how imminent his danger was, how great his deliverance; and now what has he to do, what improvement must he make of this deliverance? What must he do next? God's providence leaves room for the use of our prudence.

(2.) He went directly to a friend's house, which, it is likely, was near the house of Mary, a sister of Barnabas, and mother of John Mark, whose house, it should seem, was frequently used for the private meeting of the disciples.

(3.) There he found many gathered together praying, at the dead of night, praying for Peter's deliverance. Observe, [1.] They continued in prayer, in token of their importunity; as long as we are kept waiting for a mercy, we must continue praying for it. [2.] It should seem that now, when the affair came near to a crisis, and the very next day was to determine the event, they were more fervent in prayer than before; and it was a good sign that God intended to deliver Peter, when He thus stirred up a spirit of prayer for his deliverance, for He never said to the seed of Jacob, seek ye my face in vain. [3.] They gathered together for prayer on this occasion; though that would make them obnoxious to the government if discovered, yet they know what an encouragement Christ gave to joint prayer, Mat 18: 19, 20. And it was always the practice of God's praying people, to unite their forces in prayer, as Esth. 4: 16, 2. Chr. 20: 4. [4.] They were many, as many perhaps as the room would hold; and first one prayed, and then another. It was in the night, when others were asleep, which was an instance both of their prudence and of their zeal. It is good for Christians to have private meetings for prayer, especially in times of distress, and not to let fall or forsake such assemblies. [5.] Peter came to them when thus employed: which was an immediate, present answer to their prayer. It was as if God should say, 'You are praying that Peter may be restored to you; now here he is.' Is. 65: 24. Thus the angel was sent to Daniel, Dan. 9: 20, 21. Ask, and it shall be given.

(4.) He knocked at the gate, and had much ado to get them to let him in. v. 13—16. He knocked, designing by it to awaken them out of their sleep, and, for aught that appears, not knowing that he disturbed them in their devotions. Now when he knocked there, [1.] A damsel came to hearken; not to open the door till she knew who was there, a friend or a foe, and what their business was, fearing informers; it should seem by her being named, that she was of note among the Christians, and more zealously affected to the better part than most of her age. [2.] She knew Peter's voice, having often heard him pray, and preach, and discourse, with a great deal of pleasure. But instead of letting him in immediately, out of the cold, she opened not the gate for gladness. Thus sometimes, in a transport of affection to our friends, we do that which is unkind. In an ecstasy of joy she forgets herself, and opened not the gate. [3.] She ran in, and probably went up to an upper room, where they were together, and told them that Peter was certainly at the gate. But when she spake of Peter's being there, they said, 'Thou art mad; it is impossible it should be he, for he is in prison.' Sometimes that which we most earnestly wish for, we are most backward to believe, because we are afraid of imposing on ourselves; as the disciples, who, when Christ was risen, believed not for joy. However, she stood to it, that it was he. Then said they, It is his angel, v. 15. 'A messenger from him, that makes use of his name,' so some, as Dr. Hammond; his guardian angel, or some other angel, that has assumed his shape and voice, and stands at the gate in his resemblance, so some, supposing his angel to appear as a presage of his death approaching; and this agrees with a notion which the vulgar have, that sometimes before persons have died, their ward has been seen, i. e. some spirit exactly in their likeness for countenance and dress, when they themselves have been at the same time in some other place; they call it their ward, that is, their angel, who is their guard. If so, they concluded this an ill omen, that their prayers were denied, and that the language of the apparition was, 'Let it suffice you, Peter must die, say no more of that matter.' And if we understand it so, it only proves that they had then such an opinion of a man's ward being seen a little before his death, but does not prove that there is such a thing. Others think, they took this to be an angel from heaven, sent to bring them a grant to their prayers. But why should they imagine that angel to assume the voice and shape of Peter, when we find not anything like it in the appearance of angels? Perhaps, they herein spake the language of the Jews, who had a fond conceit, that every good man has a particular tutelary angel, that has the charge of him, and sometimes personates him. The heathen called it a good genius that attended a man; but since no other scripture speaks of such a thing, this alone is too weak to bear the weight of such a doctrine. We are sure, that the angels are ministering spirits for the good of the heirs of salvation; that they have a charge concerning them, and pitch their tents round about them; and we need not be solicitous that every particular saint should have his guardian angel, when we are assured he has a guard of angels.

(5.) He continued knocking; though they delayed to open to him, yet at length they let him in, v. 16. But when they saw him, they were astonished. It was both surprising and pleasing to them, in the highest degree.

(6.) The company, that came together with so much zeal to pray for him, gathered about him with no less zeal to congratulate him on his deliverance; and herein they were so noisy, that when Peter himself begged them to consider what peril he was yet in, if they should be overheard, he could not make them hear him, but was forced to beckon to them with the hand to hold their peace, and had much ado thereby to command silence, while he declared unto them how the Lord Jesus had by an angel brought him out of prison; and, it is very likely, having found them praying for his deliverance, he did not part with them, till he and they had together solemnly given thanks to God for his enlargement; or if he could not stay to do it, it is likely, they stayed together to do it; for what is won by prayer must be worn with praise; and God must always have the glory of that which we have the comfort of. Ps. 66: 16, 20.

(7.) Peter sent the account to others of his friends; Go, show these things to James, and to the brethren with him; who, perhaps, were met together in another place at the same time, on the same errand to the throne of grace; which is one way of keeping up

V. 12—17. The other apostles seem to have been absent from Jerusalem: but James, the son of Alphaeus, who wrote the epistle, was in some place of concealment in the neighborhood.—'It is utterly incredible, that he [Peter] now went to Rome, and made an abode of twenty-five years, which the popish writers pretend.' Doddr., in SCOTT. It would be easy to multiply similar instances, in which the legends of the Romish church as much contradict the sacred history, as its traditions make void both the commandments and testimonies of God. See.

(15.) Angel.] Note, Mat. 18:10. 'The Jews believed tutelary angels were appointed to all men; so did the Gentiles, for Censorinus says, 'the Genius is a god, in whose protection so far as each one is, he lives: it is appointed so assiduous an observer of us, that it is never absent longer than an instant; but accompanies us from birth to the last day of life.' And Martianus says, 'Genius—the guardian and most faithful brother keeps the hearts and minds of all.' See also Macrobius. The Gentiles thought, moreover, (continues Kuin.) that the gods assumed the figures of this or that man, and his voice. So Homer. And the Jews (see Debbani Rabbai, and Midras Coheleth) had the same persuasion respecting angels.' BLOOMF.

18 Now as soon as it was day, there was no small stir among the soldiers, what was become of Peter.

19 And when Herod had sought for him, and found him not, he examined the keepers, and commanded that they should be put to death. And he went down from Judea to Cesarea, and there abode.

20 ¶ And Herod was highly displeased with them of Tyre and Sidon: but they came with one accord to him, and, having made Blastus the king's chamberlain their friend, desired peace; because their country was nourished by the king's country.

21 And upon a set day, Herod, arrayed in royal apparel, sat upon his throne, and made an oration unto them.

22 And the people gave a shout, saying, It is the voice of a god, and not of a man.

the communion of saints, acting in concert, though at a distance; like Esther and Mordecai. He would have James and his company to know of his deliverance, not only that they might be eased of their painful fears concerning Peter, but might return thanks to God with and for him.

(S.) Peter had nothing more to do for the present than to shift for his own safety, which he did accordingly; he departed, and went into another place more obscure, and therefore more safe. He knew the town very well, and knew where to find a place that would shelter him. Even the Christian law of self-denial and suffering for Christ, has not abrogated and repealed the natural law of self-preservation, and care for our own safety, as far as God gives an opportunity of providing for it by lawful means.

III. Having seen the triumph of Peter's friends in his deliverance, let us next observe the confusion of his enemies thereupon; which was so much the greater, because people's expectation was so much raised of the putting of him to death.

1. The guards were in the utmost consternation upon it, for they knew how highly penal it was to them to let a prisoner escape, v. 18. Thus have the persecutors of the Gospel of Christ been often filled with vexation, to see its cause conquering, notwithstanding their opposition.

2. Houses were searched in vain for the rescued prisoner, v. 19. Who can find whom God hath hidden? Jer. 36:26. In times of public danger, all believers have God for their hiding-place; which is such a secret, that there the ignorant world cannot find them; such a strength, that the impotent world cannot reach them.

3. The keepers were reckoned with for a permissive escape; Herod examined the keepers, and, finding that they could give no satisfactory account how Peter got away, he commanded that they should be put to death, according to the Roman law, and that, 1 K. 20:39. Probably these keepers had been more severe with Peter than they needed to be, as the jailor, ch. 16:24. and with others

V. 18, 19. The astonishment of the soldiers, and their dread of Herod's vindictive rage, may easily be conceived. Indeed they had cause to tremble: for that tyrant, exasperated at his disappointment, and unwilling it should be thought that Peter had been miraculously delivered, ordered them to immediate execution; alleging, no doubt, that Peter's escape was owing to their negligence and sleeping on guard. Yet, it is highly probable, he himself perceived that Peter had been rescued in a supernatural manner, as all the apostles had before been; 5:17-25. and we may suppose, that this intimidated him, and induced him to suspend the persecution: [though it so aggravated his criminality as to render signal punishment the more necessary.] SCOTT.

that had been their prisoners on the like account; and now justly are they put to death for that which was not their fault, and by him too that had set them to work to rev the church. Or, if they had not thus made themselves obnoxious to the justice of God, and it be thought hard* that innocent men should suffer thus for what was purely the act of God; we may easily admit the conjecture of some, that though they were commanded to be put to death, to please the Jews, who were sadly disappointed by Peter's escape, yet they were not executed; but Herod's death, immediately after, prevented it.

4. Herod himself retired upon it; he went down from Judea to Cesarea, and there abode. He was vexed to the heart, as a lion disappointed of his prey; and the more because he had so much raised the expectation of the people of the Jews concerning Peter, how he would very shortly gratify them with the sight of Peter's head; it is such a mortification to his proud spirit, that he cannot bear to stay in Judea, but away he goes to Cesarea. Josephus mentions his coming to Cesarea, at the end of the third year of his reign over all Judea, Antiq. 19:7. and says, he came thither to solemnize the plays that were kept there, by a vast concourse of the nobility and gentry of the kingdom, for the health of Cesar, and in honor of him.

V. 20-25. In these verses, we have,

I. The death of Herod. God reckoned with him, not only for putting James to death, but for designing and endeavoring Peter's death; for sinners will be called to an account, not only for the wickedness of their deeds, but of their endeavors, Ps. 28:4. Some sinners, God makes quick work with, Observe,

1. How the measure of his iniquity was filled up; it was pride that did it; that is it that commonly goes more immediately before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall, as with Nebuchadnezzar. Dan. 4:30, 31. It is the glory of God to look on every one that is proud, and bring him low, Job 40:11. The instance of it here is very remarkable, and shows how God resists the proud.

(1.) Tyre and Sidon had, it seems, offended Herod; those cities were now under the Roman yoke, and some misdemeanors they had been guilty of, which Herod highly resented, and was resolved they should feel his resentment.

(2.) The offenders truckled, being convinced, if not that they had done amiss, yet that it was in vain to contend with such a potent adversary, who, right or wrong, would be too hard for them; they submitted, and were willing on any terms to make peace with him. Observe, [1.] The reason why they were desirous to have the matter accommodated; because their country was nourished by the king's country. Tyre and Sidon were trading cities, and were always supplied with corn from Canaan, Ezr. 27:17. Now if Herod should prohibit the exportation of corn to Tyre and Sidon, their country would be undone; so that it was their interest to keep in with him. [2.] The method they took to prevent a rupture; They made Blastus, the king's chamberlain, their friend; it is very likely, with bribes and good presents; that is usually the way for men to make * Every mortal's life is at each moment forfeit to God, Rom. 5:12. besides being in his hands as its Author, for the creature has no rights with the Creator. Life can be taken when and how He pleases, without wrong, or the shadow of injustice: and He has an eternity, also, in which to be just, were He to seem unjust in Time. Ed.

V. 20-23. It is remarkable that the sacred historian does not represent the awful death of Herod, as a judgment on him for persecuting the church, though he had so inviting and so just an occasion of doing it; but assigns another cause of that event. This is a striking contrast to the usual practice of enthusiasts; who generally, without any adequate reason, take pleasure in representing all the calamities which befall those who even in a slight degree oppose them, as divine judgments on them for so doing.

(20.) Some suggest, that this trouble was occasioned by commercial jealousies between the new and doubtless privileged port of Cesarea, (note, 8:40.) and Tyre, Sidon, &c., with whose interests it interfered. Ed.

courtiers their friends. [See the accounts of every traveller in those regions now. Ed.] And it is the hard fate of princes, that they must have not only their affairs, but their affections too, governed by such mercenary tools: yet such men as Herod, that will not be governed by reason, had better be so governed, than by pride and passion. Blastus had Herod's ear, and has the art of mollifying his resentments; and a time is fixed for the ambassadors of Tyre and Sidon, to come and make a public submission, to beg his majesty's pardon, throw themselves on his clemency, and promise never again to offend in the like kind; and that which will thus feed his pride, shall serve to cool his passion.

(3.) Herod appeared in all the pomp and grandeur he had, v. 21. Josephus (Antiq. lib. 19. cap. 7.) says, Herod at this time wore a robe of cloth of silver, so richly woven, and framed with such art, that when the sun shone, it reflected the light with such a lustre as dazzled the eyes of the spectators, and struck an awe upon them. Foolish people value men by their outward appearance; and no better are they who value themselves by the esteem of such; who court it, and recommend themselves to it, as Herod did, who thought to make up the want of a royal heart, with his royal apparel; and sat upon his throne, as if privileged to trample on all about him as his footstool.

(4.) He made a speech to the men of Tyre and Sidon, a fine oration, in which, probably, after he had aggravated their fault, and commended their submission, he concluded with an assurance that he would pass by their offence, and receive them into his favor again; having, probably, kept them in suspense as to their doom, till he made this oration to them, that the act of grace might come to them with the more pleasing surprise.

(5.) The people applauded him, the people that had a dependence on him, and had benefit by his favor, they gave a shout; and this was it they shouted, It is the voice of a god, and not of a man, v. 22. It may be, it was not from any real good thoughts they had of him; but how meanly soever they thought of him, they were resolved thus to curry favor, and strengthen the new-made peace between him and them. Thus great men are made an easy prey to flatterers, if they lend an ear to them, and encourage them. Grotius, here, observes, that though magistrates are called gods, Ps. 82:1. yet kings or monarchs, i. e. single persons, are not, lest countenance should thereby be given to the Gentiles, who give divine honors to their kings, alive and dead, as here; but they are a college of senators, or a bench of judges, that are called gods. Those that live by sense, vilify God, as if He were altogether such an one as themselves; and deify men, as if they were gods; having their persons in admiration, because of advantage. This is not only a great affront to God, giving that glory to others, which is due to Him alone, but a great injury to those who are thus flattered, as it makes them forget themselves, and so puffs them up with pride, that they are in the utmost danger possible of falling into the condemnation of the devil.

(6.) These undue praises he took to himself, pleased himself with them, and prided himself in them; and that was his sin: he did not rebuke their flattery, nor disown the title they had given him, nor give God the glory, v. 23. but took it to himself, was very

NOW there were in the church that was at Antioch, certain prophets and teachers; as Barnabas, and Simeon that was called Niger, and Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen, <sup>a</sup> which had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch, and Saul.

willing it should terminate in himself, and that he should be thought a god, and have divine honors paid him. Si populus vult decipi, decipiatur.—If the people will be deceived, let them. And it was worse in him who was a Jew, and professed to believe one God only, than it was in the heathen emperors, who had gods many and lords many.

2. Observe, How his iniquity was punished; Immediately, v. 23. He was reckoned with now for vexing the church of Christ, killing James, imprisoning Peter, and all the other mischiefs he had done. Observe in the destruction of Herod,

(1.) It was no less than an angel that was the agent; the angel of the Lord, that angel that was ordered and commissioned to do it, or that angel that used to be employed in works of this nature, the destroying angel: or the angel, i. e., that angel that delivered Peter in the former part of the chapter,—that angel smote Herod. For, those ministering spirits are the ministers either of divine justice or of divine mercy, as God is pleased to employ them. The angel smote him with a sore disease, just at that instant when he was strutting at the applauses of the people, and adoring his own shadow. As the king of Tyre, Ez. 28:2, 9. so Herod here. The angel smote him, because he gave not the glory to God; angels are jealous for God's honor, and as soon as ever they have commission, are ready to smite those that usurp his prerogatives, and rob God of his honor.

(2.) It was no more than a worm that was the instrument of Herod's destruction; he was eaten of worms,—he became worm-eaten, so it must be read. The body in the grave is destroyed by worms; but Herod's

PRACT. OBS. The lives of eminent saints are more desired by their brethren, than by themselves. A peaceful conscience, a lively hope, and the consolations of the Holy Spirit, produce the most entire composure in the immediate prospect of death, even in those very persons, who have at other times been the most distracted with terrors on that account. The instruments of persecution are exposed to the most imminent danger; and those who thus 'fight against God,' ripen apace for more signal vengeance; while they are buoyed up, with success and flattery, into the most extravagant pride and arrogance.—We may, however, learn body putrefied while he was yet alive, and bred the worms that began to feed on it betimes; so Antiochus, that great persecutor, died. See here, what vile bodies those are which we carry about with us; what weak and contemptible creatures God can make the instruments of his justice, when He pleases,—and how God delights not only to bring down proud men, but to bring them down in such a way as is most mortifying, and pours most contempt upon them.

This story of the death of Herod is particularly related by Josephus, a Jew, Antiq. lib. 19. cap. 7. thus: That Herod came down to Cesarea, to celebrate a festival in honor of Cesar; that the second day of the festival, he went in the morning to the theatre, clothed with that splendid robe mentioned before; that his flatterers saluted him as a god, begged that he would be propitious to them; that hitherto they had revered him as a man, but now they would confess to be in him something more excellent than a mortal nature. That he did not refuse or correct this impious flattery; (so the historian expresses it;) but, presently after, looking up, he saw an owl perched over his head, and was at the same instant seized with a most violent pain in his bowels, and gripes in his belly, which were exquisite from the very first; that he turned his eyes on his friends, and said to this purpose; Now I, whom you called a god, and therefore immortal, must be proved a man, and mortal. That his torture continued without intermission, or the least abatement, and then he died, in the 54th year of his age, when he had been king seven years.

II. The progress of the Gospel after this.

1. The Word of God grew and multiplied; wherever preached, multitudes embraced it, and were added to the church by it, v. 24. When such a persecutor was taken off by a dreadful judgment, many were thereby convinced, that the cause of Christianity was doubtless the cause of Christ, and therefore embraced it.

2. Barnabas and Saul returned to Antioch, as soon as they had despatched the business they were sent upon; When they had fulfilled their ministry, had paid in their money to the proper persons, and taken care about the due distribution of it to those for whom it was collected, they returned from Jerusalem. They had a great many friends there, yet at present their work lay at Antioch; and where our business is, there we should be; and no longer from it than is requisite. When a minister is called abroad on any service, when he has fulfilled that ministry, he ought to remember that he has work to do at home, which waits him there, and calls him thither. Barnabas and Saul, when they went to Antioch, took with them John, whose surname was Mark, at whose mother's house they had that meeting for prayer which we read of v. 12. She was sister to Barnabas. It is probable Barnabas lodged there, and perhaps Paul with him, while at Jerusalem, and that occasioned the meeting there at that time; and their wisdom from the policy of the Tyrians and Zidonians: for we have justly offended the almighty Lord, with our sins; we entirely depend on Him for 'life, and breath, and all things;' it surely, then, behooves us to humble ourselves before Him, that, through the appointed Mediator, who is ever ready to befriend us, we may be reconciled to Him, before 'wrath come upon us to the uttermost;' as it did upon proud Herod, who, while others trembled at his impotent rage, would not fear the almighty God!

NOTES. CHAP. XIII. V. 1—3. The surname of Niger, or 'Black,' by which Simeon was known, seems to have been given him on account of his complexion; perhaps he was a negro. Some have conjectured that this was Simon the Cyrenian, who was compelled to bear the cross after Jesus; and if so, Lucius was of the same country.—(2) Separate, &c.] This language evidently implies the personality * and Deity of the intimacy in that family, while at Jerusalem, occasioned their taking a son of that family with them when they returned, to be trained up under them, and employed by them, in the service of the Gospel. Educating young men for the ministry, and entering them into it, is a very good work for elder ministers to take care of, and of good service to the rising generation.

* If this term, personality, and persons, (used by theologians,) does not mean separate identities, why use it? Persona indicates identity, and is a term not applied in the Bible, to Christ, the Spirit, or the Father: if those who make creeds do not intend to teach three identities, three gods, in the blessed Godhead, why employ it? Ed.

CHAP. XIII. We have not yet met with anything concerning the spreading of the Gospel to the Gentiles, which bears any proportion to the largeness of that commission, Go, and disciple all nations. The door was opened in the baptizing of Cornelius and his friends; but since then we had the Gospel preached to the Jews only, ch. 11:19. It should seem as if the light, which began to shine on the Gentile world, had withdrawn itself. But here in this ch. that great, good work is revived in the midst of the years; and though the Jews shall still have the first offer of the Gospel, yet, on their refusal, the Gentiles shall have their offer of it: so the design of this ch. is, to show how cautiously, how gradually, and with what good reason, the apostles carried the Gospel into the Gentile world, and admitted the Gentiles into the church, which was so great an offence to the Jews, and which Paul is so industrious to justify in his epistles.

V. 1—3. I. The present state of the church at Antioch.

1. How well furnished it was with good ministers, v. 1. men eminent for gifts, graces, and usefulness. Agabus seems to have been a prophet, and not a teacher; and many were teachers, who were not prophets; but those were at times divinely inspired, and had instructions immediately from heaven on special occasions, which gave them the title of prophets; and withal they were stated teachers of the church in their religious assemblies, expounded the Scriptures, and opened the doctrine of Christ with suitable applications. These were the prophets, and scribes, or teachers, which Christ promised to send, Mat. 23:34. such as were every way qualified for the service of the Christian church. Antioch was a great city, and the Christians there were many, so that they could not all meet in one place; it was therefore requisite they should have many teachers, to preside in their respective assemblies, and to deliver God's mind to them. Barnabas is first named, probably because the eldest, and Saul last, probably because the youngest; but afterward the last became first, and Saul more eminent in the church.

Three others are mentioned. (1.) Simeon, or Simon, who for distinction-sake was called Niger, or Black, from the color of his hair; like him that with us was surnamed the Black Prince. (2.) Lucius of Cyrene, who, some think, (and Dr. Lightfoot inclines to it,) was the same with this Luke that wrote the Acts; originally a Cyrenian, and educated in the Cyrenian college or synagogue at Jerusalem, and there first receiving the Gospel. (3.) Manaen, a person of some quality, as it should seem, for he was

2 As they ministered to the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate <sup>b</sup>me Barnabas and Saul for the work <sup>c</sup>whereunto I have called them.

3 And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away.

4 So they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed unto Seleucia; and from thence they sailed to Cyprus.

5 And when they were at Salamis, they preached the word of God in the synagogues of the Jews: and they had also John to their minister.

6 ¶ And when they had gone through the isle unto Paphos, they found a certain sorcerer, a false prophet, a Jew, whose name was Bar-jesus:

brought up with Herod the tetrarch, which gave him a fair prospect of preferment at court, and yet for Christ's sake he quitted all the hopes of it, like Moses; but better to be fellow-sufferer with a saint, than fellow-persecutor with a tetrarch.

2. How well employed they were, v. 2. Diligent, faithful teachers do truly minister unto the Lord. They that minister to the church in praying and preaching, both which are included here, minister unto the Lord; ministering unto the Lord, in one way or other, ought to be the stated business of churches and their teachers; religious fasting, too, is of use in our ministering to the Lord, both as a sign of our humiliation, and a mean of our mortification.

II. The orders given by the Holy Ghost for the setting apart of Barnabas and Saul; the ministers of the several congregations in the city joining in one public, solemn fast or day of prayer, the Holy Ghost said, either by a voice from heaven, or by a strong impulse on the minds of those that were prophets, Separate Me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. He does not specify the work, but refers to a former call they knew the meaning of; as for Saul, he was particularly told, he must bear Christ's name to the Gentiles, ch. 9:15. must be sent to the Gentiles, ch. 22:21. the matter was settled between them at Jerusalem before this, that as Peter, James, and John, laid out themselves among them of the circumcision, so Paul and Barnabas should go to the heathen, Gal. 2:7—9. Barnabas, it is likely, knew himself designed for that service

Holy Spirit. 10:17—23. John 14:15—17. 16:7—13. 1 Cor. 12:4—11.—The prophets and teachers, in laying their hands on them, with fasting and prayer, acted by immediate order from the Holy Spirit; thus giving a public testimony to their assured confidence, that they were divinely appointed to that service, and expressing fervent desires for their success in it. Accordingly they are said to have been 'sent forth by the Holy Ghost.' (4)—Barnabas and Saul had, for a considerable time, been ministers of the Word; so that this imposition of hands could not be for the purpose of ordaining them; nor does it appear, that any spiritual gift, or new authority, was conferred by it. 3:14—17.—Paul was 'an apostle, not by man?' Gal. 1:1, 2. his apostolical office could not then be conferred at this time; but his appointment by the Lord Jesus Himself, as the apostle of the Gentiles, might thus be publicly acknowledged, in the principal church of Gentile converts. Barnabas also is afterwards spoken of as an apostle. 14:4,1. Perhaps he was appointed by the Holy Spirit to that office, on this occasion; with some reference to the martyrdom of James, by which the number of the apostles was diminished. 14:24—28.—Which had been brought up with Herod.] 'Herod's foster-brother.' as well as Paul. Yet they would not thrust themselves into this harvest, till they received their orders from the Lord of the harvest. Observe, 1. Christ by his Spirit has the nomination of his ministers; for it is by the Spirit of Christ that they are both qualified in some measure for his service, inclined to it, and taken off from other cares inconsistent with it. The Holy Ghost has separated some for the service of Christ, as men that are offered, and that willingly offer themselves to the temple-service; and concerning them, directions are given to those who are competent judges of the sufficiency of their abilities, and the sincerity of their inclination, to separate them. 2. Christ's ministers are separated to Him and to the Holy Ghost; Separate them to Me; they are to be employed in Christ's work, and under the Spirit's guidance, to the glory of God the Father. 3. All that are separated to Christ as his ministers, are separated to work; Christ keeps no servants to be idle. If any man desires the office of a bishop, he desires a good work; that is it which he is separated to, to labor in the Word and doctrine. They are separated to take pains, not to take state. 4. The work of Christ's ministers, to which they are to be separated, is work already settled, which all Christ's ministers hitherto have been called to, and which they themselves have first been, by an external call, directed to, and have chosen.

III. Their ordination, pursuant to these orders; not to the ministry in general, but to a particular service which had something peculiar in it, and required a fresh commission; which commission God saw fit at this time to transmit by the hands of these prophets and teachers, for the giving of this direction to the church, that teachers should ordain teachers, (for prophets we are not now any longer to expect,) and that those who have the dispensing of the oracles of Christ committed to them, should, for the benefit of posterity, commit the same to faithful men, who shall be able also to teach others, 2 Tim. 2:2. So here, Simeon, and Lucius, and Manaen, faithful teachers at this time in the church of Antioch, when they had fasted and prayed, laid their hands on Barnabas and Saul, and sent them away, v. 3. according to the directions received. Observe,

1. They prayed for them. When good men are going forth about good work, they ought to be solemnly and particularly prayed for, especially by their brethren that are their fellow-laborers.

2. They joined fasting with their prayers, as they did in their other ministrations, v. 3. Christ has taught us this by his abstaining from sleep, a night-fast, if I may so call it, the night before He sent forth his apostles, that He might spend it in prayer.

3. They laid their hands on them. Hereby they gave them their manumission, or discharge, from their present service in the church of Antioch; acknowledging not only that they went off with consent, but honorably and with a good report: and thus they implored a blessing on them in their present undertaking; and in order to this, that they might be filled with the Holy Ghost in their work. This is explained, ch. 14:26. where it is said, concerning Paul and Barnabas, that from Antioch they had been recommended to the grace of God, for the work which they fulfilled.

V. 4—13. In these vs. we have,

I. A general account of Barnabas and Saul coming to Cyprus, perhaps because Barnabas was a native of that island, ch. 4:36. and he was willing they should have the first fruits of his labors, pursuant to his new commission. [Besides, it seems to have been, like Rhodes, a stepping-stone, as it were, from the E. to the European world. Ed.] Observe, 1. If the Holy Ghost send them forth, then they fear no colors, but can cheerfully venture on a stormy sea from Antioch, now to them a quiet harbor. 2. They came to Seleucia, the sea-port opposite to Cyprus, from thence crossed the sea to Cyprus; and in that island the first city they came to, was Salamis, on the E. side of the island, v. 5. and when they had sown good seed there, thence they went onward through the isle, v. 6. till they came to Paphos, which lay on the western coast. 3. They preached the Word of God, wherever they came, in the synagogues of the Jews; so far were they from excluding them, that they gave them the preference, and so left them, who believed not, inexcusable; they would have gathered them, but they would not. 4. They had John to their minister; not their servant in common things, but their assistant in the things of God; either to prepare their way in places where they designed to come, or to carry on their work in places where they had begun it, or to converse familiarly with those to whom they preached publicly, and explain things to them; and such an one might be many ways of use to them, especially in a strange country.

II. A particular account of their encounter with Elymas the sorcerer, whom they met with at Paphos, where the governor resided; a place famous for a temple built to Venus there, thence called Paphia Venus; and therefore there was more than ordinary need that the Son of God should be manifested, to destroy the works of the devil.

1. There the deputy, a Gentile, Sergius Paulus by name, encouraged the apostles, and was willing to hear their message. He was governor of the country, under the Roman emperor; proconsul or propraetor, and had the character of a prudent, intelligent, Erasmus, Grot., &c. refer Manaen to the 2d of these classes; Heumann and Walsh, with more probability, to the 1st. BL.

(2.) 'Before Cornelius' conversion, the apostles (10:1.) had received only circumcised proselytes into the Christian society; nor had they preached the Gospel to the Gentiles. But when Cornelius, a Gentile, was, by God's providence, received into that society, and thus the Jerusalem church had acknowledged that the instruction of the Gentiles was agreeable to the will of God, some Cyprians and Cyrenians had communicated the doctrine of Christ to Gentiles of Antioch (11:20), and the church at Jerusalem had sent Barnabas and Saul thither, to forward the work so happily begun, (11:22 and 25.) And these, sojourning there a year, taught both Jews and Gentiles promiscuously. But now the Christians were anxious that the Gospel should be more widely propagated among the Gentiles; so that from the congregation at Antioch other congregations might be generated, as from a common parent. Therefore the chief teachers of the church met together, to choose, from among them, some who should sustain the weighty office of promulgating the Christian doctrine among the Gentiles.' BL.

V. 4, 5. If the sentence of excommunication, which had been published against those who confessed Jesus to be the Christ, was still in force: (John 11:57.) it is evident, that it was little noticed at a distance from Jerusalem: for the apostles were constantly allowed to preach in the synagogues.—John Mark accompanied Paul and Barnabas, to perform such services by their direction, as he was capable of; with a view, no doubt, of his being employed more and more, as a preacher of the Gospel.

V. 6—12. Bar-jesus was also called 'Elymas,' from an Arabic word signifying a sorcerer.—Some think he [Sergius Paulus] was the first idolatrous Gentile, who was converted to Christ; but it is not probable,

7 Which was with the deputy of the country, Sergius Paulus, a prudent man; who called for Barnabas and Saul, and desired to hear the word of God.

8 But Elymas the sorcerer (for so is his name by interpretation) withstood them, seeking to turn away the deputy from the faith.

9 Then Saul (who also is called Paul), filled with the Holy Ghost, set his eyes on him,

10 And said, O full of all subtlety and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?

11 And now, behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season. And immediately there fell on him a mist and a darkness; and he went about, seeking some to lead him by the hand.

12 Then the deputy, when he saw what was done, believed, being astonished at the doctrine of the Lord.

considerate man; which appeared by this, that, having a character of Barnabas and Saul, he sent for them, and desired to hear the Word of God. Those are wise, however they may be ranked among the foolish of this world, who are inquisitive after the mind and will of God.

2. There Elymas, a Jew, a sorcerer, opposed them all he could. This justified the apostles in turning to the Gentiles, that this Jew was so malignant against them. (1.) This Elymas was a pretender to the gift of prophecy, a sorcerer, a false-prophet; one that would be taken for a divine, because skilled in the arts of divination; a conjurer, who took on him to tell people their fortune, and to discover things lost, and probably was in league with the devil for that purpose; his name was Bar-jesus,—the son of Joshua signifies the son of salvation; but the Syriae calls him Bar-shoma, the son of pride,—the son of inflammation. (2.) He was hanging on at court, was with the deputy of the country; it does not appear that the deputy called for him, as he did for Barnabas and Saul; but he thrust himself on him, aiming, no doubt, to make a hand of him, and get money by him. (3.) He made it his business to withstand Barnabas and Saul, as the magicians in Pharaoh's court withstood Moses and Aaron, 2 Tim. 3:8. thus he sought to keep the deputy from receiving the Gospel, v. 8. which he saw him inclined to do. Satan is in a special manner busy with great men, and men in power, to keep them from being religious; because he knows that their example, whether good or bad, will have an influence on many. And those who are any way instrumental to prejudice people against the truths and ways of Christ, are doing the devil's work. (4.) Saul, who is here for the first time called Paul, and never after Saul, fell on him for this, with a holy indignation. Saul is called Paul, v. 9. his Roman name, now when he is sent forth among the Gentiles, to put reputation on him in the Roman cities; Paulus being a very common name among them. But, some think, he was never called Paul till now that he was instrumental in the conversion of Sergius Paulus to the faith of Christ, and that he took that name Paulus, as a memorial of that victory obtained by the Gospel of Christ; as, among the Romans, he that had conquered a country, took his denomination from it, as Germanicus, Britannicus, Africanus; or rather, Sergius Paulus himself gave him the name Paulus, in token of his favor and respect to him, as Vespasian gave his name Flavius to Josephus the Jew. [1.] Paul was filled with the Holy Ghost on this occasion, with the holy zeal against a professed enemy of Christ, which was one of the graces of the Holy Ghost; a spirit of burning; filled with power to denounce the wrath of God against him, which was one of the gifts of the Holy Ghost; a spirit of judgment. He felt a more than ordinary fervor in his mind, as the prophet did when full of power by the Spirit of the Lord, Mic. 3:8. and another prophet, when his face was made harder than flint, Ez. 3:9. and another, when his mouth was made like a sharp sword, Is. 49:2. What Paul said, did not come from any personal resentment, but from the strong impressions the Holy Ghost made on his spirit. [2.] He set his eyes on him, to face him down, and to show a holy boldness, in opposition to his wicked impudence. He set his eyes on him, as an indication that the eye of the heart-searching God was on him, and saw through him; nay, that the face of the Lord was against him, Ps. 34:16. He fixed his eyes on him, to see if he could discern in his countenance any marks of remorse for what he had done; which, if he could have discerned the least sign of, it had prevented the ensuing doom. [3.] He gave him his true character, not in passion, but by the Holy Ghost, who knows men better than they know themselves, v. 10. He describes him to be an agent for hell; and such there have been on earth, ever since Cain, who was of that wicked one: he was really a child of the devil, bore his image, did his lusts, and served his interests, John 8:44. two things resembling him, as a child his father. In craft, Gen. 3:1. though void of all wisdom, he was full of subtlety, expert in all the arts of deceiving men, and imposing on them. In malice; he was full of all mischief; a spiteful, ill-conditioned man, a sworn, implacable enemy to God and goodness. A fulness of subtlety and mischief together, make a man indeed a child of the devil: and as it follows, of course, an enemy to all righteousness, for the devil is so. [4.] He charged on him his present crime, and expostulated with him on it; 'Wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord, to misrepresent them, to put false colors on them, and so to discourage people from entering into them, and walking in them?' [5.] He denounced the judgment of God on him, in a present blindness, v. 11. This was designed both for the proof of his crime, as it was a miracle wrought to confirm the right ways of the Lord, and consequently to show the wickedness of him who would not cease to pervert them; as also for the punishment of his crime. It was a suitable punishment; he shut the eyes of his mind against the light of the Gospel, therefore justly were the eyes of his body shut against the light of the sun; he sought to blind the deputy, as an agent for the god of this world, 2 Cor. 4:4. therefore is himself struck blind: yet it was a moderate punishment, he was only struck blind, when he might most justly have been struck dead; and it was only for a season; if he will repent, and give glory to God, by making confession, his sight shall be restored; nay, it should seem, though he do not, yet his sight shall be restored, to try if he will be led to repentance, either by the judgments of God or by his mercies. [6.] This judgment was immediately executed; there fell on him a mist and a darkness; this silenced him presently, filled him with confusion, and was an effectual confutation of all he said against the doctrine of Christ. It was also an earnest to him of a much sorer punishment if he repent not. Elymas did himself proclaim the truth of the miracle, when he went about seeking some to lead him by the hand; and where now is all his skill in sorcery, on which he had so much valued himself, when he can neither find his way himself, nor find a friend that will be so kind as to lead him!

3. Notwithstanding all the endeavors of Elymas to turn away the deputy from the faith, he was brought to believe, and this miracle, wrought on the magician himself, (like the boils of Egypt,) Ex. 9:11. contributed to it. The deputy was a very sensible man, and observed something uncommon, and which spake its divine original, (1.) In Paul's preaching; he was astonished at the doctrine of the Lord, the Lord Christ, the doctrine from Him, the discoveries He has made of the Father; the doctrine concerning Him, his Person, nature, offices, undertaking. (2.) In this miracle; when he saw what was done, and how much Paul's power transcended that of the magician, he believed. It is not said that he was baptized, and so made a complete convert, but probably he was. The tradition of the Roman church, which has taken care to find bishoprics for all the eminent converts we read of in the Acts, has made this Sergius Paulus bishop of Narbon in France, left there by Paul in his journey to Spain.

III. Their departure from Cyprus. Probably they did a great deal more there than is recorded, where an account is given only of that which was extraordinary,—the conversion of the deputy. When they had done that all the Gentile converts at Antioch had previously been proselyted from idolatry; or that Saul and Barnabas had made no converts from idolatry in their progress through Cyprus.—Dr. Lardner has, with great learning, vindicated the accuracy of Luke, in calling the governor a proconsul; and shown, that those who governed the provinces by the appointment of the Senate, were called proconsuls, though they had never been consuls; and that Cyprus was at this time a province of that description.

(6, 7.) Sorcerer.] Magos: note, 8:9. Prudent.] 'I. e. clever, capable, intelligent: so Thucyd. uses the Gr. word. This corresponds to what Galeu (see Wetst.) says of this proconsul; ta panta proteuontos ergois te kai logois tois en philosophia; and, en Philabios,—espeukōs de peri tēn Aristotelous philosophian. From which it appears, that he was well versed in natural philosophy; and probably for that reason (especially as he must have seen the folly of polytheism) was cultivating the society of Bar-jesus, who, besides communicating information on the principles of natural philosophy, could instruct him in the knowledge of one true God, as contained in the Jewish religion. His sending for Paul and Barnabas, the preachers of a religion which professed to be an improvement upon Judaism, was what we might expect from so curious an investigator of truth.'

Perhaps Paul resolved to use it now, on this solemn, systematic mission, seeing the inconveniences of his former name.'

13 ¶ Now when Paul and his company loosed from Paphos, they came to Perga in Pamphylia; and John, departing from them, returned to Jerusalem.

14 But when they departed from Perga, they came to Antioch in Pisidia, and went into the synagogue <sup>f</sup> on the sabbath-day, and sat down.

15 And after the reading <sup>e</sup> of the law and the prophets, the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them, saying, Ye men and brethren, if ye have any word <sup>h</sup> of exhortation for the people, say on.

16 Then Paul stood up, and beckoning with his hand, said, Men of Israel, and ye that fear God, give audience.

17 The God of this people of Israel chose <sup>i</sup> our fathers, and exalted the people when they dwelt <sup>j</sup> as strangers in the land of Egypt, and with an <sup>k</sup> high arm brought he them out of it.

18 And about the time of forty <sup>l</sup> years <sup>m</sup> suffered he their manners in the wilderness.

19 And when he had destroyed <sup>n</sup> seven nations in the land of Chanaan, he <sup>o</sup> divided their land to them by lot.

1. They quitted her country, and went to Perga. Those that went, were Paul, and his company, which probably was increased in Cyprus, many being desirous to accompany him. They that were about Paul, loosed from Paphos; which supposes that he went too; but such an affection had his new friends for him, that they were always about him, and by their good-will would be never from him.

2. Then John Mark quitted them, and returned to Jerusalem, without the consent of Paul and Barnabas; either he did not like the work, or he wanted to go see his mother. It was his fault, and we shall hear of it again.

V. 14—41. Paul's sermon to them of Antioch, in these vs. is, it is likely, the substance of what was preached by the apostles generally to the Jews in all places; for in dealing with them, the proper way was, to show them how the N. T., which they would have them to receive, exactly agreed with the O. T. which they not only received, but were zealous for. We have here,

I. Paul and Barnabas' appearance in a religious assembly of the Jews, v. 14. Though lately successful with a Roman deputy, yet, when they came to Antioch, they did not inquire for the chief magistrate, or make their court to him, but applied themselves to the Jews; a further proof of their good affection to them, and desire of their welfare.

1. They observed their time of worship. The first day of the week they observed among themselves as a Christian Sabbath; but if they will meet the Jews, it must be on the seventh-day Sabbath; which, therefore, on such occasions, they did as yet sometimes observe. For though by the death of Christ the ceremonial law died, and the morality of the fourth commandment was entirely transferred to the Christian Sabbath, yet it was not incongruous to join the Jews in their sabbath-sanctification.

2. They met them in their place of worship, in the synagogue. Sabbath-days should be kept holy in solemn assemblies; they are instituted chiefly for public worship; the sabbath-day is a holy convocation, and for that reason no servile work must be done therein. Paul and Barnabas were strangers; but wherever we come, we must inquire out God's faithful worshippers, and join them, as those that desire to keep up a communion with all saints; though strangers, they were admitted into the synagogue, and to sit down there. Care should be taken, in places of public worship, that strangers be accommodated, even the poorest; for of those of whom we know nothing else, we know this, that they have precious souls.

II. Their invitation to preach. 1. The usual service of the synagogue was performed, v. 15. When we come together to worship God, we must do it not only by prayer and praise, but by the reading and hearing of the Word of God; hereby we give Him the glory due to his name, as our Lord and Lawgiver. 2. Then they were asked, by the rulers of the synagogue, to give them a sermon, v. 15. Probably the rulers had been in private conversation with them before; and if they had not an affection to the Gospel, yet had at least the curiosity to hear Paul preach; and therefore they begged the favor of a word of exhortation to the people. Note, the bare reading of the Scriptures in public assemblies is not sufficient, but they should be expounded, and the people exhorted out of them. Those that preside, and have power, in public assemblies, should provide for a word of exhortation, whenever they come together. Sometimes a word from a strange minister may be of great use.

III. Paul's sermon. He stood up, as one prepared and determined to speak, and beckoned with his hand, to excite and prepare them to hear; he waved his hand as an orator, not only desiring silence and attention, but endeavoring to move affection, and show himself in earnest. Perhaps, there were those in the synagogue, ready to oppose the toleration of Paul's preaching, and that occasioned some tumult and commotion, which Paul endeavored to quiet by that decent and usual motion of his hand; as also by his modest desire of a patient, impartial hearing; Men of Israel, that are Jews by birth, and ye that fear God, that are proselyted to the Jewish religion, give audience; let me beg your attention a little, for I have something to say to you, which concerns your everlasting peace, and would not say it in vain.

Now this sermon is recorded, to show that those who preached the Gospel to the Gentiles, did it not till they had first used their utmost endeavor with the Jews, to persuade them to come in, and take the benefit of it; and everything is touched in this sermon, that might be proper, either to influence the judgment, or affections of the Jews, to embrace Christ as the promised Messiah.

1. Probably, the Jews of the dispersion, being more in danger of mingling with the nations, were more jealous of their peculiarity than those that lived in their own land were; therefore Paul is here very careful to notice it, to their honor. But they ought to remember their primitive condition, and God's free love, and infer hence, that God was no debtor to them, and did them no wrong, if He at length plucked up the hedge of their peculiarity. But they were debtors to Him, and obliged to receive such further discoveries as He should make of his will, and to admit such further additions as He should make to his church. For He had, with a high hand brought them out of Egypt; He had suffered their manners forty years in the wilderness, v. 18. Some think it should be read, he educated them, because that is the word the Sept. use concerning God's fatherly care of them, Deut. 1:31. Both may be included; for God both made great provision for them for forty years in the wilderness, and exercised great patience with them also. So many years as we have each of us lived in this world, we must own that God has thus been as a tender Father to us, has supplied our wants, and not been extreme to mark what we have done amiss; we have tried his patience, and yet not tired it. Let not the Jews insist too much on the privileges of their peculiarity, for they had forfeited them a thousand times.

Further, He had put them in possession of the land of Canaan, v. 19. a great honor, he would not in the least derogate from. He had raised up men, spirited from heaven, to deliver them, after their settlement, v. 20, 21. The critics find some difficulty in computing these 450 years. From the deliverance out of Egypt, to David's expulsion of the Jebusites from the strong-hold of Zion, which completed the casting out of the heathen nations, was 450 years; and most of that time they were under judges. Others thus; The government of the judges, from the death of Joshua to the death of Eli, was just 339 years, but it is said to be as it were 450 years; because the years of their servitude to the several nations that oppressed them, though really included in the years of the judges, are yet mentioned in the history as if distinct. Now these, all put together, make 111 years, and those added to the 339, make them 450; as so many, though not really so many. He governed them by a prophet, Samuel, a man divinely inspired to preside in their affairs. He afterward, at their request, set a king over them, v. 21. Samuel's government and his lasted forty years; which was a kind of transition from the theocracy to the kingly government. At last, He made David their king, v. 22. Then, when He had removed one king, He soon raised up another; raised him up from a mean and low estate, raised him up on high, 2 S. 23:1. He quotes the testimony God

V. 16—19. Some explain the expression, "Ye that fear God," of the religious proselytes (43): but it is plain, that there were Gentiles, as well as proselytes, in the synagogue (42); perhaps some place was allotted to them, in hopes that they would soon embrace the Jewish religion, as others already had done.

(17.) Exalted.] Honored them through Joseph, and during his influence; multiplied them, as Is. 1:1. Gen. 48:19. comp. Deut. 1:10. Acts 7:17; raised them from their calamitous state; and worked illustrious miracles in their behalf. Buxt., Wolf, Kypke, &c.

(18.) Bear with manners.] The usage of the word in the received text, etropophorēsen, is defended and illustrated from Cic., Terence, Aristoph. The other reading is found in some excellent MSS., and the Syr., Arab., Copt., Æth., Slavonic; is recognised by Athanasius, Cyril, Macarius, Hesychius, and Const. Apostol.; is defended by Pauff, Casaub., Hamn., Mill, Beng., Mat., Ern., Pearce, Morus, Ros., Kuin., and Valck.; and has been received into the text by Griesb. Bl. who, however, prefers the former; see his note.

20 And after that, he gave unto them judges, <sup>p</sup> about the space of four hundred and fifty years, until Samuel the prophet.

21 And afterward they <sup>q</sup> desired a king: and God gave unto them Saul <sup>r</sup> the son of Cis, a man of the tribe of Benjamin, by the space of forty years.

22 And when <sup>s</sup> he had removed him, he raised up unto them David <sup>t</sup> to be their king; to whom also he gave testimony, and said, I have found David the <sup>u</sup> son of Jesse, a man <sup>v</sup> after mine own heart, which shall fulfil all my will.

23 Of this man's seed hath God, according to his promise, <sup>w</sup> raised unto <sup>x</sup> Israel a Savior, Jesus:

gave of him, a man after my own heart; such an one as I would have. This character was given of him before he was first anointed, 1 S. 13:14. He shall fulfil all my will. [Note, end of 1 K.]

Now all this seems to show not only the special favor of God to Israel, but the further favors, of another nature, He designed them, and which were now, by the preaching of the Gospel, offered to them; therefore they needed not conceive any jealousy at all of the preaching of the Gospel, as if it tended in the least to damage the true excellences of the Jewish church.

2. He gives them a full account of our Lord Jesus, passing from David to the Son of David, and shows, that this Jesus is his promised seed, v. 23. How welcome should the preaching of the Gospel of Christ be to the Jews, and how should they embrace it, as well worthy of all acceptation, when it brought them the tidings of a Savior, to deliver them out of the hands of their enemies, to save them from their sins, even their worst enemies: a Savior of God's raising up, that has his commission from heaven; raised up to be a Savior unto Israel, to them in the first place; raised up of the seed of David, that ancient, royal family, which the people of Israel gloried so much in; raised up according to his promise, the promise to David, Ps. 132:11. the promise to the O. T. church, in the latter times of it, Jer. 23:5. This promise was it to which the twelve tribes hoped to come, ch. 26:7. why then should they entertain it so coldly, now it was brought to them? Concerning this Jesus, he tells them,

(1.) That John the Baptist was his harbinger and forerunner; that great man, whom all acknowledge to be a prophet, v. 24. 1st. He made way for his entrance, by preaching the baptism of repentance, not to a few select disciples, but to all the people of Israel; to whom Christ's grace would be acceptable, when they were thus brought to know themselves. 2dly. He gave notice of his approach, v. 25. As he fulfilled his course, when he was going on vigorously in his work, and had had powerful success in it, and an established interest; 'Now,' saith he to those that attended his ministry, 'Who think ye that I am? What notions have you of me, what expectations from me? You may be thinking that I am the Messiah, whom you expect; but you are mistaken, I am not He: (see John 1:28.) but He is at the door; behold, there cometh One, immediately after me, who will so far exceed me on all accounts, that I am not worthy to be employed in the meanest office about Him; no, not to help Him on and off with his shoes; and you may guess who that must be.'

(2.) That the rulers and people of the Jews, who should have welcomed Him, and been his willing, forward, faithful subjects, were his persecutors and murderers! Paul cannot charge this on his hearers, as Peter did, ch. 2:23. but he charges it on the Jews at Jerusalem, and the rulers, to show what little reason those Jews of the dispersion had to be so jealous as they were, for the honor of their nation, when it had brought on itself such a load and stain of guilt as this, and how justly they might have been cut off from all benefit by the Messiah, and yet were not. But, indeed, 1st. They knew Him not, v. 27. knew not who He was, nor his errand into the world; for if they had known, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. Christ owned this in extenuation of their crime, and so did Peter, ch. 3:17. It was also because they knew not the voice of the prophets; they did not understand nor consider, that it was foretold that the Messiah should suffer. Many that read the prophets, do not understand the meaning of them; they have the sound of the Gospel in their ears, but not the sense of it in their heads, or savor of it in their hearts. And therefore men do not know Christ, nor know how to carry it toward Him, because they do not know the voice of the prophets, who testified beforehand concerning Christ. 2dly. God overruled them for the accomplishment of the prophecies of the O. T. Because they knew not the voice of the prophets, which warned them not to touch God's Anointed, they fulfilled them in condemning Him; for so it was written, that Messiah the Prince shall be cut off; but not for Himself. Men may be fulfilling scripture-prophecies, even when breaking scripture-precepts; particularly in the persecution of the church, as of Christ. And this justifies the reason sometimes given for the obscurity of scripture-prophecies, that if too plain and obvious, their accomplishment would thereby be prevented. So Paul saith here, because they knew not the voice of the prophets, therefore they have fulfilled them, which implies they would not, if they had understood them. 3dly. All that was foretold concerning the sufferings of the Messiah, was fulfilled in Christ, v. 29. and circumstances are noticed here, that made his resurrection the more illustrious. They laid Him in a sepulchre, and thought they had Him fast.

(3.) That He rose again from the dead, and saw no corruption; this was the great truth to be preached; for it is the main pillar by which the whole fabric of the Gospel

V. 20. This v. has peculiar difficulties connected with it. The time, which elapsed from the departure of Israel out of Egypt, to the building of Solomon's temple, was no more than 480 years. (Note, 1 Kings 6:1.) But, on the lowest computation, 57 years elapsed, from the passage of the Red Sea to the death of Joshua; and 84 years, during the days of Samuel, Saul, and David, and till the 4th year of Solomon; and this leaves only 339 years, from the death of Joshua to the times of Samuel. So that, without adverting to the difficulties of computing the years during the Judges, Judg. 3:11. 11:25, 26. it is evident that this general calculation cannot possibly allow 450 years for that part of the history, even continuing it to 20 years after the death of Eli. Some alteration, therefore, seems unavoidably needful either in this narrative, or in the general statement in Kings. On this ground some think that 350 years, should be read, in this place, instead of 450; and it is evident, that the error might easily be made by a transcriber. This would bring the computation within about 10 or 11 years; and, as the historian says, 'about the space, &c.' it might be improper to expect greater accuracy. There is, however, no authority, which warrants such a change in the text.—Josephus saith, that Solomon began to build the temple . . . 592 years after the children of Israel's departure out of Egypt. Now if you make the time of the Judges 450 years, the computation is exactly 591 years. He' (Paul) 'therefore here, . . . accords with the computation of his nation, at that time, that so they might not except against his words. Wilderness 40, Joshua 17, Judges 450, Samuel and Saul 40, David 40, Solomon 4.—591. . . Luke continually follows exactly the computation of the Sept. and of the Jews, as we learn from his inserting Cainan; (Luke 3:36.) his making Saul to reign 40 years (21); and from this v., where he accords exactly with Josephus.' Whitby, in Scott.—Perhaps this learned writer did not recollect, that this computation of Josephus alters the whole system of Biblical chronology. For the chronology of the Heb. Scripture to the Exodus, and from the building of the temple till the coming of Christ, is founded on grounds sufficiently firm; but if 112 years more than the general computation, passed between the Exodus and the building of the temple; then the birth of Christ took place, in the year of the world 4115, instead of 4004. It is well known, or at least generally acknowledged, that the chronology, both of the Sept. and of Josephus, is erroneous and perplexed, in no ordinary degree; [note, end of Gen. §] but how far the apostle, and Luke, in recording his discourse, took these unimportant matters, as they found them, is another question; and if they did so, the circumstance of learned men in their studies having discovered that those generally admitted calculations were inaccurate, has, in my view, nothing to do with the divine inspiration, of either the preacher or the historian. For they were inspired, to deliver divine truth to mankind, unsophisticated and unutilated; not to correct genealogies, or give chronological calculations. Even on the supposition, that the apostle was aware of the inaccuracy; it would have obstructed his grand object, to advance any new opinion, or to go out of his way to correct the current one.—Grocius and Usher note here, that other copies read thus; 'He divided to them their land about 450 years, and after that He gave them judges;' and they begin the time of this computation from the birth of Isaac, and to the end of 7 years, (in Canaan,) when the land was divided to them, was about 450 years.' Whitby. I agree with this writer, that this is not the natural or obvious construction of the passage; but could it stand without any alteration of the text, it might be admitted.—'And after these things, which took up about 450 years, He gave them judges, &c.' This would require no change in the text; but I doubt whether it be not wholly inadmissible; and if so, we must recur to the solution above given.

Scott. (20.) 'As this passage cannot be reconciled with it, Kuin. (whom see) suspects 1 K. 6:1. to be corrupt.'

V. 21. 'David was but 30 years of age, when he began to reign over Judah, which was not till after Saul was slain; (2 Sam. 5:4.) and Samuel did only anoint him, (at which time we cannot suppose David to have been less than 15 years old,) but lived a considerable time after. The authority of Josephus is urged; . . . for he says, that Saul reigned 13 years during Samuel's life, and 22 years after his death; but this is utterly incredible; for then David could not be 8 years old when Samuel anointed him.' Doddr.—Indeed, as many subsequent events, which must have occupied several years, took place, between the anointing of David and the death of Samuel; 1 S. 16: 25:1. it is certain, according to the scriptural history, that Saul survived Samuel but a short time; and every circumstance combines to prove, that all the years during which Samuel judged Israel, and Saul reigned, are here intended. 'I suppose, that the years of Samuel also are added to the reign of the king, by Paul; Sulpitius Severus; as doubtless they were, they making together just 40 years.' Whitby.

V. 22. My will. 'The wills.' Implying the several particulars, in which David, a prophet, a king, and a type of Christ, accomplished the commands and purposes of God.

(22.) 'There is no passage of the O. T. which contains precisely these words; which seem to be confounded from Ps. 89:21. 1 S. 13:14. with some slight alteration and amplification; on which mode of citing from the O. T., see note, 7:7.'

V. 24-37. The Jews, who were present, had doubtless heard of John's ministry; and of his declaration that he was not the Messiah, but his forerunner; and probably some report had reached them of his testimony to Jesus. The passage here quoted shows, that the Messiah was 'the Son of God' in a peculiar sense; and the decree there mentioned was confirmed, when He was declared to be the Son of God with power, by his resurrection from the dead.' Rom. 1:1-4. The several quotations are nearly in the words of the Sept., which accord with the Heb.—(33) The second Psalm.] The Psalms were arranged in the same order as they are at present.—His own generation by the will of God.]

27 For they that dwell at Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they knew him not, nor yet the voices of the prophets which are read every sabbath-day, <sup>r</sup> they have fulfilled them in condemning him.

28 And though they found no cause of death in him, yet desired they Pilate that he should be slain.

29 And when they had fulfilled all that was written of him, they took him down from the tree, and laid him in a sepulchre.

30 But God raised him from the dead:

31 And he was seen <sup>a</sup> many days of them which came up with him from Galilee to Jerusalem, who are his witnesses unto the people.

is supported, therefore he insists largely on this, and shows, 1st. That He rose by consent, v. 30. God raised Him; sent an angel on purpose to roll away the stone from the prison door, returned Him the spirit which at his death He had committed into the hands of his Father, and quickened Him by the Holy Ghost. 2dly. That there was sufficient proof of his being risen, v. 31. Paul says nothing of his own seeing Him, which he mentions, 1 Cor. 15: 8. because it was in a vision, which was more convincing to himself, than it could be when produced to others; [but he uses we in v. 32.] 3dly. That so far are we from designing to put any slur on you, that the doctrine we preach, if you receive it aright, and understand it, brings you the greatest honor and satisfaction imaginable, v. 32, 33.; for it is in the resurrection of Christ, that the promise which was made to your fathers, the patriarchs, &c. is fulfilled to you. God raised up Jesus to be a Prophet, at his baptism; to be a Priest to make atonement, at his death; and to be a King to rule over all, at his ascension; and his raising Him up again from the dead, was the confirmation and ratification of all these commissions, and proved Him raised of God to these offices. This is the fulfilling of the promises made to the fathers, the promise of sending the Messiah, and of all those benefits and blessings which were to be had with Him and by Him. Paul puts himself into the number of the Jews, to whom the promise was fulfilled, to us their children. Now if they who preached the Gospel, brought them these glad tidings, instead of looking upon them as enemies, they ought to caress them as their best friends, and embrace their doctrine; for if they valued the promise so much, and themselves by it, much more the performance. And the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles, the great thing the Jews found themselves aggrieved at, was so far from infringing the promise made to them, that the promise itself, that all the families of the earth should be blessed in the Messiah, could not otherwise be accomplished. 4thly. That the resurrection of Christ was the great proof of his being the Son of God; and confirms what was written in the second Ps. Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten Thee. That the resurrection of Christ from the dead, was designed to evidence and evince this, is plain from that of the apostle, Rom. 1: 4. Abundance of truth there is couched in those words; that this Jesus was begotten of the Father before all worlds; was the Brightness of his glory, and the express image of his Person, as the son is of the father's: that He was the Logos, the eternal Thought of the eternal Mind; that He was conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost, in the womb of the virgin; for on that account also, that Holy Thing was called the Son of God, Luke 1: 35. that He was God's Agent in creating and governing the world, and in redeeming it and reconciling it to Himself, and faithful as a Son in his own house; and as such was Heir of all things. Now all this which was declared at Christ's baptism, and again at his transfiguration, was undeniably proved by his resurrection. When his eternal generation is spoken of, it is not improper to say, This day have I begotten Thee; for from everlasting to everlasting, is with God as it were one and the same eternal [present]. Yet it may also be accommodated to his resurrection, in a subordinate sense, 'This day have I made it to appear that I have begotten Thee'; and this day have I begotten all that are given to Thee: ' for it is said, 1 Pet. 1: 3. that the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, as our God and Father, hath begotten us again to a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. 5thly. That his being raised the third day, so as not to see corruption, and to a heavenly life, so as no more to return to corruption, to the state of the dead, as others did who were raised to life, further confirms his being the Messiah promised. He rose to die no more; so it is expressed Rom. 6: 9. Now this was the fulfilling of that scripture, Is. 55: 3. for in the promise made to David, and in him to Christ, great stress is laid upon the faithfulness of God, Ps. 89: 1, 2, 5, 24, 33. and upon the oath God had sworn by his holiness, v. 35. Now this makes them sure mercies, indeed, that He who is intrusted with the dispensing of them, is risen, to die no more; so that He ever lives to see his own will executed, and the blessings He hath purchased for us, given out to us. He rose so soon after He was dead, that his body did not see corruption; for it is not till the third day that the body begins to change. Now this was promised to David, it was one of the sure mercies of David; for it was said to him in Ps. 16: 10. Neither wilt Thou suffer thy Holy One to see corruption, v. 35. God had promised to David, that He would raise up the Messiah of his seed, who should therefore be a Man, but should not like other men see corruption. This promise could not be and was not accomplished in David, v. 36. but looked forward to and was accomplished in Christ, v. 37.

3. Having given them this account of the Lord Jesus, and already, in the midst of his discourse, v. 26. tenderly and respectfully told them their intimate and common concern in it, he comes, in closing, to apply it to his hearers. And let all that hear the Gospel of Christ, know:

(1.) That it is an act of indemnity granted by the King of kings to the children of men, who stand attainted at his bar of treason against his crown and dignity; and it is for and in consideration of the mediation of Christ between God and man, that this act of grace is passed and proclaimed, v. 33. Through this Man, who died and rose again, is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins. We are to tell you, in God's name, that your sins, though many and great, may be forgiven, and how it is come about that they may be so, without any injury to God's honor; and how you may obtain their forgiveness.

(2.) That it does that for us, which the law of Moses could not do. The Jews were jealous for the law, and because it prescribed expiatory and pacificatory sacrifices, and a great variety of purifications, fancied they might be justified by it before God. 'No,' saith Paul, 'be it known to you, that it is by Christ only that they who believe in Him, and none else, are justified from all things, from all the guilt and stain of sin, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses,' v. 39. therefore embrace the Gospel, and adhere not to the Law, because the Gospel is perfective, not destructive, of the law. Note, [1.] The great concern of sinners, is, to be justified, to be acquitted from guilt, and accepted as righteous in God's sight. [2.] Those who are truly justified are acquitted from all their guilt; for if any be left charged on the sinner, he is undone. [3.] It was impossible for a sinner to be justified by the law of Moses; not by his moral law, for we have all broken it, and transgress it daily, so that instead of justifying us, it condemns us: not by his remedial law, for it was not possible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sin, should satisfy God's offended justice, or pacify the sinner's wounded conscience. It was but a ritual and typical institution. See Heb. 9: 9. 10: 1, 4. [4.] By Jesus Christ we obtain a complete justification; for by Him a complete atonement was made for sin. [5.] All that believe

As there is no preposition to either clause, the words may be rendered, 'Having served,' or 'ministered unto the will,' or counsel, 'of God, in his own generation, he fell asleep, &c.' And this seems the more exact view of the subject. 'The counsel of God,' to which David ministered, related to many generations; but he fulfilled his service during his life; whereas Christ fulfils a most important part of his office, subordinate to his death, as risen, and ascended, and glorified. 38 Be it known unto you therefore, men and brethren, that through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins :

39 And by <sup>j</sup>him, all that believe are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses.

40 Beware therefore, lest that come upon you which is spoken of in <sup>k</sup>the prophets ;

41 Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish : for I work a work in your days, a work which ye shall in nowise believe, though a man declare it unto you.

42 ¶ And when the Jews were gone out of the synagogue, the Gentiles besought that these words might be preached to them <sup>l</sup>the next sabbath.

43 Now when the congregation was broken up, many of the Jews and religious proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas : who speaking to them, persuaded them to continue <sup>m</sup>in the grace of God.

44 ¶ And the next sabbath-day came almost the whole city together, to hear the word of God.

45 But when the Jews saw the multitudes, they were filled with envy, and spake against those things which were spoken by Paul, <sup>n</sup>contradicting and blaspheming.

in Christ, that rely on Him, and give up themselves to be ruled by Him, are justified by Him, and none but they. [6.] What the Law could not do for us, in that it was weak, that the Gospel of Christ does; therefore it was folly, out of a jealousy for the law of Moses, and the honor of that institution, to conceive a jealousy of the Gospel of Christ, and the designs of that more perfect institution.

(3.) It is at their utmost peril if they reject the Gospel of Christ, and turn their backs on the offer now made them, v. 40, 41. Those to whom the Gospel is preached, must see themselves on trial, and are concerned to beware lest they be found refusers of the grace offered. The threatenings are warnings to us. Now the prophecy referred to; we have, Hab. 1:5. where the destruction of the Jewish nation by the Chaldeans, is foretold as an incredible, unparalleled destruction; and that is here applied to the destruction that was coming on that nation by the Romans, for their rejecting of the Gospel of Christ. The apostle follows the Sept. tr.; which reads, Behold, ye despisers: (for, Behold, ye among the heathen;) because [while] it made the text more apposite to his purpose; [his audience better knew the Sept. than the Heb.] Note, it is the ruin of many, that they despise religion, they look upon it as a thing below them, and are not willing to stoop to it. But they that will not wonder and be saved, shall wonder and perish. Let the unbelieving Jews expect, that God will work a work in their days, which you shall in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you. This may be understood as a prediction, either, [1.] Of their sin; that they should be incredulous, that that great work of God, the redemption of the world by Christ, though it should be in the most solemn manner declared unto them, yet they would in no wise believe it, Is. 53:1. Or, [2.] Of their destruction; the dissolving of the Jewish polity, the taking of the kingdom of God from them, and giving it to the Gentiles, the destruction of their holy house and city, and the dispersion of their people, Mat. 24:21. Thus is there a strange punishment to the workers of iniquity, especially to the despisers of Christ, Job 31:3.

V. 42—52. The design of this story being to vindicate the apostles, especially Paul, as he doth himself at large, Rom. 11. from the reflections of the Jews on him for preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles, it is here observed, that he proceeded therein with all the caution imaginable, and on due consideration, of which here is an instance.

I. Some of the Jews were so incensed against the preaching of the Gospel, not to the Gentiles, but to themselves, that they would not bear to hear it, but resolved they would not be convinced, and went out of the synagogue while Paul was preaching, v. 42. in contempt of him and his doctrine, and to the disturbance of the congregation. Now this spoke an open, obstinate infidelity. Justly therefore was the Gospel taken from them, when they first took themselves from it. God never leaves any till they first leave Him.

II. The Gentiles were as willing to hear the Gospel, as those rude and ill-conditioned Jews were to get out of the hearing of it; They besought that these words, or words to this effect, might be preached to them the next Sabbath; in the week between, so some take it; on the second and fifth day of the week, which in some synagogues were their lecture-days. But it appears, v. 44. that it was the next sabbath-day that they came together. This justifies Paul in his preaching to them, that he was invited to it, as Peter was sent for to Cornelius. Who could refuse to break the bread of life to those who begged so hard for it; and to give that to the poor at the door, which the children at the table threw under their feet? They had heard the doctrine of Christ, but did not understand it at the first hearing, nor could they remember all that they had heard, therefore they begged it might be preached to them again. It is good to have the Word of Christ repeated to us. To hear the same things should not be grievous, because it is safe, Phil. 3:1.

III. There were some, nay, many of the Jews and religious proselytes wrought upon, who followed Paul and Barnabas, and received further instructions and encouragement from them: submitted to the grace of God, and were admitted to the benefit and comfort of it; that is implied in their being exhorted to continue in it. Paul and Barnabas, speaking to them with all the freedom and friendship imaginable, persuaded them to continue in the grace of God; to hold fast what they had received; to continue in their belief of the Gospel of grace; to continue in their dependence on the Spirit of grace, and attendance on the means of grace. And the grace of God shall not be wanting to those who thus continue in it.

IV. There was a cheerful attendance upon the preaching of the Gospel the next sabbath-day; (v. 44.) proving the fields were white to the harvest, and so justifying Paul. Almost the whole city (the generality of which were Gentiles) came together to hear the Word of God. Probably Paul and Barnabas were not idle in the week-days, but took all opportunities in the week between, (as some think the Gentiles desired,) to bring them acquainted with Christ, and to raise their expectations from Him. They did a great deal in private discourse and conversation, as well as in their public sermons. Some of this vast concourse came out of curiosity, the thing being new; others, longing to see what the Jews would do on the second tender of the Gospel to them; and many who had heard something of the Word of God, came to hear more; and to hear it, not as the word of men, but as the Word of God by which we must be ruled and judged.

V. When the Jews saw the multitudes, and considered what an encouragement it was to Paul to go on in his work; when they saw people thus flying like doves to their windows, and what probability there was, that among these multitudes, some would be, without doubt, wrought upon, and, it is likely, the greater part, to embrace Christ,—this filled them with indignation and envy, v. 45. This was the same spirit that worked in the Pharisees toward Christ, they were cut to the heart, when they saw the whole world go after Him. When the kingdom of heaven was opened, they not only would not go in themselves, but were angry with them that did. They opposed the doctrine the apostles preached; cavilled at those things, start-

V. 38—41. The apostle here applied the doctrine, which he had stated and proved.—There were several crimes, for which no sacrifices were appointed, but to which the sentence of death was annexed, by that law. Ps. 51:16.—This discourse, and the subsequent vs., are worthy of particular consideration; especially for the representation which it gives of the apostle's message; and as it enters so explicitly, in the way of the epistles, into the doctrine of justification by Christ. Rom. 3:19—26. 4:1—8. 5:1, 2.

SCOTT. (39.) 'The Law appointed sin-offerings to expiate smaller offences, so far as that the offender who offered them should be free from all further prosecution on account of them. But this very view of them shows, how absolutely necessary to the being of society it was, that they should not be admitted in cases of murder, adultery, &c. These crimes, therefore, were made capital; nor was the dying criminal, however penitent, allowed to offer them; which would have been quite inconsistent with the temporal pardon connected with them. But the expiatory sacrifice of Christ takes away the guilt of all sins; and though it by no means affects the manner in which offenders would stand in human courts, (which the Mosaic sacrifice did,) it delivers from the condemnation of God in the invisible world, with respect to which the others could have no efficacy at all; as it was a very supposable case, that an impenitent sinner might present them in all their exactest forms. Comp. Rom. 8:3. Gal. 2:16. Heb. 10:4.'

V. 42—48. 'As many as were ordained to eternal life.'—Some interpret the word here used, of the internal disposition of the heart of the hearers; those who were in earnest to obtain eternal life at all adventures, believed the Gospel. This indeed does not seem the meaning of the word; yet as such a disposition is the effect of preventing grace, it still leads us back to that humiliating [humbling] doctrine, which so much labor is employed in vain to obscure or exclude. Phil. 2:12, 13. Jam. 1:6—18. See Art. x. of the Church of England. 'O God, from whom all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works do proceed, &c.' Col. 'The translators of the English Testament give many words a predestinarian sense, which there is no reason for.' Gilpin. The justice of this remark may fairly be disputed: but it shows, at least, what even an opponent allows to have been the creed of the translators; for men do not generally, in translating or commenting, give words a meaning contrary to their own decided opinions, without very strong reasons for so doing.—It is indeed useless, and highly improper, and quite unnecessary, to rest the argument on a word, which may perhaps admit of some other meaning; but the labored discussions of those, who are greatly afraid lest the doctrine of gratuitous personal election to eternal life should be collected from it, leave this impression on my mind, that these writers would themselves have carefully avoided a term, which needs so much guarding against misconception.—(47) I have set, &c.] Nearly, not exactly from the LXX, who well tr. the Heb. 46 Then Paul and Barnabas waxed bold, and said, It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you: but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles.

47 For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldst be for salvation unto the ends of the earth.

48 And when the Gentiles heard this, they were glad, and glorified the word of the Lord: and as many as were ordained to eternal life, believed.

49 And the word of the Lord was published throughout all the region.

50 ¶ But the Jews stirred up the devout and honorable women, and the chief men of the city, and raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas, and expelled them out of their coasts.

51 But they shook off the dust of their feet against them, and came unto Iconium.

ed objections against them, finding some fault or other with everything he said, contradicting and blaspheming. Literally, contradicting, they contradicted. They did it with the utmost spite and rage imaginable; they persisted in their contradiction, and nothing would silence them. Commonly those who begin with [thus] contradicting, end with blaspheming.

VI. The apostles hereupon solemnly and openly declare themselves discharged from their obligation to the Jews, and at liberty to bring the word of salvation to the Gentiles, even by the implicit consent of the Jews themselves. In declaring this, it is said, v. 46. Paul and Barnabas waxed bold, more bold than they had been, while shy of looking favorably on the Gentiles, for fear of giving offence to the Jews, and laying a stumbling-block in their way. There is a time for the preachers of the Gospel to show as much of the boldness of the lion, as of the wisdom of the serpent, and the harmlessness of the dove. When the adversaries of Christ's cause begin to be daring, it is not for its advocates to be retired and cowardly. Paul and Barnabas own, that the Jews were entitled to the first offer, v. 46. Luke 24:47. Mark 7:27. but charge them with the refusal of it; herein ye judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life. In one sense, we must all judge ourselves unworthy of everlasting life, for there is nothing in us, or done by us, by which we can pretend to merit it, and we must be made sensible of this; but here the meaning is, 'Ye discover, or make it to appear, that ye are not meet for eternal life; ye throw away all your claims and hopes, and give up your pretensions to it; since ye will not take it from his hands, into whose hand the Father has given it, ye do, in effect, pass this judgment on yourselves, and out of your own mouth ye shall be judged; ye will not have it by Christ, by whom alone it is to be had, and so shall your doom be, ye shall not have it at all.' Upon this they ground their preaching of the Gospel to the uncircumcised; justify themselves in it by a divine warrant, v. 47. 'The Lord Jesus gave us directions to witness to Him in Jerusalem and Judea, first, and after that, to the utmost part of the earth, to preach the Gospel to every creature, to disciple all nations.'

This is according to what was foretold in the O. T. When the Messiah, in the prospect of the Jews' infidelity, was ready to say, I have labored in vain, He was told, to his satisfaction, that though Israel was not gathered yet He should be glorious; that his blood should not be shed in vain, nor his purchase made in vain, nor his doctrine preached in vain, nor his Spirit sent in vain; 'For I have set Thee, not only raised Thee up, but established Thee, to be a Light of the Gentiles, not only a shining Light for a time, but a standing Light, set thee for a Light, that Thou shouldst be for salvation unto the ends of the earth.' Those of any nation should be welcome to Him, some of every nation have heard of Him, Rom. 10:18. and all nations shall at length become his kingdom.

VII. The Gentiles cheerfully embraced that which the Jews scornfully rejected, v. 48, 49. so the apostle shows at large, Rom. 11:12, 15, 17, 19.

1. They took the comfort of it; were glad. Our being put into a condition favorable to salvation, ought to be the matter of our rejoicing; when the Gentiles did but hear that the offers of grace should be made them, they were glad. Many grieve under doubts, whether they have an interest in Christ or no, when they should be rejoicing that they may.

2. They gave God the praise of it; They glorified the Word of the Lord; i. e. Christ, so some, the essential Word; they conceived a mighty veneration for Him, and expressed the high thoughts they had of Him. Or rather, the Gospel; the more they knew of it, the more they admired it. Oh! what a light, what a power, what a treasure, does this Gospel bring along with it! How excellent are its truths, its precepts, its promises! How far transcending all other institutions! How plainly divine and heavenly is its original! Thus they glorified the Word of the Lord, and that is it which He has Himself magnified above all his name, Ps. 138:2. and will magnify and make honorable, Is. 42:21. Those speak best of the honor of the Word of the Lord, that speak experimentally, that have themselves been captivated by its power, and comforted by its sweetness.

3. Many of them became, not only professors of the Christian faith, but sincerely obedient to the faith: As many as were ordained to eternal life, believed. God by his Spirit wrought true faith in them for whom He had in his counsels from everlasting designed a happiness to everlasting. (1.) Those believed, to whom God gave grace to believe; whom, by a secret but mighty operation, He brought into subjection to the Gospel of Christ, and made willing in the day of his power. Those came to Christ, whom the Father drew, and to whom the Spirit made the gospel-call effectual. It is called the faith of the operation of God, Col. 2:12. and is said to be wrought by the same power that raised up Christ, Eph. 1:19, 20. (2.) God gave this grace to believe, to all those among them, who were ordained to eternal life; for whom He had predestinated, them He also called, Rom. 8:30. or, as many as were disposed to eternal life, as many as had a concern about their eternal state, and aimed to make sure of eternal life, believed in Christ, in whom God hath treasured up that life, 1 John 5:11. and who is the only Way to it; and it was the grace of God that wrought it in them. Those will be brought to believe in Christ, that by his grace are well disposed to eternal life, and make that their aim.

4. When they believed, they did what they could to spread the knowledge of Christ and his Gospel among their neighbors, v. 49. And the Word of the Lord was published throughout all the region; when it was received with so much satisfaction in the chief city, it soon spread itself into all parts of the country. Those that have got acquaintance with Christ themselves, will do what they can to bring others acquainted with Him.

VIII. Paul and Barnabas, having sowed the seeds of a Christian church there, quitted the place and went to do the like elsewhere. We read,

1. How the unbelieving Jews expelled the apostles out of that country. They first turned their back on them, and then lifted up the heel against them, v. 50. Satau and his agents are most exasperated against the preachers of the Gospel, when they see them go on successfully, and therefore then will be sure to raise persecution against them. Thus it has been the common lot of the best men in the world, to suffer ill for doing well. They stirred up the devout and honorable women against them; some ladies of quality in the city, that were well affected to the Jewish religion, and were proselytes of the gate, therefore called devout women. These, according to the genius of their sex, were zealous, and bigoted; and it was easy, by false stories and misrepresentations, to incense them against the Gospel of Christ, as if it had been destructive of all religion, of which really it is perfective. It is good to see honorable women devout, and well affected to religious worship; but it is sad, when, under color of devotion to God, they conceive an enmity to Christ, as those here did. By these devout and honorable women, they stirred up likewise the chief men of the city, the magistrates and rulers, who had power in their hands, and set them against the apostles, and who had so little consideration as to suffer themselves to be made the tools of this ill-natured party, who neither would go into the kingdom of heaven themselves, nor suffer those, that were entering, to go in. They carried it so far, that they expelled them out of their coasts; by downright violence, that they were driven out.* This was one method which the overruling providence of God took, to keep the first planters of the church from staying too long at a place; as, Mat. 10:23. This was likewise a method God took, to make those that were well disposed the more warmly affected toward the apostles; for it is natural to us to pity those that are persecuted, and to think the better of those that suffer, when we know they suffer unjustly, and to be the more ready to help them.

2. How the apostles abandoned and rejected the unbelieving Jews, v. 51. When they went out of the city, they used this ceremony in the sight of them that sat in the gate; or when they went out of the borders of their country, in the sight of them that were sent to see the country rid of them. Hereby they declared they would have no more to do with them, would take nothing that was theirs, for they sought not theirs,

* It was the custom to send an officer with such, to see them fairly beyond the frontier. See Thucyd. Ed.

CHAP. XIV.

1 Paul and Barnabas are persecuted from Iconium. 8 At Lystra Paul healeth a cripple, whereupon they are reputed as gods. 19 Paul is stoned. 21 They pass through divers churches, confirming the disciples in faith and patience. 26 Returning to Antioch, they report what God had done with them.

AND it came to pass in Iconium, that they went both together into the synagogue of the Jews, and so spake, that a great multitude, both of the Jews and also of the Greeks, believed.

2 But the unbelieving Jews stirred up the Gentiles, and made their minds evil-affected against the brethren.

3 Long time therefore abode they speaking boldly in the Lord, which gave testimony unto the word of his grace, and granted signs and wonders to be done by their hands.

4 But the multitude of the city was divided: and part held with the Jews, and part with the apostles.

5 And when there was an assault made, both of the Gentiles and also of the Jews, with their rulers, to use them despitefully, and to stone them, but them; they expressed their detestation of their infidelity, and that, though Jews by birth, yet, having rejected the Gospel of Christ, they were in their eyes no better than heathen and profane. Thus they set them at defiance, and expressed their contempt of them and their malice, which they looked on as impotent. Thus they left a testimony behind them, that they had had a fair offer made them of the grace of the Gospel, which shall be proved against them in the day of judgment. This dust will prove that the preachers of the Gospel had been among them, but were expelled by them. Thus Christ had ordered them to do, and for this reason, Mat. 10:14. Luke 9:5. When they left them, they came to Iconium, not so much for safety, as for work.

3. What frame they left the new converts in at Antioch, v. 52. The disciples, when they saw with what courage and cheerfulness Paul and Barnabas not only bore the indignities done them, but went on with their work, notwithstanding, were in like manner spirited. (1.) They were very cheerful; one would have expected, when Paul and Barnabas were expelled, and perhaps forbidden to return, on pain of death, the disciples should have been full of grief and full of fear, looking for no other than that it would be their own turn next; no,

PRACT. OBS. The Lord raises up instruments for his work, and brings them forth from various places and situations in life; and that zeal for his glory, with which He inspires their hearts, induces them to renounce the most pleasing connexions, and flattering prospects, that they may be employed in promoting his cause.—It does not behoove us, who have no miraculous powers, or infallible guidance of the Holy Spirit, to use such decided language, in reproving opposers and deceivers, as Paul did to 'Elymas the sorcerer:' yet we may plainly expose the hypocrisy, disingenuity, malice, and enmity, of those children and servants of 'the wicked one,' who show themselves to be 'enemies to all righteousness,' by deliberately 'perverting the right ways of the Lord,' and the evident truths of the Gospel, to promote their own credit and interest.—Those 'who put their hands to the plough, and look back, are not fit for the kingdom of God.' Yet some, who at first disappointed the expectations of senior ministers, have afterwards been recovered and made useful.—The reading of the Scriptures, in the public assemblies of God's people, is an ancient and excellent usage; and they, who are called to preach the Gospel, will find a peculiar advantage, in laying their crethey were filled with joy in Christ, had such a satisfactory assurance of Christ's carrying on and perfecting his own work in them, and among them, and that either He would screen them from trouble, or bear them up under it, that all their fears were swallowed up in their believing joys. (2.) They were very courageous; wonderfully animated with a holy resolution to cleave to Christ, whatever difficulties they met with; that seems especially to be meant by their being filled with the Holy Ghost; for that is used of Peter's boldness, ch. 4:8. and Stephen's, ch. 7:55. and Paul's ch. 13:9. The more we relish the comforts and encouragements we meet with in the power of godliness, and the fuller our hearts are of them, the better prepared we are to face the difficulties we meet with in the profession of godliness.

CHAP. XIV. We have in this ch., a further account of the progress of the Gospel, by the ministry of Paul and Barnabas among the Gentiles; it goes on yet with opposition, as before, among the unbelieving Jews.

V. 1—7. I. The preaching of the Gospel in Iconium, whither the apostles were forced to retire from Antioch. Observe, They made the first offer of the Gospel to the Jews, in their synagogues; the Jews at Antioch had used them barbarously, yet they did not therefore decline preaching the Gospel to the Jews at Iconium, who perhaps might be better disposed. Let not those of any denomination be condemned in the gross, nor some suffer for others' faults; but let us do good to those who have done evil to us. Though the blood-thirsty hate the upright, yet the just seek their soul, Prov. 29:10. the salvation of it. They went both together into the synagogue, to testify their unanimity and mutual affection; that people might say, See how they love one another, and might think the better of Christianity, and that they might strengthen one another's hands, and confirm one another's testimony, and out of the mouth of two witnesses every word might be established.

II. Their success; a great multitude (Jews and Greeks, i. e. Gentiles) believed. Observe,

1. In the close of the foregoing ch. the Gospel was preached first to the Jews, and some of them believed, then to the Gentiles, and some of them believed; but here, to both together on the same level, both are reconciled to God in one body, Eph. 2:16. together admitted into the church, without distinction.

2. There seems to have been something remarkable in the manner of the apostles' preaching here, which contributed to their success; They so spake, so plainly, so convincingly, with such an evidence and demonstration of the Spirit, and with such power; so warmly, so affectionately, and with such a manifest concern for the souls of men; they spake so from the heart, so earnestly and seriously, so boldly and courageously, that they who heard them could not but say, God was with them of a truth. Yet the success was not to be attributed to the manner of their preaching, but to the Spirit of God, who made use of these means.

III. The opposition and trouble created them, lest they should be puffed up.

1. Unbelieving Jews were the first spring of it, here, as elsewhere, v. 2. they stirred up the Gentiles. The influence the Gospel had on many of the Gentiles, and their embracing of it, as it provoked some of the Jews to a holy jealousy, and stirred them up to receive the Gospel too, Rom. 11:14. so it provoked others of them to a wicked jealousy, and exasperated them against the Gospel.

2. Disaffected Gentiles, irritated by the unbelieving Jews, were likely to be the instruments of their trouble; the Jews, by false suggestions, which they were continually buzzing in the ears of the Gentiles, made their minds evil affected against the brethren, whom of themselves they were inclined to think favorably of. Thus they soured and embittered their spirits against both the converters and the converted. It is no wonder, if those, who are ill affected toward good people, wish ill to them, speak ill of them, and contrive ill against them; it is all owing to ill-will. They molested and vexed the minds of the Gentiles; so some; they were continually teasing them with their impertinent solicitations. The tools of persecutors have a dog's life, set on continually.

IV. Their continuance in their work there, notwithstanding this opposition, and God's owning them in it, v. 3. Because the minds of the Gentiles were evil affected against them, one would think they should have withdrawn and hastened out of the way, or, if they had preached, should have preached cautiously; no, on the contrary, therefore they abode there a long time, speaking boldly in the Lord. The more they perceived the spite and rancor of the town against the new converts, the more they were animated to go on in their work, and the more needful they saw it to continue among them, to confirm them in the faith, and to comfort them. They spake boldly, not afraid of giving offence to the unbelieving Jews; boldly in the Lord, in his strength, and trusting in Him to bear them out; and Christ is working with the apostles, according to his promise, Lo, I am with you always. When they went on in his name and strength, He failed not to give testimony to the word of his grace, Mark 16:20.

V. The division this occasioned in the city, v. 4. among the rulers and persons of rank, and among the common people, some holding with the unbelieving Jews, and others, with the apostles. Barnabas is here reckoned an apostle, though not one of the twelve, nor called in the extraordinary manner Paul was, because set apart by special designation of the Holy Ghost to the service and instructions in this manner before the people. Yet, alas! many both hear and read the Word of God, who do not understand or believe it.—The Gospel should be 'preached to every creature;' yet with an especial address to those 'who fear God,' and inquire after the way in which his favor may be obtained.—Every transient view of the dealings of God with his church reminds us of his mercy and long-suffering, and of man's ingratitude and perverseness; but when He grants our inordinate desires, we may expect a scourge instead of a comfort.—As many as are 'ordained to eternal life' will believe; but we know not previously who these are; we should therefore declare, that 'Jesus is placed for a Light of the Gentiles, and for salvation to the ends of the earth;' and we should publish his truth as extensively as we can; and bear our testimony against those who oppose and reject it, however honorable or devout they may appear. Thus the Word of God will be glorified in the midst of persecution; and Jesus will fill his disciples with grace, peace, and 'joy in the Holy Ghost.' SCOTT.

6 They were ware of it, and fled unto Lystra, and Derbe, cities of Lycaonia, and unto the region that lieth round about :

7 And there they preached the gospel.

8 ¶ And there sat a certain man at Lystra, impotent in his feet, being a <sup>d</sup> cripple from his mother's womb, who never had walked :

9 The same heard Paul speak : who steadfastly beholding him, and perceiving that he had faith <sup>e</sup> to be healed,

10 Said with a loud voice, Stand upright on thy feet. And he leaped <sup>f</sup> and walked.

11 And when the people saw what Paul had done, they lifted up their voices, saying in the speech of Lycaonia, The <sup>g</sup> gods are come down to us, in the likeness of men.

12 And they called Barnabas, Jupiter ; and Paul, Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker.

13 Then the priest of Jupiter, which was before their city, brought oxen and garlands unto the gates, and <sup>h</sup> would have done sacrifice with the people.

of the Gentiles. 1. We may here see the meaning of Christ's prediction, that He came not to send peace upon earth, but rather division, Luke 12: 51—53. If all had given in unanimously into his measures, there had been universal concord ; but disagreeing here, the breach was wide as the sea. Yet the apostles must not be blamed for coming to Iconium, because before the city was united, but now is divided ; for it is better that part go to heaven than all to hell. 2. We may here take the measures of our expectations ; let us not think it strange, if the preaching of the Gospel occasion division, nor be offended at it ; it is better to be reproached and persecuted as dividers for swimming against the stream, than yield ourselves to be carried down the stream that leads to destruction. Let us hold with the apostles, and not fear them that hold with the Jews.

VI. The attempt made on the apostles by their enemies, v. 5. Observe, 1. The plotters ; the Gentiles, and the Jews, with their rulers ; Gentiles and Jews at enmity with one another, yet united against Christians, like Herod and Pilate, Sadducees and Pharisees, against Christ ; and like Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek, of old, against Israel. 2. The plot ; to use the apostles despitefully, expose them to disgrace, and then stone them to death ; and thus they hoped to sink their cause.

VII. They, v. 6, 7. got away on notice given them of the design, or the beginning of the attempt on them, which they were soon aware of, and made an honorable retreat, not an inglorious flight, to Lystra and Derbe, there to find work. In times of persecution, ministers may see cause to quit the spot, when yet they do not quit the work.

V. 8—18. In these vs. we have,

I. A miraculous cure wrought by Paul at Lystra on a cripple that had been lame from his birth, such an one as was miraculously cured by Peter and John, ch. 3:2. That introduced the Gospel among the Jews, this among the Gentiles ; both were designed to represent the impotency of all the children of men in spiritual things ; for it was when we were yet without strength, that Christ died for the ungodly, Rom. 5: 6. This poor cripple heard Paul preach, and, it is likely, was much affected ; believed the message was from heaven, and that the messengers, having their commission thence, had a divine power going along with them, and were therefore able to cure him of his lameness. This, Paul was aware of, by the spirit of discerning he had, and perhaps the show of his countenance did in part witness for him ; Paul perceived that he had faith to be healed ; desired it, hoped for it, had such a thing in his thoughts ; which it does not appear the lame man Peter healed, had, for he expected no more than an alms. Now God will not disappoint the desires of his own kindling, nor the hopes of his own raising. Paul spake to him with a loud voice, either because he was at some distance, or to show that the true miracles, by Christ, were far unlike the lying wonders by deceivers, that peeped, and muttered, and whispered, Is. 8: 19. He spake with a loud voice, that the people about might notice, and have their expectations raised of the effect.

Some copies read it, I say unto thee, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, Stand upright on thy feet. It is certain that is implied, and, very probably, was expressed, by Paul, and power went along with this word ; for presently, he leaped and walked. Herein the Scripture was fulfilled, that, when the wilderness of the Gentile world is made to blossom as the rose, then shall the lame man leap as a hart, Is. 35: 1, 6.

II. The impression this cure made on the people ; they were amazed at it, had never seen or heard the like, and fell into an ecstasy of wonder. Paul and Barnabas were strangers, exiles, refugees, in their country ; everything concurred to make them mean and despicable ; yet the working of this one miracle was enough to make them in the eyes of this people truly great and honorable, though the multitude of Christ's miracles could not screen Him from the utmost contempt among the Jews. We find here,

1. The people take them for gods, v. 11. in agreement with the pagan theology, and the fabulous account they had of the visits their gods made to this lower world. They carried this notion so far here, that they pretended to tell which of their gods they were, according to the ideas their poets had given them of the gods, v. 12. They called Barnabas, Jupiter : probably he was the senior, and the more portly, comely man, that had something of majesty in his countenance. And Paul they called Mercury, who was the messenger of the gods, that was sent on their errands, and also the god of oratory ; for Paul, though he had not the presence that Barnabas had, was the chief speaker, and had a greater command of language, and more agility and vivacity. Note, Jupiter used to take Mercury along with him, they said, and if he make a visit to their city, they will suppose he does so now.

2. The priest thereupon prepares to do sacrifice to them, v. 13. The temple of Jupiter was, it seems, before the gate of their city, as its protector and guardian ; and the priest of that idol and temple, hearing the people cry out thus, took the hint presently, and thought it was time for him to bestir himself to do his duty : many a costly sacrifice he had offered to the image of Jupiter, but if Jupiter be among them himself, it concerns him to do him the utmost honors imaginable ; and the people are ready to join with him in it. See how easily vain minds are carried away with a popular outcry !

V. 8—10. Probably Paul knew, by a divine suggestion, that the man expected a cure from the power of the Lord Jesus, and that it was a proper occasion for him to perform a miracle. SCOTT.

V. 11—13. This was very bold and decided language to zealous idolaters, with their priests at the head of them, in such a critical juncture ; and may be very properly contrasted with the temporizing conduct of heathen philosophers, who, being convinced of the folly and falsehood of the vulgar superstitions, not only conformed to them, but instructed their disciples to do the same, as a part of their duty to the republic.— Let the intelligent reader compare this conduct and declaration of the apostles towards the worshippers of Jupiter, with some modern admired effusions of expanded candor, in which the worship of God, whether men call him JENOVAN, Jove, Lord, or by any other name, is supposed to be equally acceptable to Him. Is it then of no consequence whether JENOVAN, or Jupiter, or Baal, be God ? Surely either the prophets and apostles were bigots, or these men have renounced Christianity, (1 K. 18:11. P. O. 17:29.)—(15) Like passions.] 'The pagans never denied, that their gods were beings of like passions with themselves ; but they attributed to them a total exemption from mortality and disease. . . . Indeed this was not only the principal, but, I may almost say, the sole distinction they made between gods and men. . . . We are your fellow-mortals, as liable as you to disease and death.' Campbell. This appears the direct import of the apostle's words ; yet liability to other infirmities and passions of human nature, needs not to be excluded ; but certainly they pervert the expression, who explain it of the prevalence of sinful passions. (Jam. 5:16—18.) ID.

(11.) Speech of Lycaonia.] Wetst. thinks this mentioned to show, that Paul did not understand what was said, or he would not have let the preparation go so far.' BL. 'The Greek language was indeed used in the regions of Asia ; but the ancient vernacular tongue was retained, and especially spoken by the common people. What precise language the Lycaonian was, cannot be determined. Grot. (on the authority of the ancients) supposes it the same as the Cappadocian ; [note, Job : end ;] Jablonski, a dialect of the Greek, but much assimilated to the Assyrian, and indeed derived from thence. Guhling contends, that the Lycaonian was of [Pelagic] Greek origin, but by migration and coalition with the languages of other nations, by distance of time, carelessness of speakers, and various other causes, had been changed from its original root, and become in a manner lost.' KUIN.—'The gods have come down, &c.] 'It appears, from numberless passages in the heathen writers, that they suppose this often to have happened ; . . . and Elsner has shown, that this notion particularly prevailed with respect to Jupiter and Mercury. . . . Mr. Harrington well observes, that this persuasion might gain the more easily on the minds of the Lycaonians, on account of the well-known fable of Jupiter and Mercury, who were said (see Ovid) to have descended from heaven in human shape, (to see and reform the degeneracy of man,) and to have been entertained by Lycaon, from whom the Lycaonians received their names.' Doddr.—'The angels visiting Abraham, Jacob, &c. [comp. too, Gen. 11:5, 7. 18:21.] might have been the foundation on which most of those heathen fictions were built.' Dr. A. C.

(12.) 'It was a very common story, (see Ovid,) and, no doubt, familiar to the Lystrians, that Mercury formerly traversed the neighboring country of Phrygia, and was received by Philemon and Baucis.—Mercury is called, in Jamblichus, by precisely the phrase Luke uses, namely, logōn hēgemōn, a leader in discourse.' Jupiter, Mercury.] Zeus, Hermes. BLOOMF.

(13.) Oxen.] Lit. bulls. Garlands, sacrifice.] The carefully selected animals to be sacrificed (with the Romans and Greeks) 'were adorned with fillets, ribands, and crowns ; and their horns gilt.' The cut is a classic relic, showing a sacrifice : for the manner of it, see Potter and Adam. Ep. 'When the gods [in India] are taken out in procession, their necks are adorned with garlands ; the priests also wear them at the same time. On all festive occasions, the men and women [as did the ancient Egyptians] have on their sweet-scented garlands.

Garlands are also offered in token of respect.' Rob. See Bush's Illus.—'There is a meaning here, which ordinary readers will not readily apprehend. Many cities were put under the protection of a particular 14 Which when the apostles, Barnabas and Paul, heard of, they rent their clothes, and ran in among the people, crying out,

15 And saying, Sirs, why do ye these things? We also are men of like passions with you, and preach unto you, that ye should turn from these vanities unto the living God, which made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein :

16 Who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways.

17 Nevertheless, he left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness.

18 And with these sayings, scarce restrained they the people, that they had not done sacrifice unto them.

19 ¶ And there came thither certain Jews from Antioch and Iconium, who persuaded the people, and having stoned Paul, drew him out of the city, supposing he had been dead.

When Christ, the Son of God, came down, and appeared in the likeness of men, and did many, very many miracles, yet they were so far from doing sacrifice to Him, that they made Him a sacrifice to their pride and malice ; He was in the world, and the world knew Him not ; He came to his own, and his own received Him not ; but Paul and Barnabas, on their working of one miracle, are deified presently. The same power of the god of this world, which prejudices the carnal mind against truth, makes errors and mistakes to find easy admission ; and both ways his turn is served. They brought oxen, to be sacrificed to them, and garlands, with which to crown the sacrifices. [Also, the gods themselves, the priests, and the gates of the temple.] These garlands were made up of flowers and ribbons ; and they gilded the horns of the oxen they sacrificed.

III. Paul and Barnabas protest [with the utmost horror] against this undue respect paid them, and with much ado prevent it. Many of the heathen emperors called themselves gods, and took a pride in having divine honors paid them ; but Christ's ministers, though real benefactors to mankind, while they only pretended to be so, refused those honors when rendered. Whose successor therefore he is, who sits in the temple of God, and shows that he is god, 2 Thess. 2, 4. and who is adored as our lord god the pope, it is easy to say. Observe,

1. The holy indignation Paul and Barnabas conceived at this ; they rent their clothes. We do not find that they rent their clothes when the people vilified them, and spake of stoning them ; they could bear that without disturbance ; but when they deified them, and spake of worshipping them, they could not bear it, but rent their clothes, as being more concerned for God's honor than their own.

deity : and the image of that deity placed at the entrance, to signify that he was the guardian and protector. To this, Luke, everywhere as accurate as he is circumstantial, refers. Dr. A. CLARKE.

(15.) Of like passions.] 'Obnoxious to the same common infirmities. This is also the meaning, James 5:17. and nothing could be more absurd, or injurious to the character of these holy men, than to imagine that it refers, in either of the places, to anything of ungoverned passion.' DODDR.

(17.) 'Raphelius shows, that the pagans spoke of rain as given by [78]

2. The pains they took to prevent it. They did not connive at it, much less suggest to one another, that it might contribute both to the safety of their persons and the success of their ministry, if they suffered the people to continue in this mistake, and so they might make a good hand of an ill thing. No, God's truth [never] needs the service of man's lie ; Christ had put honor enough on them in making them apostles, they needed not assume either the honor of princes, or the honor of gods ; they appeared with much more magnificent titles when called the ambassadors of Christ, and the stewards of the mysteries of God, than when called Jupiter and Mercury.

When they preached to the Jews, who hated idolatry, the apostles had nothing to do but to preach the grace of God in Christ, and needed not, as the prophets in dealing with their fathers, to preach against idolatry ; but when they had to do with the Gentiles, they must, as here, rectify their mistakes in natural religion, and bring them off from the gross corruption of that.

'We call you to worship the God that made you and all the world ; worship the true God, and cheat not yourselves with pretenders ; worship the sovereign Lord of all, and disparage not yourselves in bowing down to his creatures and subjects,' v. 16. In times past, for many ages, unto this day, He suffered all nations to walk in their own ways ; they might think, 'Have we not served these gods hitherto, and our fathers before us, time out of mind ; and why not still ?'—No, it was a trial of God's patience, and a miracle of mercy you were not cut off for it. But all the nations that had not the benefit of divine revelation, i. e. all but the Jews, He suffered to walk in their own ways, for they had nothing to check them, or control them, but their own consciences, their own thoughts, Rom. 2: 15. no scriptures, no prophets ; and then they were the more excusable if they mistook their way : but now that God has sent a revelation into the world, which is to be published to all nations, the case is altered. We may understand it as a judgment on all nations, that God suffered them to walk in their own ways, gave them up to their own hearts' lusts ; but now the time is come when the veil of the covering spread over all nations should be taken off, Is. 25: 7. and you will no longer be excused.

Their having no scriptures did in part excuse them, (therefore God did not destroy them for their idolatry, as He did the Jewish nation,) but not wholly ; they were highly criminal, and deeply guilty, before God ; for there were other witnesses for God, sufficient to inform them that He, and He only, is to be worshipped.

1. The bounties of common providence witness to us, that there is a God, for they are all dispensed wisely and with design. All the powers of nature witness to us a sovereign power in the God of nature, from whom they are derived, and on whom they depend.

2. The benefits we have by these bounties, witness to us, that we ought to make our acknowledgments not to the creatures who are made serviceable to us, but to the Creator who makes them so. He left not Himself without witness, in that He did good. God seems to reckon the instances of his goodness to be more pregnant, cogent proofs of his title to our homage and adoration, than the evidences of his greatness ; for his goodness is his glory. Because the most sensible instance of the goodness of Providence to each of us in particular, is that of the daily provision made by it of meat and drink for us, the apostle chooses to insist on that. Of all the common operations of Providence, the heathen chose to form their notion of the supreme God by that which speaks terror, but the apostle here, to engage us to worship God, sets before us his beneficence, that we may have good thoughts of Him in everything wherein we have to do with Him, Eccl. 2: 24. Even those nations that had lost the knowledge of Him, and worshipped other gods, yet He filled their houses, filled their mouths, Job 22: 18. Ps. 17: 14. The Gentiles that lived without God in the world, yet lived upon God ; which Christ urges as a reason why we should do good to those that hate us, Mat. 5: 44, 45. Those heathen had their hearts filled with food, that was their felicity and satisfaction, they desired no more ; but these things will not fill the soul, Ez. 7: 19. nor will those that know how to value their own souls, be satisfied with them ; but the apostles put themselves in as sharers in the divine beneficence ; we must all own that God fills our hearts with food and gladness ; not only food, that we may live, but gladness, that we may live cheerfully ; to Him we owe it, that we do not all our days eat in sorrow.

Lastly, The success of this prohibition which the apostles gave to the people, v. 18. By these sayings, with much ado, they restrained the people from doing sacrifice to them ; so strongly were idolaters set upon their idolatry ! It was not enough for the apostles to refuse to be deified, but they resent it, they show them the evil of it, and all little enough, for they scarce restrained them from it ; and some of them were ready to blame the priest, that he did not go on with his business, notwithstanding. We may see here, what gave rise to the pagan idolatry ; it was, terminating those regards in the instruments of our comfort, which should have passed through them to the Author, instead of glorifying God for giving them such power ; which should make us very cautious, that we do not either give that honor to another, or take it to ourselves, which is due to God only.

V. 19—23. I. We have here a further account of the services and sufferings of Paul and Barnabas. 1. How Paul was stoned and left for dead, but miraculously came to himself again, v. 19, 20. They fell upon Paul, rather than Barnabas, because Paul, being the chief speaker, galled and vexed them more. See how restless the rage of the Jews was against the Gospel of Christ ; they could not bear that it should have footing anywhere. They irritated the people to that degree, that the mob rose and stoned Paul, in a popular tumult ; they knocked him down, and then drew him out of the city, as one not fit to live in it, or drew him out on a sledge, or in a cart, to bury him, supposing he had been dead. See how fickle the minds of carnal, worldly people are, that do not know and consider things ! Those that, but the other day, would have treated the apostles as more than men, now treat them as worse than brutes. Today, Hosanna, to-morrow, Crucify ; to-day sacrificed to, to-morrow sacrificed. We have an instance of a change the other way, ch. 28. This man is a murderer, v. 4 ; no doubt, he is a god, v. 6. Popular breath turns like the wind. If Paul would have been Mercury, he might have been enthroned, nay, enshrined ; but if he will be a faithful minister of Christ, he shall be stoned, and thrown out of the city. Thus they who easily sub-

God, and, which is very remarkable, not as coming from the gods ; and this he thinks a remnant of patriarchal piety, in a form of speech, older than the first idolatry. DODDR.

V. 19. Supposing he was dead.] 'So most probably he was.' Dr. A. C. ; who supposes the miracle extended, not only to the healing of the apostle's wounds, but to the restoration of life. Doddr. suggests, that there may have been an extraordinary appearance of the body, which led them to suppose he was dead, while he was not actually so. Ep.

20 Howbeit, as the disciples stood round about him, he rose up, and came into the city: and the next day he departed with Barnabas to Derbe.

21 ¶ And when they had preached the gospel to that city, and had taught many, they returned again to Lystra, and to Iconium, and Antioch, 22 Confirming the souls of the disciples, and exhorting them to continue in the faith, and that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God.

23 And when they had ordained them elders in every church, and had prayed with fasting, they commended them to the Lord, on whom they believed.

mit to strong delusions, hate to receive the truth in the love of it.

2. How he was delivered by the power of God, v. 20. Some, it seems, at Lystra, found the mean between deifying the apostles and rejecting them; and even these new converts had courage to own Paul, when thus run down, though they had reason enough to fear, lest they who stoned him would stone them for owning him. They stood round about him, as a guard; stood to see whether he were alive or dead; and all of a sudden he rose up; though not dead, yet he was ill crushed and bruised, no doubt, and fainted away; he was in a deliquium, so that it was not without a miracle that he came so soon to himself, and was so well as to be able to go into the city. God's faithful servants, though cast down are not destroyed, 2 Cor. 4:9.

II. How they went on with their work, notwithstanding. However, their being persecuted here, is a known indication to them to seek for opportunities of usefulness elsewhere; therefore for the present they quit Lystra.

And, 1. They went the next day to Derbe, a city not far off; there they preached, and taught many, v. 21. It should seem Timothy was of that city; and one of the disciples that now attended Paul, had met him at Antioch, and accompanied him in all this circuit; for, with reference to this story, Paul tells him how fully he had known the afflictions he endured at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra, 2 Tim. 3:10, 11. Nothing is recorded that happened at Derbe.

2. They returned, and went over their work again, watering what they had sown; and having stayed as long as they thought fit at Derbe, they came back to Lystra, to Iconium, and Antioch, the cities where they had preached, v. 21. Now, as we have had a very instructive account of the methods they took in laying the foundation, and beginning the good work, so here we have the like of their building on that foundation, and carrying on that good work. Let us see what they did.

(1.) They confirmed the souls of the disciples; inculcated what was proper to confirm them, v. 22. Young converts are apt to waver, a little thing shocks them, old acquaintance beg they will not leave them; and those they look upon to be wiser than they, set before them the absurdity, indecency, and danger, of a change; they are allured, by the prospect of preferment, to stick to the traditions of their fathers; they are frightened with the danger of swimming against the stream. But the apostles come and tell them that this is the true grace of God wherein they stand, and this fortifies their pious resolutions in the strength of Christ, to adhere to Christ, whatever it cost them: it is the grace of God, and nothing less, that can effectually confirm the souls of the disciples, and prevent their apostasy.

(2.) They exhorted them to continue in the faith; or, as it may be read, they encouraged them. They told them it was both their duty and interest to persevere; to abide in the belief of Christ's being the Son of God, and the Savior of the world. Note, They that are continually surrounded with temptations to apostasy, have need to be continually attended with pressing exhortations to perseverance.

(3.) What they insisted most on, was, that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God. Not only they must, but we; all that will go to heaven, must expect tribulation and persecution in their way thither. But is this the way to confirm the souls of the disciples, and to engage them to continue in the faith? One would think it should rather shock them, and make them wear. No, as the matter is fairly stated and taken entire, it would help to confirm them, and fix them for Christ. It is true, they will meet with tribulation, with much tribulation. It is so appointed, the matter is fixed, and cannot be altered: all that will be Christ's disciples must take up the cross; when we gave up our names to Jesus Christ, it was what we agreed to; when we sat down and counted the cost, if we reckoned right, it was what we counted upon. It is the lot of the leaders in Christ's army as well as of the soldiers; not only you, but we; therefore as your own sufferings must not be a stumbling-block to you, so neither must ours; see 1 Thess. 3:3. As Christ did not put the apostles on any harder service than what He underwent before them, so neither did the apostles put the ordinary Christians.

(4.) They ordained them elders, or presbyters, in every church. Now, at this second visit, they settled them in some order, formed them into religious societies, under the conduct of a settled ministry, and settled that distinction, between them that are taught in the Word, and them that teach. Every church had its governors or presidents, whose office it was to pray with the members of the church, and to preach to them in their solemn assemblies, to administer all gospel-ordinances to them, and to take the oversight of them, to instruct the ignorant, warn the unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, and to convince gain-sayers. Those governors were then elders, that had in their qualification the wisdom and gravity of seniors, and in their commission the authority and command of seniors: not to make new laws, but to see to the observance and execution of the laws Christ has made; and so far they are to be obeyed and submitted to. These elders were ordained. The qualifications of such as were proposed, or proposed themselves, were judged of by the apostles, as most fit to judge; and they themselves, having devoted themselves, were solemnly set apart to the work of the ministry, and bound to it. These elders were ordained to them, to the disciples, to their service, for their good. Those that are in the faith have need to be built up in it, and have need of the elders' help therein; the pastors and teachers, who are to edify the body of Christ.

(5.) By prayer, joined with fasting, they commended them to the Lord, to the Lord Jesus, on whom they believed. When persons

V. 20. He rose up, &c.] This must certainly be the effect of a miraculous cure, approaching as near as one can conceive, to a resurrection from the dead. This is the more illustrated by his going the next day to Derbe; whereas, in a course of nature, he would then have felt his bruises much more than at first, and probably, after the best care that could have been taken of him, would hardly have been able to turn himself in his bed. Doddr.—Come into the city.] So that his persecutors might see the mighty power of God in his restoration, and the faith of the young converts be confirmed in the truth and goodness of God. Dr. A. C.—Doddr. suggests, here, in addition to what Henry says of Timothy, that, though it was not till Paul's next journey to Derbe, that he formed his intimate acquaintance with Timothy, ch. 16:1, 2. yet since he speaks of Timothy as having been a witness of his sufferings here, and in the neighborhood, 2 Tim. 3:10, 11. whereas we read nothing of any remarkable sufferings in that second progress, Acts 16:4. it seems, he begun his acquaintance now with that hopeful youth, whose pious mother, Eunice, and grandmother, Lois, 2 Tim. 1:5. seem now to have been entered into the Christian church, though he was not admitted till afterwards. Ed.

V. 21—23. These elders were their stated pastors. In respect of the manner in which they were selected, it cannot be supposed, that the apostles, in their present circumstances, would appoint any to the sacred ministry, who were not acceptable to the people; or that they would ordain any, without their own full satisfaction that they were proper persons, whatever the people might be inclined to. There seems to have been the most perfect harmony in the management of this important concern; yet it can scarcely be doubted, that both the apostles, and those to whom, in some sense, they afterwards delegated this part of their authority, interfered, with their judgment and influence, in the nomination of proper persons to the ministerial office; as well as set them apart by imposition of hands and prayer. In all such questions, the middle, between the extreme points contended for by the zealots of opposite parties, seems to be the nearest to the true state of the case.—As the churches increased, deacons were doubtless chosen, under the superintendency of the elders; but it does not appear that the apostles appointed any at this time.—It is probable the apostles, and those employed by them, selected the presbyters, or pastors, from such as were more signally made partakers of miraculous gifts, by the Holy Spirit; yet, as these endowments might be possessed by those who had not true faith and grace; and, as eminent and intelligent believers do not seem always to have been endowed with them; it appears unscriptural to suppose that all such were appointed to the pastoral office, and none else.—No impartial person can, as it appears to me, read this passage, without being convinced, that stated resident pastors of each church, and not preachers of the Gospel at large, are here intended; but whether these stated resident pastors were, as some argue, 'bishops,' according to the modern acceptance of the word, is a subject which will hereafter come under our consideration. 20:17. Phil. 1:1. 1 Tim. 3:1.—(23) When they had ordained.] 2 Cor. 8:19. They (Paul and Barnabas) ordained them (the Christians) elders, &c.—If an election by holding up hands be intended, Paul and Barnabas were the sole electors. It may then be fairly asked, whether this is the only scriptural authority, for the people choosing their own spiritual pastors? or whether any other can be adduced? If no other, then surely, whatever may be said on the ground of expediency, the divine authority of this method stands on a very slender foundation! Scott.

(23.) Ordained them elders.] Elder seems to be here the name of an office. These were all young or new converts, and yet among them the apostles constituted elders.—The word ordain, we use in an ecclesiastical sense, to signify the appointment of a person to an office in the church, by the imposition of the hands of those who are rulers in that church. But cheirotonia signifies the holding up, or stretching out the hand, as approving of the choice of any person to a particular work; whereas cheirothesia signifies the imposition of hands. I believe the simple truth to be, that in ancient times the people chose by the cheirotonia (lifting up of hands) their spiritual pastor; and the rulers of the church, whether apostles or others, appointed that person to his office by the cheirothesia, or imposition of hands; and perhaps each of these was thought to be equally necessary; the church agreeing in the election of the person; and the rulers of the church appointing, by the imposition of hands, the person thus elected. Dr. A. C. Mr. Harrington (in Doddr.) renders the words, ordained them elders by the votes of the people, urging the authority of Suidas, who explains cheirotonia by "the election of magistrates, or ratification of laws by many, signified by holding up, or stretching out the hand." Comp. 2 Cor. 8:19. Raphaelus has confirmed the same interpretation: and the old English Bible tr. when they had ordained them elders by election. Doddr. himself renders, constituted presbyters for them in every church. He says, 'I have not rendered it ordained, because custom has, among us especially, affixed to that word, in such a connexion, the idea of laying on hands in are brought to believe, and that sincerely, there is still that lacking in their faith, which needs to be perfected. The ministers that take most care of them, must after all commend them to the Lord by prayer; as Christ in his prayer, John 17. commended his disciples to his Father. Thine they were, and Thou gavest them Me. Father, keep them. In doing this, it is a great encouragement to us, that we can say, 'It is He in whom they believed, we commit them to Him, and know He is able to keep what they and we have committed to Him against that day,' 2 Tim. 1:12. It is good to join fasting with prayer, in token of our humiliation for sin, and in order to add vigor to our prayers. When parting with our friends, the best farewell is to commend them to the Lord, and to leave them with Him.

3. They went on preaching the Gospel in other places where they had been, but, as it should seem, had not made so many converts as now to form churches; therefore thither they came to pursue and carry on conversion

PRACT. OBS. Perseverance in doing good, amidst dangers, hardships, ingratitude, and persecution, is a blessed evidence of grace, an expression of 'the mind which was in Christ,' and a distinguishing mark of his faithful ministers.—In all cities, towns, and villages, where the Gospel is effectually preached, a division takes place among the people; some decidedly favoring, and others earnestly opposing the persons employed; and generally some unconverted persons, for a time, take part with the preachers and professors of the truth, by means of whom the Lord restrains the fury of his enemies, till his own purposes are affected.—The servants of God might often obtain undue honor to themselves, if they would connive at men's errors and vices; but they dread and detest all such sacrilegious homage, more than any reproaches or injuries prayer, to invest a person with, or mark him for the ministerial office: and this, which I doubt not was here done, seems to be intimated in the following clause. It seemed to me, that the word constitute would properly express the apostles presiding in that previous choice, which probably the people signified by cheirotomia, the stretching out their hand: and this interpretation appears most naturally to suit the circumstances of things, as well as the import of the original words made use of.—Bl. says, 'There is no point on which learned men, for the last century, have been more agreed than on this, that cheirotonein here, simply denotes, to appoint, constitute, or ordain. And so the ancient version.'

V. 24—28. The 13th and 14th chs. contain the first history of a mission among the Gentiles. The missionaries were prepared and selected by the Holy Spirit; they were recommended to the grace of God, and helped forward by their brethren; leaving country, friends, and comforts, to face dangers and endure hardships, from love to Christ, and to the souls of their unknown, perishing fellow-sinners; they suffered much tribulation, but were supported, comforted, and preserved; and they prospered greatly in their 'work and labor of love,' and returning to gladden the hearts of their brethren, and to rejoice with them, they ascribed all the glory to God, who had granted the prayers offered in their behalf, and had wrought by them and with them.

work. From Antioch they passed through Pisidia, the province in which that Antioch stood, thence they came into the province of Pamphylia, the head city of which was Perga, where they had been before, ch. 13: 13. and came thither again to preach the Word, v. 25. making a second offer. What success they had, we are not told, but that, from thence, they went down to Attalia, a city of Pamphylia, on the sea-coast. They staid not long at a place, but wherever they came endeavored to lay a foundation, which might afterward be built upon, and to sow the seeds which would, in time, produce a great increase.

III. How they at length came back to Antioch in Syria, whence they were sent forth.

1. Why they came thither; because from thence they had been recommended to the grace of God, and such a value did they put on a solemn recommendation to the grace of God, though they had themselves a great interest in heaven, that they never thought they could show respect enough to those who had so recommended them.

2. What account they gave them of their negotiation, v. 27. They gathered the church together. Probably the Christians at Antioch were more than ordinarily met, or could meet, in one place, but on this occasion they called together the leading men of them; or, some met at one time, or in one place, and others at another. But when they had them together, they gave them an account of two things: (1.) Of the tokens they had had of the divine presence with them in their labors. They rehearsed all that God had done with them. They did not tell what they had done, (that would have savored of vain-glory,) but of what God had done with them and by them. God's grace can do anything without ministers' preaching: but ministers' preaching, even Paul's, can do nothing without God's grace; and the operations of that grace must be acknowledged in the efficacy of the Word. (2.) Of the fruit of their labors among the heathen. They told how God had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles; had not only ordered them to be invited to the gospel-feast, but had inclined the hearts of many of them to accept the invitation.

3. How they disposed of themselves for the present, v. 28. longer than perhaps at first they intended; not because they feared their enemies, but because they loved their friends, and were loath to part from them.

CHAP. XV. Hitherto we have, with great pleasure, attended the apostles in their glorious travels to propagate the Gospel in foreign parts; have seen the bounds of the church enlarged, by the accession both of Jews and Gentiles to it; and thanks he to that God who always caused them to triumph! We left them, in the close of the foregoing ch., reposing themselves at Antioch, and edifying the church there, with the rehearsal of their experiences, and it is pity they should ever be otherwise employed; but in this ch. we find other work, not so pleasant, cut out for them. The Christians and ministers are engaged in controversy, and they that should have been now busied in enlarging the dominions of the church, have as much as they can do to compose the divisions of it; when they should have been making war on the devil's kingdom, they have much ado to keep the peace in Christ's kingdom. Yet that occurrence, and the record of it, are of great use to the church, both for warning to us to expect such unhappy discords among Christians, and direction to us what method to take to accommodate them.

V. 1—5. I. A new doctrine started in the church at Antioch, which occasioned this division, v. 1.

1. The persons that urged it; certain which came down from Judea; some think, such as had been of the Pharisees, v. 5. or perhaps of those priests obedient to the faith, ch. 6, 7. They came from Judea, pretending, perhaps, to be sent by the apostles at Jerusalem, or to be countenanced by them. Having a design to spread their notions, they came to Antioch, the head-quarters of those that preached to the Gentiles, and the rendezvous of the Gentile converts; and if they could but make an interest there, this leaven would soon be diffused to all the churches of the Gentiles. They insinuated themselves into an acquaintance with the brethren, pretending to be very glad they had embraced the Christian faith, and congratulated them on their conversion; but tell them, that yet one thing they lack, they must be circumcised. Those that are ever so well taught, have need to stand on their guard, that they be not untaught again, or ill taught.

2. The position they laid down was this, that except the Gentiles, who turned Christians, were circumcised after the manner of Moses, and thereby obliged themselves to all the observances of the ceremonial law, they could not be saved. It did not suffice them, that they were herein indulged themselves, they must have the Gentile converts brought under the same. Note, There is a strange proneness in us to make our own opinion whatever.—We should show the greatest affection to the persons of men, and bear with many of their mistakes and prejudices, in a candid spirit; but we must not spare decidedly to protest against their delusions and superstitions, which are as ruinous to the soul as the grossest immoralities.—The Lord sav good for a long time to 'suffer all nations to walk in their own ways;' and He still is pleased to leave innumerable multitudes to follow lying vanities; this should lead us to thankfulness for our peculiar advantages, and to adore the depth of his unsearchable wisdom and justice; but it should not induce us to palliate the idolatries or impieties of our apostate race; or to neglect doing all that we can to communicate 'the Light of life' unto them.

(28.) 'How long the apostles tarried here we cannot tell; but we hear no more of them till the council of Jerusalem, mentioned in the following ch.; which is generally supposed to have been held in A. D. 51: and if the transactions of this ch. took place in A. D. 46, as chronologers think, then there are 5 whole years of Paul's ministry, and that of other apostles, which Luke passes by in perfect silence. It is very likely Paul and Barnabas were all this time extending the work of God through the different provinces contiguous to Antioch, for Paul himself tells us he preached the Gospel as far as Illyria, Rom. 15:19. on the side of the Adriatic gulf. Many of the tribulations and perils through which he passed, are not mentioned by Luke, particularly those of which he himself speaks, 2 Cor. 11:23—27. Probably most of these happened in the five years which elapsed between the apostle's return to Antioch, and the council of Jerusalem.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

NOTES. CHAP. XV. V. 1—6. The events recorded in this ch. took place probably about seventeen years after Paul's conversion; but some expositors date them three years earlier. Gal. 2:1—5. The apostle informs us, that 'he went up, by revelation;' the Lord having made it known to him, or to some of the prophets residing there, that He would have him do so. As there was not an entire agreement on the subject, it was judged expedient for the apostles, elders, and others of the church [at Jerusalem] to meet together, and to give the important sub-

2 When therefore Paul and Barnabas had no small dissension and disputation with them, they determined that Paul and Barnabas, and certain other of them, should go up to Jerusalem, unto the apostles and elders, about this question.

3 And being brought on their way by the church, they passed through Phenice and Samaria, declaring the conversion of the Gentiles: and they caused great joy unto all the brethren.

4 And when they were come to Jerusalem, they were received of the church, and of the apostles and elders; and they declared all things that God had done with them.

5 ¶ But there rose up certain of the sect of the Pharisees which believed, saying, That it was needful to circumcise them, and to command them to keep the law of Moses.

6 And the apostles and elders came together, for to consider of this matter.

7 ¶ And when there had been much disputing, Peter rose up and said unto them, Men and brethren, ye know how that a good while ago God made choice among us, that the Gentiles by my mouth should hear the word of the gospel, and believe.

Helen, queen of Adiabene, embraced the Jews' religion, Ananias declared he might do it without circumcision; but Eleazar maintained, that it was a great impiety to remain uncircumcised. And when two eminent Gentiles fled to Josephus, (as he relates in the history of his own life,) 'the zealots among the Jews were urgent for their circumcision; but Josephus dissuaded them from insisting on it.' Such has been the difference in all ages between bigotry and moderation.

It is observable what a mighty stress they laid upon it; they do not only say, 'You ought to be circumcised,' but, 'Except you be circumcised, you cannot be saved.' It is common for proud imposers to enforce their own inventions, under pain of damnation; and to tell people, unless they believe just as they would have them believe, and do just as they would have them do, they cannot be saved, it is impossible they should; not only their case is hazardous, but desperate. None are in Christ, but they that are within their pale. We ought to see ourselves well warranted by the Word of God, before we say, 'Except you do so and so, you cannot be saved.'

II. The opposition Paul and Barnabas gave to this schismatical notion, v. 2. 1. As faithful servants of Christ, they would not see his truths betrayed; they knew Christ came to free us from the yoke of the ceremonial law, and unite both Jews and Gentiles in Himself; and therefore cannot bear to hear of circumcising the Gentile converts, when their instructions were only to baptize them. 2. As spiritual fathers to the Gentile converts, they would not see their liberties encroached upon; they had told them, that if they believed in Jesus Christ, they should be saved; and now to be told, that that was not enough to save them, except they were circumcised, and kept the law of Moses,—this was such a discouragement, and would be such a stumbling-block, as might almost tempt them to turn back into Egypt again; therefore they set themselves against it.

III. The expedient pitched upon to prevent the mischief of this dangerous notion, silence those that vented it, and quiet the minds of the people with reference to it. They determined that Paul and Barnabas, and some others of their number, should go to Jerusalem, to the apostles and elders, concerning it. 1. Because those who taught this doctrine came from Jerusalem, and pretended to have directions from the apostles there. 2. Because those who were taught this doctrine, would be the better confirmed in their opposition to it, and in the less danger of being shocked and disturbed by it, if they were sure that the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, (which was that Christian church that of all other retained the most affection to the law of Moses,) were against it. 3. Because the apostles at Jerusalem were fittest to be consulted in a point yet not fully settled; and being most eminent for an infallible Spirit, peculiar to them as apostles, their decision would be likely to end the controversy. It was owing to the subtlety and malice of the great enemy of the church's peace, (as it appears by Paul's frequent complaints of these judaizing teachers, these false apostles, these deceitful workers, these enemies of the cross of Christ,) that it had not that effect.

IV. Their journey, v. 3. Where we find, 1. That they were honored at parting; brought on their way by the church; which was then much used as a token of respect to useful men, and is directed to be done after a godly sort, 3 John 6. 2. That they did good as they went along; they were men that would not lose time, and therefore visited the churches by the way; they passed through Phenice and Samaria, and as they went declared the conversion of the Gentiles; and what wonderful success the Gospel had had among them; which caused great joy to all the brethren. The progress of the Gospel is and ought to be a matter of great joy.

V. Their hearty welcome at Jerusalem, v. 4. 1. They were received of the church, and of the apostles and elders; with all possible expressions of love and friendship. 2. They declared all that God had done with them; the success of their ministry among the Gentiles; as they went they had planted, as they came back they had watered; but in both they were ready to own it was God gave the increase.

VI. The opposition they met with from the same party at Jerusalem, v. 5. When Barnabas and Paul gave an account of the multitude of souls gathered in to Christ there, and all about them congratulated them upon it, there rose up certain of the sect of the Pharisees, who received the tidings very coldly, and, though they believed in Christ, yet were not satisfied in the admission of those converts, but thought it was needful to circumcise them. Observe here, That those who have been most prejudiced against the Gospel, yet have been captivated by it; so mighty has it been through God to the pulling down of strong holds; but it is very hard for men suddenly to get clear of their prejudices.

V. 6—21. We have here a council called, not by writ, but by consent, on this occasion, v. 6. They did not give their judgment separately, but came together to do it, did not give it rashly, but considered of the matter. Though clear in their own minds, yet they would consider, and hear what was to be said by the adverse party. Nor did the apostles give their judgment concerning it without the elders, the inferior ministers, to whom they thus condescended, and whom they thus honored. Here is a direction to pastors of churches, when difficulties arise, to come together in solemn meetings for mutual advice and encouragement, that they may know one another's mind, and strengthen one another's hand, and act in concert.

Now here we have,

I. Peter's speech in this synod. He did not in the least pretend to any primacy or headship; he was not master of this assembly, nor so much as chairman, or moderator; and practice a rule and a law to every body else; to judge of all about us by our standard, and to conclude, that, because we do well, all do wrong, that do not just as we do. Those Jews hear that Christ's doctrine is received among the Gentiles, and his kingdom begins to be set up in the midst of them; 'Therefore by all means let the brethren be pressed to be circumcised, and keep the law; and then, with our religion, our dominion will be extended, and we shall in a little time be able to shake off the Roman yoke; and not only so, but to put it on the necks of our neighbors, and so shall have such a kingdom of the Messiah as we promised ourselves.' It is no wonder, if those who have wrong notions of the kingdom of Christ, take wrong measures for its advancement, such as really tend to its destruction, as these do.

The controversy about the circumcising of the Gentile proselytes, had been on foot among the Jews long before this. This is observed by Whitby, out of Josephus, Antiq. l. 20. c. 2. 'That when Izates, the son of ject a full discussion, in order that it might be finally determined, to the satisfaction of all concerned in it. This has commonly been called 'The first general council;' and it seems to have also been the last where it could properly be said, 'It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, &c.' (28.)

This journey was fourteen years after Paul's conversion.' Dr. A. C. Elders at Jerusalem. 'By what authority these have been concluded to be some of the 120, mentioned Acts 1:15. I am yet to learn, notwithstanding what is suggested by Dr. Whitby and Dr. Benson. It seems to me, that any officers of the church, to whom the stated inspection of it was committed, might properly be called elders, an elder, whether they were, or were not, of that number.' Doddr. 'They who were officers in the church under the apostles.' Dr. A. C. They. 'I. e. the brethren, the united members of the church; not the Præpositi Ecclesiæ, [men set over the church,] as Hamm. supposes; still less those Jerusalemite teachers, as Beza. In forming this determination, they seem, as usual, to have been guided by the custom which had prevailed in the Jewish church; viz. (and so Grot.) when any question arose among the Jews, which gave occasion for schism, of appealing to the Sanhedrim to decide the controversy. For Jerusalem then was, what Rome afterwards became, the resort of learned persons, both residents and sojourners, who repaired thither from all quarters of the world; so that the Roman synod (which was often consulted by the bishops of other countries) was nearly equivalent to a general council.—Beza well remarks, that some others of the brethren were added, lest Paul and Barnabas should seem to make it their own cause, or to dissent from the Antiochian council.'

(3.) 'It was customary both among Greeks and Romans, (see Xen. Cic., &c.) as well as Jews, to show respect to parting guests, by going part of the way forward with them.'

(4.) And when they were come, &c. 'This was Paul's third journey to Jerusalem, after his conversion. See an account of his first, ch. 9:36. and of his second, ch. 11:30.'

(5.) 'That this assembly, [note v. 12.] though it may be called a council in one sense, yet was very different from those held after the 2d. cent., composed of the governors of the church, and properly called councils, has been shown at large by Mosheim and Heumann.' BL.

V. 7—11. It is not certain that any of the apostles were present, except Peter, James, and John: perhaps the rest were employed in preaching the Gospel at a distance. Gal. 2:6—10, v. 9. Those present, however, chose rather to hear the arguments of their brethren, and to show the ground on which their own conclusions rested, than to

8 And God, which <sup>m</sup> knoweth the hearts, bare them witness, giving them the Holy Ghost, even as he did unto us ;

9 And put no difference between us and them, purifying <sup>n</sup> their hearts by faith.

10 Now therefore why tempt ye God, to put a yoke <sup>o</sup> upon the neck of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear ?

11 But we believe, that through <sup>p</sup> the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved, even as they.

12 ¶ Then all the multitude kept silence, and gave audience to Barnabas and Paul, declaring what miracles and wonders God had wrought <sup>q</sup> among the Gentiles by them.

he neither spake first, to open the synod, (there having been much disputing before he rose up,) nor last, to sum up the cause and collect the suffrages; but he was a faithful, prudent, zealous member of this assembly, and offered what was very much to the purpose, and would come better from him than from another, because he had himself been the first that preached the Gospel to the Gentiles. When both sides had been heard, Peter rose up, and addressed himself to the assembly, Men and brethren, as did James afterward, v. 13. And here,

1. He put them in mind of the call and commission he had some time ago to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles; he wondered there should be any difficulty made of a matter already settled, v. 7. Ye know I was questioned about it, and cleared myself to universal satisfaction; everybody rejoiced that God had granted to the Gentiles repentance unto life, and nobody said a word of circumcising them, nor was there any thought of such a thing. See ch. 11:18.

2. He puts them in mind how remarkably God owned him in preaching to the Gentiles, and gave testimony to their sincerity in embracing the Christian faith, v. 8. See ch. 11:15—17.

God had bid the Gentiles welcome to the privilege of communion with Him, without requiring them to be circumcised, and to keep the law; therefore shall not we admit them into communion with us but upon those terms? v. 9. God has put no difference between us and them: they, though Gentiles, are as welcome to the grace of Christ and the throne of grace as we Jews are; why then should we set them at a distance, as if we were holier than they? Is. 65:5. Now the Gentiles were fitted for communion with God, in having their hearts purified by faith, and that faith, God's own work in them; why should we think them unfit for communion with us, unless they submit to the ceremonial purifying enjoined by the law to us?

3. He sharply reproves those, some of whom, it is likely, were present, who went about to bring the Gentiles under the obligation of the law of Moses, v. 10. The thing is so plain, that he cannot forbear speaking of it with some warmth. Here he shows that in this attempt, (1.) They offered a very great affront to God, v. 10. Those tempt [try experiments with] God, who prescribe to Him, and say that people cannot be saved, but on such and such terms, which God never appointed; as if the God of salvation must come into their measures. (2.) They offered a very great wrong to the disciples; Christ came to proclaim liberty to the captives, and they go about to enslave those whom He has made free. See Neh. 5:8. Now for these teachers to go about to lay that yoke on the neck of the Gentiles, which He came to free even the Jews from, was the greatest injury imaginable to them.

4. Whereas the Jewish teachers had urged that circumcision was necessary to salvation, Peter shows it was so far from being so, that both Jews and Gentiles were to be saved purely through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and no other way, v. 11. There is not one way of salvation for the Jews, and another for the Gentiles; neither circumcision avails anything, nor uncircumcision, but faith which works by love, Gal. 5:6.

II. What Barnabas and Paul said in this synod, did not need to be related; for they only gave in a narrative of what was recorded in the foregoing chs. the miracles and wonders God had wrought among the Gentiles by them, v. 12. This they had given in to the church at Antioch, ch. 14:27. to their brethren by the way, ch. 15:3. and now again to the synod; and it was very proper to be given in here: that which was contended for, was, that the Gentiles ought to submit to the law of Moses; now, in opposition to this, Paul and Barnabas undertake to show, by a plain relation of matters of fact, that God owned the preaching of the pure Gospel to them without the law, and therefore to press the law on them now, was to undo what God had done. Observe,

1. They declared, or opened in order, and with all the magnifying and affecting circumstances, what confirmation He had given to their preaching, by miracles wrought in the kingdom of nature, and what success, by miracles wrought in the kingdom of grace. The conversion of the Gentiles, was itself a wonder, all things considered, no less than a miracle. Now if they received the Holy Ghost by the hearing of faith, why should they be embarrassed with the works of the law? See Gal. 3:2.

2. What attention was given to them; it should seem, all took more notice of their narrative than of all the arguments offered. As in natural philosophy and medicine, nothing is so satisfactory as experiments, and in law, as cases adjudged, so in the things of God, the best explication of the Word of grace, is, the accounts given of the operations of the Spirit of grace; these the multitude will with silence give audience to.

III. The speech James made to the synod. He let Paul and Barnabas say what they had to say, and then he made the application of it. The hearing of variety of ministers may be of use, when one truth does not drive out, but clench, another. He addresses himself respectfully to those present; Men and brethren, hearken unto me. We are all brethren, and equally concerned in this cause, that nothing be done to the dishonor of Christ, and the uneasiness of Christians. He refers himself to what Peter had said concerning the conversion of the Gentiles, v. 14. and observes here, That the grace of God was the rise of it; it was God that visited the Gentiles, and redeemed those that were not a people. That the glory of God was the end of it; it was to take out of them a people for his name, who should glorify Him, and in whom He would be glorified. Let all the people of God remember, that therefore they are thus dignified in God, that God may be glorified in them.

He confirms this with a quotation out of the O. T.; he could not prove the calling of the Gentiles by a vision, as Peter could, or by miracles wrought by his hand, as Paul and Barnabas could, but he would prove that it was foretold in the O. T. therefore it must be fulfilled, v. 15. To this agree the words of the prophets; most of the O. T. prophets spake more or less of the calling in of the Gentiles, even Moses himself, Rom. 10:19. It was the general expectation of the pious Jews, that the Messiah should be a Light to lighten the Gentiles, Luke 2:32. but decide the question merely by apostolical authority. 'The heart' (9) may here signify the soul, with all its faculties and powers; and the expression may refer, not only to the sanctification of the soul by the Holy Spirit, but also to the purifying of the conscience through the blood of Christ from the guilt of sin.—This did not relate merely to circumcision, but to the whole ceremonial law; which, though proper and useful for the time, required so many distinctions, burdensome purifications, expensive sacrifices, long journeys, and other things of a similar nature; that it was a very uneasy yoke, in every age, even to the inhabitants of the promised land, and still more to those Jews who resided in other countries: and, while it served to prevent idolatry from being universal, it also tended exceedingly to prevent the general diffusion of true religion.—'Though these words are by most interpreters applied to the numerous ritual precepts, the costly sacrifices, and the frequent tedious journeys up to Jerusalem, required by the law, which made the observance of it difficult and irksome, I would rather refer them to that defect, that the apostle hath observed in it, that it could "not purge the conscience from the guilt of sin;" (Heb. 9:9. 10:1.) that it "could not give life," (Gal. 3:21.) that it was a killing letter, leaving them under condemnation; (2 Cor. 3:6—9.) and so making it necessary for them to believe in Christ, that they might be justified, (Gal. 2:16.) and redeemed from the curse of the law; (Gal. 3:13.) according to those words of the apostle, 13:38, 39. . . . For to this sense the following words incline; "we could not bear this yoke; for we believe that by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved." Whitby.—There was, however, no occasion to impose this yoke on the Gentiles, as even the Jewish converts did not expect to be saved, in any degree, by observing the Mosaic law, but merely by faith in Christ, exactly in the same manner with their Gentile brethren; though they deemed it a part of their present duty to observe it. (7) A good while ago.] 15:21. 21:16. 2 Cor. 5:17. 2 Pet. 2:5. Rev. 12:9.—Ps. 79:8. 89:49. Sept. As a short time only had passed since the conversion of Cornelius; may not this remarkable language relate rather to the antecedent purpose of God, than to the fulfilment of it by Peter (18)?

(7.) When there had been much disputation, &c.] 'The debate which arose in this assembly cannot, as many have supposed, afford any just argument against their inspiration; for this dispute does not appear to have been among the apostles themselves; and if they really had debated the case awhile, their decision at last might have been under an unerring direction. and I know not any reason to conclude, that their inspiration was always so instantaneous and express, as to supersede any deliberation in their own minds, or any consultation with each other.' Doddr. Made choice among us.] 'I. e. simply, chosen us, an Hebraism; comp. Neh. 9:7. 1 Chr. 28:4, 5. and so Grot., Vorst., Heintz., Kuin.' BLOOMF.

(10.) Tempt.] 'They are said to tempt God (so Ros.), who act as if they wished to see what God can and will do, who require new proofs of his divine will and power; when the most unexceptionable ones already exist. Who call in question (Kuin.) his attributes, and require further proofs of them; thus resisting God. And so Schl., who comp. Ex. 17:2, 7. Ps. 78:46. Jnd. 3:12. 1 Cor. 10:9. Heb. 5:9. Could bear: i. e. will bear: for (so Grot.) men are said not to be able to do what is only difficult.'

V. 12. (4) It is expressly said, that 'the apostles and elders came together for to consider of this matter' (6); and on another occasion the apostles and elders are distinguished from the company of believers. (21:17—26.) 'All the multitude,' must therefore here be restricted to the whole of the assembly convened for this special purpose, (perhaps including select persons who were not elders,) the determination of which assembly was afterwards made known to the church at large, who concurred in it. 22—29.

(12.) Multitude.] From this word, it is supposed by some that the people were admitted, but the Gr. plēthos, is 'a term of middle signification, and often denotes an assembly, without reference to number; as seems to be the case here;' so Bloomf., who adds, 'it is unquestionable, from v. 22, 23. but that some, and that not a few, were called in besides the apostles and presbyters. I assent to Mosh. and Kuin., that as no building could contain all the Christians, some select individuals of the laity, (perhaps delegated from the whole body,) of most knowledge, influence, and credit, are meant.' The Ed. of course, cannot be expected

13 ¶ And after they had held their peace, James answered, saying, Men and brethren, hearken unto me :

14 Simeon hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name.

15 And to this agree the words of the prophets ; as it is written,

16 After this I will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down ; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up :

17 That the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles, upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things.

18 Known unto God are all his works, from the beginning of the world.

19 Wherefore my sentence is, that we trouble not them, which from among the Gentiles are turned to God :

s Am. 9:11,12. 46:10.

James waives the more illustrious prophecies of this, and pitches on one that seemed more obscure ; It is written, Amos 9: 11, 12. where is foretold, 1. The setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah, v. 16. The house and family of David are here called his tabernacle, because David in his beginning was a shepherd, and dwelt in tents, and his house, that had been as a stately palace, was become a mean and despicable tabernacle ; there had not been for many ages a king of the house of David ; the sceptre was departed from Judah, the royal family sunk in obscu-city, and as it should seem, not inquired after ; but God will return, and will build it again, raise it out of its ruins ; and this was now lately fulfilled, when our Lord Jesus was raised out of that family, had the throne of his father David given Him, with a promise, that He should reign over the house of Jacob for ever, Luke 1: 32, 33. And when the tabernacle of David was thus rebuilt in Christ, all the rest of it was, not many years after, wholly cut off, as was also the nation of the Jews itself, and all their genealogies lost. 2. The bringing in of the Gentiles, as the effect and consequence of this, v. 17. the residue of men, such as had hitherto been left out of the pale of the visible church, they must now, on this re-edifying of the tabernacle of David, be brought to seek after the Lord, and to inquire how they may obtain his favor, Hos. 3: 5. Jer. 30: 9. Then Israel shall possess the remnant of Edom ; so it is in the Heb. ; for the Jews called all the Gentiles Edomites, therefore the Sept. there leave out the particular mention of Edom, and read it just as it is here, that the residue of men might seek, (James here adds, after the Lord,) and all the Gentiles, or heathen, upon whom my name is called. This promise we may depend on the fulfilling of in its season ; and now it begins to be fulfilled, for it is added, saith the Lord, who doeth this ; who doeth all these things ; so the LXX. there, and the apostle here. The uniting of Jews and Gentiles in one body, and all these things that were done in order to it, which were here foretold, were the Lord's doing, and what God delighted in, and was well pleased with ; for He is the God of the Gentiles, as well as the Jews, and it is his honor to be rich in mercy to all that call upon Him.

He resolves it into the purpose and counsel of God, v. 18. He not only foretold the calling of the Gentiles many ages ago, by the prophets, but He foresaw and foreordained it in his eternal counsels, which are unquestionably wise, and unalterably firm. It is an excellent maxim here laid down concerning all God's works, both of providence and grace, in the natural and spiritual kingdom, that they were all known unto Him from the beginning of the world, from the time He first began to work, which supposes his knowing them, as other scriptures speak, from before the foundation of the world, and therefore from all eternity.

He gives his advice, v. 19. I give it as my opinion, (so the Gr.) or judgment ; not as having authority over the rest, but as being an adviser with them. 1. That circumcision and the observance of the ceremonial law be by no means imposed on the Gentile converts ; no, not so much as recommended or mentioned to them. Great care must be taken, not to discourage or disquiet young converts with matters of doubtful disputation. Let the essentials of religion, which an awakened conscience will readily receive, be first impressed deeply on them, and those will satisfy them, and make them easy ; and let not things foreign and circumstantial be urged on them, which will but trouble them. 2. That yet it would do well that in some things, which gave most offence to the Jews, the Gentiles should comply with them : because they must not humor them so far as to be circumcised, and keep the whole law, it does not therefore follow that they must act in a continual contradiction to them, and study how to provoke them. It will please the Jews (and if a little thing will oblige them, better do so than cross them) if the Gentile converts abstain, [1.] From pollutions of idols and from fornication ; which are two bad things, and always to be abstained from ; but writing to them particularly and expressly to abstain from them, (because in these things the Jews were jealous of the Gentile converts, lest they should transgress,) would very much gratify the Jews ; not but that the apostles, both in preaching and writing to the Gentiles that embraced Christianity, were careful to warn against these things. See 1 Cor. 10: 14, &c. 2 Cor. 6: 14, &c. How large, how pressing, is Paul in his cautions to go at large into this, or any of the mooted questions of church government and discipline ; and must, once for all, refer the reader to such works as are expressly written on these subjects. Ed.

V. 13. James answered. 'It seems plain from hence that the matter was not determined by any authority in Peter.' Doddr. 'James was evidently president of the council ; the rest argued on the subject ; James alone pronounced the definitive sentence. Had Peter been prince and head of the apostles, and of the church, he would have appeared here in the character of Judge, not of mere councillor or disputant.' Dr. A. C.—'They who have interpreted this, as an instance of the authoritative proceedings of a bishop in his own diocese, have not sufficiently considered the difference between the apostolical and episcopal office, nor how little any supposed episcopal power of James at Jerusalem could give him, to dictate to Peter and his other brethren, in deciding a cause in which the whole Christian world, and not only his own supposed diocese, was concerned.' Doddr.—'Popish writers say, that "James presided, because the council was held in his own church." These forget, that there was not then what they term a church on the face of the earth,—that believers then met in private houses, and that there was no building for the exclusive purpose of Christian worship till long after. They also forget, that the pope pretends to be the head of the catholic or universal church ; and consequently no man can preside, when he is present, but himself. Peter did not preside here, nor did the other apostles invite him to it, which they would have done, had they thought that Jesus Christ constituted him head of the church. Hence the most demonstrative evidence, that Peter was not pope ; and the right of his pretended successor is a nonentity.' Dr. A. C. 'James' discourse consists of three parts ; Exordium, in a form of expression calculated to conciliate the good-will of his auditors, v. 13 ; Narration, with its confirmation from the prophets, v. 16, 17, and in v. 18. the reason ; Proposition, which is, The Gentiles are not to be compelled to Judaism, but are only to abstain from certain things, v. 19. since Judaism cannot be entirely abolished all at once, v. 20.' SCIOETTE.

V. 14. Simeon. 'Simon Peter ; Symeōn here, is the Gr. usual for Smāon, Gen. 29: 33. but the Greeks generally used instead, Simōn, as Sir. 5: 1. Luke follows the Heb. inflexion, as has Peter, in 1 Ep. 1: 1. Luke 2: 25.' BLOOMF.

V. 16, 17. After this, &c. The quotation varies from the LXX., and still more from the Heb. The grand outline, however, of the prediction is in all the same. (See on Am. 9: 11, 12.) SCOTT.

(16.) Tabernacle. 'Skēnē : Heb. grh, properly a hut or booth, (from Ang. Sax. bogen, to bend, i. e. a hut of bent twigs or boughs,) formed of boughs of trees and reeds, such as were in use among shepherds. [David was long a shepherd. Rich thus describes the booth, John 4: 5. which forms the Koordish 'ordinary accommodation during the hot months, called a tchardak ; a tchardak is 30 by 15 ft., with three ranges of four seven-foot posts, whose forked tops are connected by long spars with rafters over them. On this are heaped three feet of boughs and leaves, with a few bricks to keep them steady. The floor is of mud, covered with a plaster of clay, mixed in with chopped straw.

They spread their beds on the top, at night, and screen themselves from view by an open reed mat. The largest tchardaks have a tank, with sometimes a jet d'eau in the centre.] The [Heb. and Gr. also denote] any habitation, Luke 16: 9. here, house family. It is, too, a figurative expression for David's kingdom ; as elsewhere, Mt. Zion, where was David's palace, was put for the Jewish State.' Kuin., in Bl. Ed.

V. 18. 'The whole of this v. is very dubious : the principal part of it is omitted by the most ancient MSS., and Griesb. has left "known from the beginning," doubtful, and has thrown the rest out of the text. White says, of the former clause, probably it should be blotted out ; of the rest, most assuredly so. Some, as Schl. contend (supposing all genuine), that gnōsta [tr. known] here, has a sense like the Heb. ydd in many parts of the O. T., meaning not only to know, but, approve, love, &c. They would tr. "All the works of God are ever dear unto Him." And if so, we might naturally expect Him to be merciful to the Gentiles, as well as to the Jews ; and the evidence now afforded, of the conversion of the Gentiles, is an additional proof, that all God's works are equally dear to Him.' Dr. A. C. 'So Thaleman ; but any proof that gnōstikē, primitive of gnōsta, has the sense of dear, &c. will not be valid as to its derivative. Besides, as Kuin. remarks, the subject is not the creatures, but the illustrious works of God in the propagation of religion. He gives the sense "God is immutable," &c.' Bloomf. 'This text must remain an unanswerable proof, among a thousand more from the Word of God, that He certainly foreknows future contingencies.' Doddr. Note, 2: 23. Ed.

V. 19—21. This [fornication] was by no means held in such abhorrence among the Gentiles, as it ought to have been ; nay, it was generally considered as a trivial matter : and as it was very closely connected with their idolatrous feasts, the new converts might be in peculiar danger of being seduced into it ; to the dishonor of their profession, the injury of their own souls, and the great detriment of domestic comfort, and union in the worship of God. This was no doubt a moral injunction, independent of the ceremonial law. So was likewise the prohibition to eat of things sacrificed to idols, as connected with its consequences ; being in reality communion with idolaters in idolatry : and no doubt it is in force at this day, as a command of the moral law ; and must be charged on the consciences of all such as live among idolaters.—The subsequent injunctions are of another nature, and enforced by other reasons. This prohibition, eating of blood, was given from reverence to the blood of the sacrifices, which, being the life of the animal, was the essence of the atonement, as typical of that of Christ. It would then have needlessly grieved and stumbled the Jewish converts, and prevented their friendly intercourse with their brethren, and further prejudiced the unconverted Jews against the Gospel ; if the Gentile converts had shown so open a disregard to the solemn sacrifices, which were still offered at the temple. This seems to have been the reason of this restriction. As long as the sacrifices continued to be offered, we may suppose that it was observed ; but 'as every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused ;' as there is no intimation to this effect in the apostolical epistles ; and as the reason of it, which is here annexed, has long since ceased ;

20 But that we write unto them, that they abstain from pollutions of idols, and from fornication, and from things strangled, and from blood.

21 For Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every sabbath-day.

22 ¶ Then pleased it the apostles and elders, with the whole church, to send chosen men of their own company to Antioch, with Paul and Barnabas; namely, Judas surnamed Barsabas, and Silas, chief men among the brethren:

23 And they wrote letters by them after this manner; The apostles and elders, and brethren, send greeting unto the brethren which are of the Gentiles in Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia:

24 Forasmuch as we have heard, that certain which went out from us have troubled you with words, subverting your souls, saying, Ye must be circumcised, and keep the law: to whom we gave no such commandment:

against fornication and all uncleanness! 1 Cor. 6:9, 15. Eph. 5:3, &c. But the Jews, willing to think the worst of those they did not like, suggested, that the Gentiles, even after conversion, allowed themselves in these things, and the apostles of the Gentiles connived at it. Now, to obviate this suggestion, and to leave no room for this calumny, James advises, that, beside private admonitions, they should be publicly warned to abstain from pollutions of idols, and from fornication; that herein they should be very circumspect, and should avoid all appearances of those two evils, which would be in so particular a manner offensive to the Jews. [2.] From things strangled, and from blood; which, though not evil in themselves, as the other two, had been forbidden by the precepts of Noah, Gen. 9:4. before the giving of the law of Moses; and the Jews had a great dislike to them, and to all those that took a liberty to use them; and, therefore, to avoid giving offence, let the Gentile converts abridge themselves of their liberty herein, 1 Cor. 8:9, 13. Thus we must become all things to all men.

He gives a reason for his advice,—That great respect ought to be showed to the Jews, for they have been so long accustomed to the solemn injunctions of the ceremonial law, that they must be borne with a little, v. 21. 'You cannot blame them, if they have a great veneration for the law of Moses; for, besides that they are very sure God spake by Moses,' 'Moses is continually preached to them, and they are called upon to remember the law of Moses,' Mal. 4:4. 'His writings are read in a solemn, religious manner, in their synagogues, and on the sabbath-day, in their meetings for the worship of God; so that from their childhood they have been trained up in a regard to the law of Moses; the observance of it is a part of their religion.' 'This has been done of old time; they have antiquity for it; in every city, so that none of them can be ignorant what stress that law laid on these things; and therefore, though the Gospel has set us free from them, yet they cannot of a sudden be persuaded to look upon them as needless and indifferent, and they must be borne with a while, and we must comply with them, as far as we can without betraying our gospel-liberty.' Thus does this apostle show the spirit of a moderator, i. e. a spirit of moderation, being careful to give no offence either to Jew or Gentile, and contriving, as much as may be, to please both sides, and provoke neither. We are not to think it strange, if people be wedded to customs which they have had transmitted to them from their fathers, and which they had been educated in an opinion of as sacred; and therefore allowances must be made in such cases, and not rigor used.

V. 22—35. We have here the result of the consultation: the advice James gave, was approved and agreed to unanimously.

I. The choice of the delegates to be sent with Paul and Barnabas, to show their respect to the church at Antioch, as a sister-church, on the same level with them, as also that they were desirous further to know their state; to put a reputation on the letters they carried, that it might appear a solemn embassy, and so much the more regard might be had to the message, which was likely to meet with opposition from some. Also, to keep up the communion of saints, and cultivate an acquaintance between churches and ministers at a distance from each other, and to show, that though many, yet they were one.

Those they sent were chosen men, and chief men among the brethren, men of eminent gifts, graces, and usefulness; for those are the things which denominate men chief among the brethren, and qualify them to be the messengers of the churches. They are here named, Judas, who was called Barsabas, probably the brother of that Joseph who was called Barsabas, that was a candidate for the apostleship, ch. 1:23. The character these men had in the church at Jerusalem, would have some influence on them that came from Judea, as those false teachers did, and engage them to pay the more deference to the message.

II. The drawing up of the letters, to be sent to the churches, to notify the sense of the synod.

1. A very condescending, obliging preamble to this decree, v. 23. nothing haughty or assuming, but, (1.) What speaks the humility of the apostles, that they join the elders and brethren in commission with them, the ministers, the ordinary Christians, whom they had advised with in this case, as they used to do in other cases. Though never men were so qualified as they were for a monarchal power and conduct in the church, nor had such a commission as they had, yet their decrees run not, 'We, the apostles, so we must conclude that we are left as free in this, as in other similar matters. 1 Tim. 4:1—5. The permission given to the Israelites, to sell the bodies of animals which died of themselves to their heathen neighbors, shows, that the restriction of eating blood was ceremonial, not moral. They would not have been allowed to tempt the Gentiles to immorality. Lev. 17:10—16. Deut. 14:21.—It has been observed by several persons, that if Peter, instead of James, had said, 'My sentence is,' it would have given a more plausible argument for Peter's supremacy, than any which the Papists can adduce. (19.) My sentence is. I cannot but determine in my own mind. This the word may naturally express, and be taken to imply, judging in our own mind, without pretending to impose that judgment on others. Doddr. This is my sentence. Sentence, formerly meant the same as sentiment; and the best interpreters, ancient and modern, agree that the Gr. here, krinō, has merely the force of the Latin censeo, 'my opinion or sentiment is.' Ita censeo, thus I think, was generally (so Grot.) the concluding phrase with the Latin orators. See Cic. Philipp. So Thucyd. hōs egō krinō. In this sense the word often recurs in Xen.

(20.) Pollutions. The Gentiles, after the sacrifices were concluded, and a portion of the consecrated victim (the thing here intended) had been assigned to the priests, used to hold a sacrificial feast in honor of the god, either in the temple or at private houses, and then ate the residue of the flesh (so Herod., Ovid, Hom., Virg., Plaut., Gellius, Judg. 9:23. 2 Mac. 4:16.): or even from avarice, or poverty, salted and laid up the remnant for future use (see Theophr.), or even gave it to the butchers to sell in the shambles. See Schoettg. The drinking or other use of blood, obtained in the sacrifices of the ancients, in treaties, covenants, and magical rites; they used to drink it, in order thus to bind themselves by a closer covenant to their gods. The Zabians (so Maim.) thought blood a demon, and supposed that he who ate it had communion and might hold familiar intercourse with demons. So thought the Gentiles. See Cudworth, on the Lord's supper. Strangled. Pnikta: applied to all animals, entrapped game, &c., put to death without effusion of blood. The Gentiles used to eat the blood with the flesh, or let it out carefully, and convert it to nourishment, either by mixing it up with flour and oatmeal, and drinking it in a liquid state, or by mixing it with other food, as we do now in black puddings. See Paul. Ægin. This Hom. speaks of, Od. 18:25. See Tertull. Apol. So Apicius gives a receipt for giblet pie. Bloomf. Were we in like circumstances again, Christian charity would surely require us to lay ourselves under the same restraints. Doddr. But see Delany. The Gentiles accounted fornication, or whoredom, as a thing lawful or indifferent, so Terence. They committed it in their temples, at their festivals, &c. Notorious are their Bacchanalia, Lupercalia, the rights of the Bona Dea, &c., in which [84]

the Gentiles indulged with impunity, to the honor of Bacchus, the Bona Dea, &c. Comp. Num. 25:1. &c., Wisd. 14:16. Sir. 6:42. &c., 2 Mac. 6:4. 1 Pet. 4:3. As to mixing moral with positive precepts, (as here in a popular, not scholastic method,) we find the same thing in the Decalogue. See Marsh, as Mich. 1:451. Bloomf. Blood. (21.) Wetst. thinks this introduced, thus, 'there is no innovation intended, no abolition of the Law, let Jews born read and obey it, &c.' and Grotius supposes a tacit meeting of an objection to conciliate Jewish Christians. Synagogues. Here, the Christian assemblies, which still retained the name appropriated to religious meetings in the Jewish church, from which they had not yet departed, since they still continued in communion with it. Grot. shows, that both the Sabbath and the Lord's day were observed by Christians. (See Clem. Const. 7:24. 8:33 and 67.) And this was in after ages approved of by many fathers, as Asterius, Gregor. Nyssen., and Balsamon. Thus Constantine extended the prohibition of law-proceedings equally to both days; and for a long time afterwards equal marks of respect were shown to both days.—Real. Aloud, and publicly, so the Gr. kērussein [to proclaim, as a herald]. Grot. has shown, that this reading of the books of Moses was continued in the Christian churches up to the council of Laodicea, when, by the 19th canon, it was ordered that the Gospels should be also read.

V. 22—29. Many suppose, that the determination of God, in the case of Cornelius, was exclusively referred to; but it can hardly be supposed, that the apostles and council were left without a satisfactory consciousness, in a matter of such peculiar importance, that they were guided in the decision, by the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit. We may suppose [that more was said and done than is recorded, but] from the harmonious conclusion of the business, that those who at first were of another opinion were at length convinced; and made no further opposition to the general determination of this question. 16:4, 5.—Subverting. Rendering their souls unfit for their work and warfare; as an army would be, if deprived of its baggage. SCOTT.

(22.) Chosen men. Rather, leading men. So in Thucyd. BL.—Silas. Elsewhere called Sylvanus, 2 Cor. 1:19. 1 Thes. 1:1. 2 Thes. 1:1. 1 Pet. 5:12. a most intimate friend and beloved companion of Paul; also, as it seems, a citizen of Rome, Acts 16:37. DODDR.

(23.) Brethren. The apostles and elders, and other brethren. I conclude, with L'Enfant, that these brethren were private Christians, whom the apostles joined with them on this occasion, as well knowing, that their declared concurrence would strengthen their obligation not only to acquiesce in this decree, but to support it. ED.

25 It seemed good unto us, being assembled with one accord, to send chosen men unto you, with our beloved Barnabas and Paul, 26 Men that have hazarded <sup>e</sup> their lives for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.

27 We have sent therefore Judas and Silas, who shall also tell you the same things by <sup>f</sup> mouth.

28 For it seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burden <sup>g</sup> than these necessary things ;

29 That ye abstain <sup>h</sup> from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication : from which if ye keep <sup>i</sup> yourselves, ye shall do well. Fare ye well.

30 So when they were dismissed, they came to Antioch : and when they had gathered the multitude together, they delivered the epistle :

31 Which when they had read, they rejoiced for the <sup>j</sup> consolation.

32 And Judas and Silas, being prophets also themselves, exhorted the brethren with many words, and confirmed <sup>k</sup> them.

33 And after they had tarried <sup>l</sup> there a space, they were let go <sup>l</sup> in peace from the brethren unto the apostles.

Christ's vicars on earth, and pastors of all the pastors of the churches,' as the pope styles himself, 'and sole judges in all matters of faith ;' but the apostles, and elders, and brethren, agree in their orders ; herein they remembered the instructions their Master gave them, Mat. 23 : 8. Be not ye called Rabbi ; for all ye are brethren. (2.) What speaks their respect to the churches they wrote to ; they send them greeting, wish them health and happiness, and joy, and call them brethren of the Gentiles ; thereby owning their admission into the church, and giving them the right hand of fellowship.

2. A just and severe rebuke to the judaizing teachers, v. 24. 'We have heard, that certain which went out from us, have troubled you with words, and we are very much concerned

(27.) 'It was not unusual among the ancients to send letters by such persons as were able, and had authority, to give further details of any business, and communicate circumstances beyond what were adverted to in the letter. So Thucyd. 7, 10. Comp. Arrian. Ex. Al. 2, 14, 6.' BL.

(28.) Burden.] It was an oriental idiom to call all laws, orders, and injunctions, heavy or light, by the term here, baros, zugos, [yoke,] &c. Rev. 2:4. Mat. 23:4. ED.—Necessary things.] 'They were all undoubtedly necessary, in order to promote a free converse between the Jewish and Gentile Christians, and especially to secure communion at the table of the Lord.'

(29.) Fare ye well.] 'An old English form of expressing good wishes and good-will . . . like to that other form of sound words, God be with you! corrupted now, into good bye to ye! and of the same meaning with, adieu! à Dieu, to God! i. e. I commend you to God. All these terms savor, not only of good-will, or benevolence, but of piety. Our ancestors believed that nothing was safe, nothing protected, nothing prosperous, over which the shield of God was not extended ; and therefore in their familiar good wishes, they gave each other to God. The Gr. word here has nearly the same signification : be strong, courageous, active, be in health, and be prosperous. What a pity that such benevolent and pious wishes should degenerate into cool formalities, or unmeaning compliments!'

V. 30—35. Silas, having formed an intimate friendship with Paul, and being delightfully employed, did not choose to return with Judas ; having a prospect of greater usefulness at Antioch, and perhaps having an eye to that service, which he afterwards performed.—(32.) Being prophets, &c.] 'That is, saith Dr. Hammond, being two bishops of Judea ; but if so, why "pleased it Silas to abide there still ;" "rather than go back to his charge?" Yea, why, after so long a stay at Antioch, doth he go along with Paul in his travels, through Syria and Cilicia, "confirming the churches?" (41.) Why do we find him still with Paul ; (16: 17: 18:) and preaching at Thessalonica, Corinth, and other places ; but not at all returning to his see?' Whitby.

(32.) Prophets.] See on 11:27. 'Prophētēs is undoubtedly often used to hear it ; now this is to let them know, that those who preached this doctrine were false teachers, both as they produced a false commission, and as they taught a false doctrine.' It is no new thing for apostolical authority to be pleaded in defence of those doctrines and practices, which yet the apostles gave neither command nor encouragement for. How has the church been troubled with words, by the pride of men that loved to hear themselves talk ! They took them off from pursuing pure Christianity, and minding the business of that, by filling their heads with the necessity of circumcision, and the law of Moses, which were nothing to the purpose.

3. An honorable testimony to their messengers. (1.) To Paul and Barnabas, whom these judaizing teachers had opposed and censured, as having done their work by the halves, because they had brought the Gentile converts to Christianity only, and not to Judaism. Sometimes it is good for those that are of eminency, to express their esteem, not only for the despised truth of Christ, but for the despised preachers and defenders of that truth, to encourage them, and weaken the hands of their opposers. 'They are men that have signalized themselves in the service of Christ, and therefore have deserved well of all the churches, v. 26. are worthy of double honor, and cannot be suspected of having sought any secular advantage to themselves ; for they have ventured their all for Christ, have engaged in the most dangerous services, as good soldiers of Christ, and not only in laborious services.' (2.) To Judas and Silas ; 'They are chosen men, v. 25. men that have heard our debates, and are perfectly apprized of the matter, and will tell you the same things by mouth,' v. 27. What is of use to us, it is good to have both in writing and by word of mouth.

4. The direction what to require from the Gentile converts ; they should never eat anything they knew had been offered in sacrifice to an idol, but look upon it as, though clean in itself, yet thereby polluted to them. This prohibition was afterward in part taken off, for they were allowed to eat whatever was sold in the shambles, or set before them at their friend's table, though it had been offered to idols, except when there was danger of giving offence by it, i. e. of giving occasion either to a weak Christian to think the worse of our Christianity, or to a wicked heathen to think the better of his idolatry ; and in those cases it is good to forbear, 1 Cor. 10 : 25, &c. This, to us, is an antiquated case. That they should not eat blood, or drink it ;

but avoid everything that looked cruel and barbarous in that ceremony which had been of so long standing. That they should not eat anything that was strangled, or died of itself, or had not the blood let out. That they should be very strict in censuring those that were guilty of fornication, or marrying within the degrees prohibited by the Levitical law ; which, some think, is principally intended here. See 1 Cor. 5:1. 'These things are in a particular manner offensive to the Jews, and therefore do not disoblige them herein for the present ; in a little time the Jews will incorporate with the Gentiles, and then the danger is over.'

They express themselves with abundance of tenderness and fatherly concern, but with something of authority, to secure respect and deference ; It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, i. e. to us under the conduct of the Holy Ghost, as apostles, and others endued with spiritual gifts extraordinary : they knew more of the mind of God than any since those gifts ceased can pretend to ; their infallibility gave an incontestable authority to their decrees. Or, it refers to what the Holy Ghost had determined in this matter formerly, when He descended on the apostles with the gift of tongues, in order to their preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles ; which was a plain indication of God's purpose to call them in. When the Holy Ghost descended on Cornelius and his friends, on Peter's preaching, it was plain that Christ designed the taking down of the Jewish pale, within which they fancied the Spirit had been inclosed.

Church rulers should, as here, impose only necessary things, that Christ has made our duty, and that have a real tendency to the edification of the church, and, as these here, to the uniting of good Christians. They have authority only to see that the laws of Christ be duly executed.

They enforce their order with a commendation of those that shall comply with it, rather than with the condemnation of those that shall transgress it ; they do not conclude, 'From which if you do not keep yourselves, ye shall be an anathema, ye shall be cast out of the church, and accursed,' according to the style of after-councils, and particularly that of Trent ; but, 'From which if you keep yourselves, as we do not question but ye will, ye shall do well ; it will be for the glory of God, the furtherance of the Gospel, the strengthening of the hands of your brethren, and your own credit and comfort.' It is all sweetness and love, and good-humor, such as became the followers of Him who, when He called us to take his yoke upon in the SS. for one who, by divine assistance, declares things which are to happen at some future time : but the word has other significations, likewise, both in the O. and N. T. The things such a prophētēs speaks, chiefly relate to religion, or divine commands. So "prophecies" seem used in the Eng. vers., Prov. 30:1. 31:1. though only religious and moral reflections, and rules for life, are there found : and thus the praising God by spiritual songs, is called a prophesying, in 1 S. 10:5. 1 Chr. 25:1. and so when Paul in 1 Cor. 11:4, 5. says, praying or prophesying, he means preaching or teaching divine truths ; agreeably to which we find God saying to Abraham, Gen. 20:7. "he (Abraham) is a prophet, and shall pray for thee, and thou shalt live ;" i. e. he is a teacher of my will, and therefore his prayers shall prevail for thee. Prophētēs is used likewise for him who speaks instead of another, and is, therefore, said to be to him instead of a mouth, Ex. 4:16. as Aaron to Moses, 7:1. where thy prophet, is explained, v. 2. thus, "Thou shalt speak (Sept. to him) all that I command thee, and Aaron, thy brother, shall speak unto Pharaoh," &c. Now if he, who spoke instead of one only, may be called a prophet, well may he or they be called so, who speak in the name of many, as teachers do in religious assemblies. Jos. too, has "what Moses has taught (prophēteutheisi) them (the Jews) concerning God," Luke 1:67. 24:44. Nor are instances wanting of the same use of prophētēs, and its derivations in heathen authors ; thus Diod. calls history, "the prophētēs (teacher or declarer) of truth." Aristotle represents philosophy as comprehending divine things by means of the divine eye of the soul, and teaching (prophēteuoussa) them to mankind. Plato, still more explicitly (in Tiā.) distinguishes between the prophets, manteis, prophētai manteuomenōn, and the expounders of prophecies, who, he says, may most correctly be called, prophētai manteuomenōn, i. e. interpreters, pronouncers of vaticinations. In the same sense of teaching, and not of prophesying, Ovid gives the word vaticinor, Mat. 15:17. And, to quote no more instances, though Epimenides is styled a prophet in Titus 1:12. yet Aristotle, in Rhet. 3:17. says, "he did not teach (emanteuto) concerning future things, but concerning things past and obscure."' 34 Notwithstanding, it pleased Silas to abide there still.

Bp. PEARCE.

35 Paul also and Barnabas continued in Antioch, teaching and preaching the word of the Lord, with many others also.

36 ¶ And some days after, Paul said unto Barnabas, Let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord, and see how they do.

37 And Barnabas determined to take with them John, whose surname was Mark.

38 But Paul thought not good to take him with them, who departed from them from Pamphylia, and went not with them to the work.

39 And the contention was so sharp between them, that they departed asunder one from the other: and so Barnabas took Mark, and sailed unto Cyprus:

us, assured us we should find Him meek and lowly in heart. The difference of the style of the true apostles from that of the false is very observable. They that were for imposing the ceremonial law, were positive and imperious; Except ye keep it, ye cannot be saved, v. 1. ye are excommunicated at once, and delivered to Satan. The apostles of Christ, who only recommend necessary things, are mild and gentle; From which, if ye keep yourselves, ye shall do well, and as becomes you. Fare ye well; we are hearty well-wishers to your honor and peace.

III. The delivering of the letters. The people were wonderfully pleased, v. 31. and a great consolation it was to the multitude: they were confirmed in their freedom from the yoke of the ceremonial law; those who troubled their minds with an attempt to force circumcision on them, were hereby for the present silenced and put to confusion, the fraud of their pretensions to an apostolical warrant being now discovered; the Gentiles were hereby encouraged to receive the Gospel, and those that had received it to adhere to it; and the peace of the church was hereby restored, and that removed, which threatened a division. All this was consolation which they rejoiced in, and blessed God for.

The Jerusalem ministers, v. 33. when they had spent some time among them, so it might be read,—having made some stay, and having made it to good purpose, they were let go in peace from the brethren at Antioch, to the apostles at Jerusalem, with all possible expressions of kindness and respect; they thanked them for their coming and pains, and the good service they had done, wished them their health and a good journey home; and committed them to the custody of the peace of God.

Silas chose rather to abide still at Antioch, v. 34. I am apt to think the congregations at Antioch were both more large and more lively than those at Jerusalem, and that tempted him to stay there, and he did well: so did Judas; who, notwithstanding this, returned to his post of service at Jerusalem. Paul and Barnabas, though their work lay chiefly among the Gentiles, yet continued for some time in Antioch, being pleased with the society of the ministers and people there, which, it should seem by divers passages, was more than ordinarily inviting. They continued there, not to take their pleasure, but teaching and preaching the Word of God. Antioch being the chief city of Syria, it is likely there was a great resort of Gentiles thither from all parts, on one account or other, as there was of Jews to Jerusalem; so that, in preaching there, they did in effect preach to many nations; for they preached to those who would carry the report of what they preached to many nations, and thereby prepare them for the apostles' coming in person to preach to them. There were many others also there, laboring at the same oar. The multitude of workmen in Christ's vineyard does not give us a writ of ease. Even there where there are many others laboring in the Word and doctrine, yet there may be opportunity for us; the zeal and usefulness of others should excite us, not lay us asleep.

V. 36—41. We have seen one unhappy difference among the brethren, of a public nature, brought to a good issue; but here we have a private quarrel between two ministers, no less men than Paul and Barnabas, not compromised indeed, yet ending well.

I. Here is a good motion Paul made to Barnabas, to go and review their work among the Gentiles, and renew it; Antioch was now a safe and quiet harbor for them, but Paul remembered they only put in there to refit and refresh themselves, and therefore begins now to think of putting to sea again; and having been in winter-quarters long enough, he is for taking the field again, and making another campaign, in a vigorous prosecution of this holy war against Satan's kingdom. Barnabas was his old friend and fellow-laborer; two are better than one, and every soldier has his comrade. Note, Those that have preached the Gospel, should visit those to whom they have preached it. As we must look after our praying, and hear what answer God gives to that; so we must look after our preaching, and see what success that has. Faithful ministers cannot but have a particular, tender concern, for those to whom they have preached the Gospel, that they may not bestow on them labor in vain. See I Thess. 3: 5, 6.

IIe intended in this visit to see how they did. He would see how they do, i. e. 1. What spirit they are of, how they stand affected, and how they behave themselves; it is probable that they frequently heard from them. 2. What state they are in; whether the churches have rest and liberty; or whether they are not in trouble or distress, that we may rejoice with them if they rejoice, and caution them against security; and may weep with them if they weep, and comfort them under the cross, and may know the better how to pray for them.

II. The disagreement between Paul and Barnabas about an assistant; it was convenient to have a young man with them, that should attend on them, and be a witness of their doctrine, manner of life, and patience; and that should be fitted and trained up for further service, by being occasionally employed in the present service. Now,

1. Barnabas would have his nephew John, whose surname was Mark, to go along with them, v. 37. He determined to take him, because he was his relation, and, it is likely, was brought up under him. We should suspect ourselves of partiality, and guard against it in preferring our relations.

2. Paul opposed it, v. 38. He thought not good to take him with them,—he did not think him worthy of the honor, nor fit for the service, who had departed from them, clandestinely, as it should seem, or wilfully, from Pamphylia, ch. 13: 13. and went not with them to the work, either because he was lazy, and would not take the pains that must be taken; or cowardly, and would not run the hazard. If a man deceive me once, it is his fault; but if twice, it is my own, for trusting him. Solomon saith, Confidence in an unfaithful man, in time of trouble, is like a broken tooth, and a foot out of joint, which will hardly be used again, Prov. 25: 19.

III. The issue of this disagreement; it came to such a height, that they parted upon it. The contention, the paroxysm, so the word is, the fit of passion which this threw them both into, was so sharp, that they departed asunder one from the other. Now here is that which is very humbling, and just matter of lamentation, and yet very instructive. For we see,

1. That the best of men are but men. I doubt there was, as usually there is in such contentions, a fault on both sides; perhaps Paul was too severe on the young man, and did not allow his fault the extenuation it was capable of, did not consider what a useful woman his mother was in Jerusalem, ch. 12: 12. nor make the allowances he might have made to Barnabas' natural affection. But it was Barnabas' fault that he took that into consideration, in a case wherein the interest of Christ's kingdom was concerned, and indulged it too much. And they were certainly both in fault, to be so hot as to let the contention be so sharp, as also to be so stiff, as each to stick so resolutely to his opinion, and neither to (34.) 'This v. is wanting in A B E G., a great number besides, with the Syr., Ar., Copt., Slav., Vulg., and some Fathers; it seems not to have been originally in the text.' Dr. A. C. 'In others, "but Judas alone went," is added, it would seem, to remove a fancied contradiction to v. 33. But Silas might either have remained at Antioch, and there had been chosen by Paul as a companion; or he might have departed to Jerusalem, [and there would be time for him to have come back again to Antioch, before Paul left A.,] and have been sent for back to A. by Paul. [The text does not permit us to suppose otherwise than that he went to J. B.] Such minute circumstances are usually omitted by Luke. The v. is therefore deservedly expunged by Mill, Griesb., Mat.' KUN.

(35.) Continued at Antioch. 'It is generally thought, that during this time Peter came to Antioch, and, after having for some time conversed freely with the Gentile Christians, changed his behavior towards them, on the arrival of Jewish zealots from Jerusalem, according to the account we have, Gal. 2:11. and seq., which, if v. 1. of that ch. refer to the journey to the council, described above, seems, indeed, to have been the case. Nor do I think, that visit can be referred to Paul's second journey to Jerusalem after his conversion, Acts 11:30. though Barnabas also attended him then, because it was not till after that journey, that the Gospel of the circumcision was so solemnly committed to him, Acts 15:2, 3. which the apostles at Jerusalem acknowledged it to have been at the time spoken of, Gal. 2:7—9. If it be asked, why Paul, in his rebuke to Peter, did not cut short all further arguments, by referring roundly to the Jerusalem decree, if then made? I answer, he might perhaps do it, though not in that part of his speech, which he mentions in Gal.; yet even there he refers to what Peter himself had laid down as the foundation of that decree: Comp. Gal. 2:16—18. with Acts 15:11. And it likewise seems to be intimated, that Peter had gone farther in his condescensions, than the Jerusalem decree extended its decision, not only in receiving the Gentiles to church communion, or admitting them to converse with him, but living after their manner, as if he had been himself without the law; (as Paul himself in proper circumstances used to do, 1 Cor. 9:19—21.) yet afterwards dissembling his conduct, as being solicitous to make a secret of it; whereas Paul, though just at the crisis of the Jerusalem decree he had thought it his duty to keep in the reserve, and waive a declaration of his sentiments on this head, lest unnecessary debates, as to the obligation on believing Jews to observe the law, should have diverted the council from the business then in hand, and have frustrated the purpose of that journey, Gal. 2:2; yet, when that point was carried, and he had quitted Jerusalem, he used great freedom in declaring his opinion, which was, "not that the Mosaic ceremonies were in conscience to be avoided, but that even to the Jews themselves they were indifferent, any further than as the peace and edification of others were concerned." DONDR.

V. 36—41. It has indeed been maintained, that, though both [Barnabas and Paul] were angry, neither of them sinned; but if the one was angry without cause, or above cause, or expressed his anger unduly, he sinned; and if the other gave him just cause, he doubtless sinned. Certainly this never could have occurred, if both had been perfect.—

40 And Paul chose Silas, and departed, being recommended by the brethren unto the grace of God.

41 And he went through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches.

yield. We must own it was their infirmity, and is recorded for our admonition; not that we must make use of it to excuse our own intemperate heats and passions, or to rebate the edge of our sorrow and shame for them: No; but it must check our censures of others, and moderate them. If good men are soon put into a passion, we must make the best of it; it was the infirmity once of two of the best men that ever the world had! Repentance teaches us to be severe in reflections on ourselves; but charity teaches us to be candid in our reflections on others. It is only Christ's example that is a copy without a blot.

2. Paul and Barnabas, that were not separated by the persecutions of the unbelieving Jews, nor the impositions of the believing Jews, were yet separated by an unhappy disagreement between themselves. — Oh, the mischief that even the poor and weak remainders of pride and passion, that are found even in good men, do in the world, do in the church! No wonder the consequences are so fatal where they reign!

IV. The good that was brought out of this evil. It was strange that even the sufferings of the apostles, as Phil. 1: 12. but much more strange that even their quarrels should tend to the furtherance of the Gospel of Christ; yet so it proved here.

PRACT. OBS. The great enemy of God and man is continually devising measures for obstructing the success of the Gospel. For this purpose, he endeavors to make divisions among those who preach and profess it; and to corrupt its purity, and obscure the glory of divine grace in it, but plausibly substituting another foundation; or by introducing such alterations or appendages, as are calculated to mislead or discourage unestablished inquirers. In these attempts he avails himself of the errors, bigotry, and prejudices of well-meaning persons, and of the ambition and selfishness of false brethren.—When fair argument and scriptural evidence fail to convince gainsayers; we must be careful, that we be not seduced to use improper means of conducting the disputation: and if any method of preserving peace and truth can be suggested, we should submit to very great personal inconvenience, or apparent degradation, to accomplish so desirable an end. Sometimes the opinion of those, 'who seem to be pillars,' will go further than arguments: and we may fairly, in such circumstances, appeal to their judgment, in order to 'stop the mouths' of those, who profess to speak their sentiments; and to satisfy such as have imbibed prejudices, which close their minds to the most conclusive reasoning. But we ought never to be so engaged about any single question, as to neglect opportunities of declaring what God has done for or by us, or of being helpers to the joy of our brethren in every place.—It may be useful for the ministers and disciples of Christ to meet together, to consider any controverted subject, in order that they may form the more accurate and decided judgment upon it: yet great humility, prudence, temper, candor, and integrity are requisite, to prevent such conventions from degenerating into party-cabals, or scenes of contention and confusion, [as those who speak are usually unaccustomed to contradiction in their pulpits, and so bear it worse.] This has brought ecclesiastical councils and synods into general disrepute: and indeed little good can be expected from them, when they are very numerous; or when they are so constituted, as to give an opening for political contests, or party interests. Yet select companies, meeting in the fear of God, and in the spirit of humble prayer for divine teaching, may help each other to investigate truth, and to decide difficult and important questions. We should, however, remember that the apostles themselves assigned the reasons of their determinations; and did not require the elders and churches to submit to their authority, without knowing the grounds on which they went: and in such discussions, we shall generally, if not always, find, that by examining the source of the subject in question, it will appear to have been already decided by the Lord Himself, and that it would be 'tempting' Him to debate the matter any further.

Thus these two fellow-laborers parted, probably to meet no more on earth: neither of them, however, remitted anything of his zeal and diligence, on account of this disagreement; or said anything, that we know of, to disparage the other. Doubtless Barnabas labored and prospered to the end of life; but the rest of this book relates primarily to the ministry and sufferings of Paul and his companions.—(41) And Cilicia. This and v. 23. contain the only intimation of any church being found in Cilicia, the native country of Paul. 11:25, 26. SCOTT. (39.) They separated, &c. The Gr. does not imply any sinfulness in this difference, see Dr. A. C., &c.; and it appears, not only that Paul and Barnabas were afterwards thoroughly reconciled; (comp. 1 Cor. 9:6. Gal. 2:9.) but also that John was taken into Paul's favor again, and admitted by him as a companion in his labors, (comp. Col. 4:10. Phil. v. 24. 2 Tim. 4:11.) 'It is probable, the exhortations of Barnabas might concur, with these resentments of Paul, to recover him from his former indolent and timorous disposition.' Doddr. Ed.—Contention. 'Parox-

1. More places are hereby visited. Barnabas went one way; he sailed to Cyprus, v. 39. that famous island where they began their work, ch. 13: 4. and which was his own country, ch. 4: 36. Paul went another way, into Cilicia, which was his own country, ch. 21: 39. They seem to be influenced by their affection to their native soil, as usual; and yet God served his own purposes by it, to diffuse gospel-light.

2. More hands are hereby employed in the ministry of the Gospel among the Gentiles; for, (1.) John Mark, who had been an unfaithful hand, is not rejected, but is again made use of, against Paul's mind, and, for aught we know, proves very useful and successful; though many think it was not the same with that Mark that wrote the Gospel, and founded the church at Alexandria, he whom Peter calls his son, 1 Pet. 5: 13. (2.) Silas, a new hand, never yet employed in that work, nor designed to be, but to return to the service of the church at Jerusalem, had not God changed his mind, v. 33, 34. he is brought in, and engaged in that noble work. We may further observe,

[1.] That the church at Antioch seemed to countenance Paul in what he did. Barnabas sailed with his nephew to Cyprus, and no notice was taken of him, nor a recommendation given him. Those that in their service of the church are swayed by private affections and regards, forfeit public honors and respect. But when Paul departed, he was recommended by the brethren to the grace of God. They thought he was in the right. Those are happy at all times, and especially in times of disagreement and contention, who are enabled so to carry themselves as not to forfeit their interest in the love and prayers of good people.

[2.] That yet Paul afterward had, though not on second thoughts, yet, on further trial, a better opinion of John Mark; for he writes to Timothy, 2 Tim. 4: 11. Take Mark and bring him with thee, for he is profitable to me for the ministry; and he writes to the Colossians concerning Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas, that if he came to them they should receive him, bid him welcome, and employ him, Col. 4: 10. Which teaches us, 1st. That even those whom we justly condemn, we should condemn moderately, because we know not but afterward we may see cause to think better of them, and both to make use of them and make friendship with them; and we should so regulate our resentments, that if it should prove so we, may not afterward be ashamed of them. 2dly. That even those whom we have justly condemned, if afterward they prove more faithful, we should cheerfully receive, forgive, and forget, and put a confidence in; and, as there is occasion, give a good word to.

[3.] That Paul, though he wanted his old friend and companion, yet went on cheerfully in his work, v. 41. through Syria and Cilicia, countries next to Antioch, confirming the churches. And observe, Ministers are well employed, and ought to think themselves so, and be satisfied, when used to confirm those that believe, as well as convert those that believe not.

CHAP. XVI. It is some rebuke to Barnabas, that after he left Paul we hear no more of him, of what he did or suffered for Christ. But Paul, as he was recommended by the brethren to the grace of God, so his services for Christ after this are largely recorded; we are to attend him in this ch. from place to place, wherever he came, doing good, either watering or planting, beginning new work, or improving what was done.

V. 1—5. I. Paul, as a spiritual father, here adopts Timothy, and takes care of the education of many others, who had been begotten to Christ by his ministry: and in all he appears to have been a wise and tender father.

1. Timothy is taken into his acquaintance, and under his tuition. He was a disciple, one that belonged to Christ, baptized, probably in infancy, when his mother became a believer, as Lydia's household was baptized on her believing, v. 15. His mother was a Jewess, originally, but believed in Christ; named Eunice; his grandmother's name was Lois. Paul speaks of them both with great respect, as women of eminent virtue and piety, and commends them especially for their unfeigned faith, 2 Tim. 1: 5. their sincere embracing of, and adhering to, the doctrine of Christ. His father was a Greek, a Gentile; the marriage of a Jewish woman by a Gentile husband (though some would make a difference) was prohibited as much as the marriage of a Jewish man to a Gentile wife, Deut. 7: 3. yet that seems to have been limited to the nations that lived among them in Canaan, whom they were most in danger of infection from. Now because his father was a Greek, he was not circumcised; for the entail of the covenant and the seal of it, as of other entails in that nation, went by the father, not by the mother; so that his father being no Jew, he was not obliged to circumcision, nor entitled to it, unless when he grew up he did himself desire it. But observe, though his mother could not prevail to have him circumcised in his infancy, yet she educated him in the fear of God; that though he wanted the sign of the covenant, he might not want the thing signified.

NOTES. CHAP. XVI. V. 1—3. Grotius observes, that this was probably the beginning of Luke's acquaintance with Timothy, 'though Paul knew him long before.'—The apostle's manner, in speaking of the persecutions which he endured 'at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra, &c.' though, before he wrote it, he had gone through very many others; implies that Timothy had witnessed his sufferings in that neighborhood, and would be peculiarly affected by recollecting them. 2 Tim. 3:10—12.

2. He had gained a very good character among the Christians; he was well reported of by brethren at Lystra and Iconium; had not only an unblemished but a bright reputation, and great encomiums were given of him, as an extraordinary young man, from whom great things were expected. Not only those in the place where he was born, but those in the neighboring cities, admired him, and spake honorably of him. He had a name for good things with good people.

3. Paul would have him to go forth with him, attend on him, receive instruction from him, and join him in the work of the Gospel; to preach for him when there was occasion, and to be left behind in places where he had planted churches. Paul took a great love to him, not only because he was an ingenious young man, and one of great parts, but because he was a serious young man, and one of devout affections: for Paul was always mindful of his tears, 2 Tim. 1:4.

4. Paul had him circumcised. Strange! Had not Paul opposed those with all his might that were for imposing circumcision on the Gentile converts? Had he not at this time the decrees of the council at Jerusalem with him, which witnessed against it? He had, and yet circumcised Timothy, not, as those teachers designed in imposing circumcision, to oblige him to keep the ceremonial law, but only [in a matter otherwise indifferent] to render his conversation and ministry passable, and, if it might be, acceptable among the Jews that abounded in those quarters. He knew Timothy was a man likely to do great good with them, being admirably qualified for the ministry, if they were not invincibly prejudiced against him; therefore, that they might not shun him as one unclean, because uncircumcised, he took him and circumcised him. He was against those who made circumcision necessary to salvation, but himself used it when conducive to edification; nor was he rigid in opposing, as they were in imposing it. Thus, though he went not in this instance according to the letter of the decree, he went according to its spirit; which was a spirit of tenderness toward the Jews, and willingness to bring them off gradually from their prejudices. Probably it was at this time Paul laid his hands on Timothy, conferring the gift of the Holy Ghost, 2 Tim. 1:6.

II. Here is Paul's confirming the churches he had planted, v. 4, 5. He went through the cities where he had preached the Word of the Lord, as he intended, ch. 15:36. to inquire into their state.

1. They delivered them copies of the decrees of the Jerusalem synod, to direct them, that they might have wherewith to answer the judaizing teachers, and to justify themselves in adhering to the liberty with which Christ had made them free. Though Paul had, for a particular reason, circumcised Timothy, yet he would not have that drawn into a precedent; therefore he delivered the decrees to the churches, to be religiously observed.

2. This was of very good service, for (1.) The churches were hereby established in the faith, v. 5. particularly in their opinion against imposing the ceremonial law on the Gentiles; when they saw the testimony, not only of the apostles and elders, but of the Holy Ghost in them, against it, they did no longer waver about it. Nay, the design of this decree being to set aside the ceremonial law, and its carnal ordinances, they were by it established in the Christian faith in general, and were the more firmly assured that it was of God, because it set up a spiritual way of serving God, as more suited to the nature both of God and man; and besides, that spirit of tenderness and condescension which appeared in these letters, plainly showed, that the apostles and elders were herein under the guidance of Him who is Love itself. (2.) They increased in number daily. If they had been disposed to turn Jews, they could have done that long since, before the apostles came among them: but now that they find there is no danger of their being enslaved by the yoke of the law, they are ready to embrace Christianity, and join the church: not a day passed but some or other gave up their names to Christ.

V. 6-15. In these verses, we have,

I. Paul's motions up and down to do good.

1. He and Silas went throughout Phrygia and Galatia, where, it should seem, the Gospel was already planted, whether by Paul's hand or no, is not mentioned; it is likely it was, for in his epistle to the Galatians, he speaks of his preaching the Gospel to them at the first, and how very acceptable he was among them, Gal. 4:13-15. And it appears by that epistle, that the judaizing teachers had then done great mischief to these churches of Galatia, had prejudiced them against Paul, and drawn them from the Gospel of Christ, for which he there severely reproves them. But, probably, that was a great while after this.

2. They were forbidden at this time to preach the Gospel in Asia, (that country properly so called,) either because other hands were at work there, or because they were not yet prepared to receive it, as they were afterwards, ch. 19:10. when all they that dwell in Asia heard the Word of the Lord; or, as Dr. Lightfoot suggests, because at this time Christ would employ Paul in a new work, which was, to preach the Gospel to a Roman colony at Philippi, for hitherto the Gentiles he had preached to were Greeks. The Romans were more particularly hated by the Jews than other Gentiles, therefore there is this, among other things, extraordinary in his call thither, that he is forbidden to preach the Gospel in Asia, and other places, in order to his preaching it there. It was the Holy Ghost that forbade them, either by secret whispers, or by some prophets who spake to the mind of the Spirit. The removes of [faithful] ministers, and the dispensing of the means of grace by them, are in a particular manner under a divine conduct and direction.

3. They would have gone into Bithynia, but were not permitted, v. 7. They came to Mysia, and, as it should seem, preached the Gospel there; for though it was a very mean, contemptible country, even to a proverb, Mysorum ultimus, in Cicero, is a most despicable man; yet the apostles disdained not to visit it, owning themselves debtors both to the wise and to the unwise, Rom. 1:14. In Bithynia was the city of Nice, where the first general council was held against the Arians; into these countries Peter sent his epistle, 1 Pet. 1:1. And there were flourishing churches here; for though they had not the Gospel sent them now, they had it in their turn, not long after. Observe, Though their judgment and inclination were to go into Bithynia, yet, having then extraordinary ways of knowing the mind of God, they were overruled by them, contrary to their own mind. We must now follow Providence, and what we assay to do, if that suffer us not, we ought to acquiesce, and believe it for the best. The Spirit of Jesus suffered them not; so many ancient copies read it. The servants of the Lord Jesus ought to be always under the check and conduct of the Spirit of the Lord Jesus, by whom He governs men's minds.

4. They passed by Mysia, or passed through it, so some; and came down to Troas. Here a church was planted; for here we find one in being, ch. 20:6, 7. and probably planted at this time, and in a little time. It should seem, Luke joined the company here; for from henceforward, for the most part, when he speaks of Paul's journeys, he includes himself, we went, v. 10.

II. Paul's particular call to Macedonia, i. e. to Philippi, the chief city, inhabited mostly by Romans, as appears, v. 21. Paul had many visions, sometimes to encourage, sometimes, as here, to direct him in his work. An angel now appeared to him, to intimate to him that it was the will of Christ he should go to Macedonia.

1. He saw a man of Macedonia, who by his habit or dialect seemed so to Paul, or who told him he was so. The angel, some think, assumed the shape of such a man; or, as others think, impressed on Paul's fancy the image of such a man. Christ would have Paul directed to Macedonia, not as the

(3.) To go forth with him. 'I. e. as an Evangelist, (2. V. 7. The Spirit. 'Instead of the Spirit merely, the Spirit of Jesus is the reading of A B C D E, several others, with both the Syr., the Copt., Æth., Arm., Vulg., Itala, and several of the fathers. This reading is undoubtedly genuine, and should be immediately restored to the text.' Dr. A. Clarke. Doddr., also, thinks himself 'obliged to insert it.' ED.

9 ¶ And a vision appeared to Paul in the night; There stood a man <sup>m</sup> of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us.

10 And after he had seen the vision, immediately we endeavored to go <sup>n</sup> into Macedonia, assuredly gathering that the Lord had called us for to preach the gospel unto them.

11 Therefore loosing from Troas, we came with a straight course to Samothracia, and the next day to Neapolis; apostles were at other times, by a messenger from heaven, but by a messenger from thence, because he would afterward ordinarily direct the motions of his ministers, by inclining the hearts of those who need them to invite them. Some make this man to be the tutelar angel of Macedonia; supposing angels to have charge of particular places as well as persons, and that so much is intimated, Dan. 10:20. But there is no certainty of that. There was presented either to Paul's eyes, or to his mind, a man of Macedonia, not a magistrate of the country, much less a priest, but an ordinary inhabitant, a plain man, that carried in his countenance marks of probity and seriousness, that came with all earnestness to importune Paul's assistance.

12 And from thence to <sup>o</sup> Philippi, which is <sup>p</sup> the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a colony. And we were in that city abiding certain days.

2. This honest Macedonian prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us; i. e. 'Come and preach the Gospel to us; let us have the benefit of thy labors.' 'Thou hast helped many; it is thy business, thy delight, to help poor souls; we have need of thy help, in Macedonia; are as ignorant, careless, idolatrous, and vicious, nay, as ingenious and industrious to ruin ourselves as any; therefore, O come, come with all speed among us.' People have great need of help for their souls, and it is their duty to look out for it, and invite those among them that can help them.

(10.) We.] 'Luke here first intimates his own attending on the apostles; and it is very remarkable that he does it obliquely; nor does he indeed, throughout the whole history, once mention his own name, or relate any one thing which he said or did for the service of Christianity, though Paul speaks of him in the most honorable terms, Col. 4:14. 2 Tim. 4:11. and probably, 2 Cor. 8:18. as the brother whose praise in the Gospel went through all the churches. The same remark may be made on the rest of the sacred historians, who every one of them show the like amiable modesty.'

V. 12. Colony.] 'The critics were long puzzled to find any mention of Philippi, as a Roman colony: but some coins (dug up, I think, within the last century) show, that a colony was planted there by Julius Cesar, and afterwards much augmented by Augustus.' Doddr. SCOTT.

(12.) Chief.] 'I. e. a principal, most important city, see Bloomf.' Ed. A Colony.] 'Dio Cassius states, that Julius Cesar planted a colony here. See Spanh. So also *Digest. Some were called Romanæ, which had not the complete jus civitatis, but only the private rights of Quirites, without the privilege of suffrage, or of bearing offices in the state. Others were styled Latinæ, which had not the rights of Quirites, but the jus Latii. Now those who enjoyed it might bear suffrage at the popular assemblies for legislation, if summoned thereto by the Roman magistracy; and when they had held magistracy in a Latin city, they thereby obtained the Roman citizenship. Others again (as were most of those out of Italy) were juris Italicæ; a privilege inferior to the Latinitas, and consisting in immunity from tribute, whether land or capitation tax." See Spanh. Kuin. Chief city.] 'Though Amphipolis was made the chief city of that one of the four parts of Macedonia, conquered by Paulus Emilius, yet Philippi might have been the chief city in the days of Paul, 220 yrs. after the division

From this vision, v. 10. they gathered absurdly, that the Lord had called them to preach the Gospel there; and they were ready to go wherever God directed. We may sometimes infer a call of God from a call of man. Ministers may go on with great cheerfulness and courage in their work, when they perceive Christ calling them, not only to preach the Gospel, but to preach it at this time, in this place, to this people.

III. Paul's voyage to Macedonia hereupon; they set sail by the first shipping, and with the first fair wind from Troas, by a prosperous voyage, to Samothracia; the next day to Neapolis, a city on the confines of Thrace and Macedonia; and at last they landed at Philippi, a city so called from Philip king of Macedon, father of Alexander the Great, said, v. 12. to be The chief city of that part of Macedonia; or, as some read it, the first city, the first they came to when they came from Troas; and a colony; the Romans not only had a garrison, but the inhabitants of the city were Romans, the magistrates at least, and the governing part.

IV. Their cold entertainment at Philippi. One would have expected, on such a particular call from God, they should have had a joyful welcome there, as Peter had with Cornelius when the angel sent him. But, no.

1. It is a good while before any notice at all is taken of them; We were in that city abiding certain days, probably at a public house, and at their own charge. But so it was ordered for their trial. Let not ministers think it strange, if they be first strongly invited to a place, and yet looked shyly upon when they come.

2. When they have an opportunity of preaching, it is in an obscure place, and to a mean [poor*] and small auditory, v. 13. There was no synagogue of the Jews there, and they never went to the idol temples of the Gentiles, to preach to the auditories there; but here, on inquiry, they found out a little meeting of good women, that were proselytes of the gate, who will be thankful to them if they will give them a sermon. The place of this meeting is out of the city, there connived at, but not suffered within the walls; a place where prayer was wont to be made; proseuchæ,—where an oratory house of prayer was, so some; a chapel, or less synagogue. I rather take it as we read it, where prayer was appointed, or accustomed to be. They that worshipped the true God, and would not worship idols, met there to pray together, and, according to the description of the most ancient and universal devotion, to call upon the name of the Lord. Each prayed apart every day, that was always the practice of them that worshipped God; but beside that, they came together on the sabbath-day; though but a few, discountenanced by the town, though their meeting was at some distance, though, for aught that appears, none but women, yet a solemn assembly the worshippers of God must have, if by any means it be possible, on the sabbath-day; and when we cannot do as we would, we must do as we can; if we have not synagogues, we must be thankful for more private places, and resort to them; not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, according as our opportunities are. This place is said to be by a river side, perhaps chosen, as befriending contemplation. Ez. 1:1. Dan. 10:4. Thither Paul and Silas, and Luke, went, and sat down, to instruct the congregation, that they might the better pray with them; they spake unto the women which resorted thither, encouraged them in practising according to the light they had, and led them on further to the knowledge of Christ.

V. The conversion of Lydia, probably the first wrought upon there to believe in Christ.

1. It is an honor to her to have her name recorded here, so that wherever the Scriptures are read, there shall this be told concerning her. We cannot have our names recorded in the Bible, but, if God open our hearts, we shall find them written in the book of life, and that is better, Phil. 4:3. and more to be rejoiced in, Luke 10:20

2. Her calling; she was a seller of purple; either of purple dye, or of purple cloth or silk. Observe, She had an honest calling, which the historian notices to her praise; she was none of those women that the apostle speaks of, 1 Tim. 5:13. who learn to be idle, and not only idle, &c. Those employed in honest callings, if they be honest in the management of them, need not to be ashamed of them, [for it is not the employment, be it hand-work or head-work, which makes true honor, but the character.] She found time to improve advantages for her soul. The business of our particular callings [should be religion in practice, and] may be made to consist very well with the external business of religion, and therefore will not excuse us from religious exercises alone, and in our families, or in solemn assemblies. Everything in its time and place.

3. Thyatira was a great way from Philippi; there she was born and bred, but either married at Philippi, or brought by her trade to settle there. The providence of God, as it always appoints, so it often removes, the bounds of our habitation; and sometimes makes the change of our outward condition, or place of our abode, wonderfully subservient to the designs of his grace con-by Paulus Emilius. Besides, as it was at this place that Augustus gained that victory which put him in possession of the whole Roman empire, might not he have given to it, what was before enjoyed by Amphipolis? This is the most rational way of understanding the passage.' Dr. A. C.

V. 13—15. This is the first account, transmitted to us, of the Gospel being preached in Europe: though the church at Rome, it is probable, was planted considerably before this time. Prof. to Rom. (14) The Lord opened her heart.] This implies, that pride, prejudice, the love of sin, the love of the world, [&c.] close the heart against the truths of God, till his grace makes way for admission of them into the understanding and affections. The adult part of her household no doubt were instructed in Christianity, along with her. There is no proof that there were any children in her family, though it is probable there were: the Syr. indeed renders it, 'the children of her house;' but this only shows the sentiments of those, who made that early tr.: and the language here used seems not capable of being consistently used in the narratives of those, who reject infant baptism. 29—34. Lydia's beseeching the apostle and his company, if they really considered her to be a true believer, to lodge in her house, implies that she was a person rather in affluent circumstances.—Many others seem, about this time, or soon afterwards, to have been converted. 14 ¶ And a certain woman named Lydia, a seller of purple, of the city of Thyatira, which worshipped God, heard us: whose heart the Lord opened, that she attended unto the things which were spoken of Paul.

15 And when she was baptized, and her household, she besought us, saying, If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come into my house, and abide there. And she constrained us.

16 ¶ And it came to pass, as we went to prayer, a certain damsel possessed with a spirit of divination met us, which brought her masters much gain by soothsaying:

17 The same followed Paul and us, and cried, saying, These men are the servants of the most high God, which shew unto us the way of salvation.

cerning our salvation. Providence brings Lydia to Philippi, to be under Paul's ministry, and there, where she met with it, she made a good use of it; so should we improve opportunities.

4. Her religion before the Lord opened her heart. She worshipped God according to the knowledge she had; she was one of the devout women. But it is not enough to be worshippers of God, we must be believers in Jesus Christ, for there is no coming to God as a Father, but by him as Mediator. But those who worshipped God according to the light they had, stood fair for the discoveries of Christ and his grace to them; for to him that has, shall be given.

5. The work wrought on her heart. Observe, (1.) The Author of it, the Lord, the Lord Christ, to whom this judgment is committed; the Spirit of the Lord, who is the Sanctifier. Note, Conversion-work is God's work; it is He that works in us both to will and to do; not as if we had nothing to do; but of ourselves, without God's grace, we can do nothing; nor as if God were in the least chargeable with the ruin of them that perish; but the salvation of them that are saved must be wholly ascribed to Him. (2.) The seat of it, the heart; it is to the heart that this blessed turn is given: conversion-work is heart-work; it is a renewing of the heart, the inward man, the spirit of the mind. (3.) The nature of the work; she had not only her heart touched, but opened. An unconverted soul is shut up, fortified against Christ. Christ, in dealing with the soul, knocks at the door that is shut against Him, Rev. 3:20. and when a sinner is effectually persuaded to embrace Christ, then the heart is opened for the King of glory to come in; the understanding is opened to receive the divine light, the will, to receive the divine law, and the affections, to receive the divine love; [universal sympathy or philanthropy finds place.] When the heart is thus opened to Christ, the ear is opened to his Word, the lips in prayer, the hand in charity, and the steps enlarged in all manner of gospel-obedience.

6. The effects of this work on her heart. (1.) She took great notice of the Word of God; she attended unto, applied to herself, so some, the things spoken of Paul; and then only the Word does us good, and makes an abiding impression on us, when we apply it to ourselves: wherever the heart is opened by the grace of God, it will appear by a diligent attendance on, and attention to, the Word of God. (2.) She gave up her name to Jesus Christ, and took on her the profession of his holy religion; she was baptized, and by that solemn rite admitted to the Church of Christ; and with her her household also was baptized, those that were infants, in her right, for if the root be holy, so are the branches, and the grown up, by her influence and authority. She and her household were baptized, by the same rule that Abraham and his were circumcised, because the seal of the covenant belongs to the covenanters and their seed.* (3.) She was very kind to the ministers, and very desirous to be further instructed by them in the things pertaining to the kingdom of God; She besought us, saying, 'If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, if ye take me to be a sincere Christian, manifest your confidence in me by this, come into my house and abide there.' Thus she desired an opportunity to testify her gratitude. When her heart was open to Christ, her house was open to his ministers, for his sake. Nay, she is extremely pressing and importunate with them; she constrained us; which intimates that Paul was very backward to go, because he was afraid of being burdensome to the families of the young converts, and would study to make the Gospel of Christ without charge, 1 Cor. 9:18. Acts 20:34. that those that were without might have no occasion given them to reproach the preachers of the Gospel as designing, self-seeking men, and that those that were within might have

according to their national custom, which illustrates and confirms the words, by a river-side. "The proseuchæ of this kind, in which the sacred books were read, the Jews had outside of those towns where there were no synagogues, either from the fewness of the Jews, or because the laws, or their administrators, would not permit any (which was probably the case in Roman cities or colonies, since Juv. speaks at Rome of proseuchæ, not synagogues. Bloomf.) These proseuchæ were not always edifices (though sometimes, see Jos., they had such, and very large, so that, as Vitr. tells us, the name was occasionally applied to a synagogue. Bloomf.) but, for the most part, places in the open air, in a grove, in shrubberies, and even under a tree; though always (as we may suppose) near to some water, for the convenience of those ablutions, which (also with the Pagans, nay even, as we find from Elsner, the early Christians, Bloomf.) always preceded prayer." Kuin. Bloomf. Did the sexes, (Bloomf. suggests) in those tabernacles, booths, or groves, where it would be impracticable to separate them as in the synagogues, attend at the proseuchæ? Sat.] As was usual in teaching. Ed. Spake unto the women, &c.] "Probably this was before the time of their public worship; and while they were waiting for the assembling of the people in general." V. 16—18. This transaction demonstrates, beyond all controversy, that such pretensions are not always human impostures, but are sometimes real satanical operations. Had this damsel's divination been a mere juggle between her and her masters, the command of the apostle could not have detected it, or prevented them from carrying on the deception: nor could he at once, or indeed at all, have convinced the whole multitude, and the city in general, that it was a mere imposture, for men are no occasion to complain of the expenses of their religion: but Lydia would have no nay, she will not believe that they take her to be a sincere Christian, unless they will oblige her herein; like Abraham inviting the angels, Gen. 18:3. Those that know something of Christ, cannot but desire to know more, and seek opportunities of increasing their acquaintance with his Gospel.

V. 16—24. Paul and his companions, though for some time buried in obscurity at Philippi, yet now begin to be taken notice of.

1. A damsel that had a spirit of divination, made them to be taken notice of, by proclaiming them to be the servants of God. Observe,

1. The account given of this damsel; she was pythomissa, possessed with such a spirit of divination as that damsel was, by whom the oracles of Apollo at Delphos were delivered; she was acted by an evil spirit, that dictated ambiguous answers to those who consulted her, which served to gratify their vain desire of knowing things to come, but often deceived them. Many came to consult this witch for the discovery of robberies, the finding of things lost, and especially to be told their fortune; and none came but with the rewards in their hands, according to the quality of the person, and the importance of the ease.

2. The testimony this damsel gave to Paul and his companions; she met them in the street, as they were going to the house of prayer, or rather to the work of prayer there, v. 16. They went thither publicly, every body knew whither they were going, and what they were going to do. If what she did was likely to distract them, or hinder their work, it is observable how subtle Satan is, that great tempter, to ruffle us, and to put us out of temper then, when we need to be most composed. When she met with them, she followed them, crying, 'These men, how contemptible soever they look and are looked upon, are great men, for they are the servants of the most high God, and men that should be very welcome to us, for they show unto us the way of salvation, both the salvation that will be our happiness, and the way to it, that will be our holiness. This witness is true; it is a comprehensive encomium on the faithful preachers of the Gospel, and makes their feet beautiful, Rom. 10:15. Even the heathen had some notion of the miserable, deplorable state of mankind, and their need of salvation, and it was what they made some inquiries after. But how came this testimony from the mouth of one that had a spirit of divination? Is Satan divided against himself? We may take it either, (1.) As extorted for the honor of the Gospel by the power of God; as the devil was forced to by no means easily undeceived in matters of this nature. And if mere jugglers had been convinced, that Paul and his friends were indeed 'the servants of the true God,' and teachers of the way of salvation; they would never have ventured to address them in this manner.—But, as the woman was really instigated, and in a sense inspired, by an evil spirit, and as, in the paroxysms of her distraction, and amidst strange and wild actions and gestures, she actually uttered such things as were apparent prophecies and wonderful discoveries; such as Satan could at any time make, by his foresight, and conjectural knowledge, if God would permit him; Deut. 18:1—5. the change was manifest, when the dispossession took place.

(16.) Of divination.] 'Puthōnos: a word which probably came from the Eastern languages (perhaps the Sanscrit); but the origin and circumstances, which led to Apollo's being called Puthios, from ho Puthōn, are lost in the gray mists of antiquity. Even in Cicero's age it was as much unknown as now. Puthōn is a generic name applied to those who were formerly termed eggastromuthoi.' Bloomf., whom see. Masters.] 'Walcsh shows that this common possession of a slave was not unfrequent: and he traces the cause of this to the property itself, which often remained common to several heirs, as also to the high price of any slave from whom any great gain was to be expected.' Bloomf. Ed. A certain damsel.] 'As Plutarch tells us, that persons inspired with this spirit spake as seeming to send the voice from their bellies, and Galen mentions the same fact, some writers have supposed the whole pretence to such inspiration to have been founded on the art of throwing out the voice [ventriloquism] in some extraordinary manner, and that all the cure wrought by the apostle was only discovering the cheat, and disabling her from playing this trick any more.... But the manner in which Luke relates the story plainly implies, that he thought it a real possession, and that Paul took it himself in that view. Nor can I apprehend that her behavior, or his, or that of her masters afterwards, can be otherwise accounted for.' Doddr.—'Every circumstance of this

18 And this did she many days. But Paul, being grieved, turned and said <sup>z</sup> to the spirit, I command thee in the name of Jesus Christ, to come out of her. And <sup>a</sup> he came out the same hour.

19 ¶ And when her masters saw that the hope of their gains <sup>b</sup> was gone, they caught Paul and Silas, and drew them into the <sup>c</sup> market-place, unto <sup>d</sup> the rulers,

20 And brought them to the magistrates, saying, These men, being Jews, do exceedingly trouble <sup>e</sup> our city, 21 And teach customs which are not lawful for us to receive, neither to observe, being Romans.

22 And the multitude rose up together against them: and the magistrates rent off their clothes, and commanded to beat them.

23 And when they had laid <sup>f</sup> many stripes upon them, they cast them into prison, charging the jailer to keep them safely:

say of Christ, Mark 1:24. I know Thee who Thou art, the Holy One of God. Or, (2.) As designed by the evil spirit, that subtle serpent, to dishonor the Gospel; some think she designed to gain credit to herself and her prophecies, and so to increase her master's profit, by pretending to be in the interest of the apostles, who, she thought, had a growing reputation, or, to speak Paul fair, not to part between her and her familiar. Others think, Satan designed hereby to disgrace the apostles; as if these divines were of the same fraternity with their diviners, because they were witnessed to by them; and then the people might as well adhere to those they had been used to. Those that were most likely to receive the apostles' doctrine, were such as were prejudiced against these spirits of divination, and therefore would, by this testimony, be prejudiced against the Gospel; and as for those who regarded these diviners, the devil thought himself sure of them.

II. Christ made them to be taken notice proves it to have been a real possession. Luke speaks of the spirit and the damsel as distinct persons. The damsel had a spirit of divination. Paul turned to the spirit, and said, I command thee to come out of her; and he came out in the same hour.

V. 19-24. Had the apostle satisfactorily detected an artful impostor, they who had been convinced of the cheat, would have been enraged at those who had duped them of their money, and not at him who had undeceived them.—It does not appear, that the Jews were forbidden to exercise their religion at Philippi, or in other cities of the Roman empire, at this time; so that the accusation was altogether malicious and groundless. (20) Being Jews.] The Christians were here confounded with the unconverted Jews, as both protested against the Pagan worship. But had the worship of JEHOVAH been contrary to any Roman law, then in force, and actually carried into execution, no Jews could have remained in any of the cities where colonies were planted. It appears, that some statutes to this effect had been enacted; but doubtless it was generally found impracticable to execute them; and so they became obsolete, except when an occasion was sought of gratifying malice and cruelty by persecution.

(19, 20.) 'The rulers (archontes) are in v. 20. called stratēgoi (magistrates). The former seems to have been the general appellation given to all magistrates of the Philippians, (i. e. kritai, [judges,]) and stratēgoi, a more special definition of the persons. The senators in the municipia and coloniæ [note v. 12.], were styled decuriones. (Cic.) Now of those who discharged in them the office of chief magistrates, the name varied with the number of persons to whom that function was committed. In some it was committed to 2, in others to 4, or sometimes to 6; hence called either duumviri, quatuorviri, or seviri. So Sigonius. Stratēgos properly signifies a commander of troops. But as stratos was also used of the great body of the people (see Soph. and Spanh.), so stratēgos was modified, and thus the word came to denote a civil magistrate. Even among the Romans there were prætors, both military and civil, which latter used to hear and decide causes. Now these, by the Romans styled prætores urbani, were by the Greeks styled stratēgoi. So Diod. uses the word. This title of Prætor, the municipal and colonial duumviri used especially to take to themselves, (perhaps first given by courtesy, Bl.) since the coloniæ and municipia used studiously to imiof, by giving them power to cast the devil out. She continued many days clamoring thus, v. 18. and, it should seem, Paul took no notice of her, not knowing but it might be ordered of God for the service of his cause; but, finding perhaps that it did them a prejudice, rather than any service, he soon silenced her, by casting the devil out.

1. He was grieved, to see her made an instrument of Satan, to deceive people, and to see the people imposed on by her divinations. It disturbed him to hear a sacred truth so profaned, and good words come out of such an ill mouth, with such an ill design. Perhaps she spoke in an ironical, bantering way, as ridiculing the apostles' pretensions; as when Christ's persecutors complimented Him with Hail, King of the Jews; and then justly might Paul be grieved, as any good man's heart would be, to hear any good truth of God bawled out in the streets, in a canting, jeering way.

2. He commanded the evil spirit to come out of her; and by this he will show that those men are the servants of the living God, and are able to prove themselves so, without her testimony; her silence shall demonstrate it, more than her speaking could. Thus Paul shows the way of salvation indeed, that it is by breaking the power of Satan, and chaining him up, that he may not deceive the world, Rev. 20:3. and that this salvation is to be obtained in the name of Jesus Christ only, as in his name the devil was now cast out, and by no other; for he came out the same hour.

III. The masters of the damsel, made them to be noticed, by bringing them before the magistrates for it, as a crime. Observe here,

1. What provoked them, was, that, the damsel being restored to herself, her masters saw that the hope of their gain was gone, v. 19. See here what evil the love of money is the root of! If the preaching of the Gospel ruin the craft of the silver-smiths, ch. 19:24. much more the craft of the soothsayers; therefore here is a mighty outcry raised, when Satan's power to deceive is broken; and therefore the priests hated the Gospel, because it turned men from the blind service of dumb idols, and so the hope of their gains was gone. The power and goodness of Christ, which appeared in dispossessing the woman, made no impression, when they apprehended they should lose money by it.

2. The course they took, was, to incense the higher powers against them, as men fit to be punished. They caught them as they went along, and with the utmost fury and violence dragged them into the market-place, where public justice was administered. They brought them to the rulers, their justices of peace, to do by them as men taken into the hands of the law, the duumviri. From them they hurried them to the magistrates, the prætors or governors of the city,—the officers of the army, so the word signifies; but it is taken in general for the judges, or chief rulers; to them they brought their complaint.

3. They take it for granted they were Jews, a nation, at this time, as much an abomination to the Romans, as, long ago, to the Egyptians. Piteous was the case of the apostles, when it was turned to their reproach that they were Jews, and yet the Jews were their most violent persecutors! (1.) The general charge against them, is, that they troubled the city, sowed discord, and disturbed the public peace, than which nothing could be more false and unjust, as was Ahab's character of Elijah, 1 K. 18:17. If they troubled the city, it was but like the angel's troubling the water of Bethesda's pool, in order to healing; shaking, in order to a happy settlement. (2.) Their proof of their charge, is, their teaching customs not proper to be admitted by a Roman colony, v. 21. The Romans were always very jealous of innovations in religion; right or wrong, they would adhere to that, how vain soever, which they had received by tradition from their fathers; the gods of their country must be their gods, true or false. It was one of the laws of the twelve tables. Hath a nation changed their gods? This incensed them against the apostles, that they taught a religion, destructive of polytheism and idolatry, and preached to them to turn from those vanities. This the Romans could not bear; 'If this grow on us, in a little while we shall lose our religion.'

IV. The magistrates, by their proceedings against them, made them to be taken notice of.

1. By countenancing the persecution, they raised the mob upon them, v. 22. The multitude rose up together against them, and were ready to pull them to pieces. It has been the artifice of Satan, to make God's ministers and people odious, by representing them as dangerous, when really there has been no ground for such an imputation.

2. By going on to an execution, they further represented them as the vilest of malefactors. They rent off their clothes, with rage and fury, not having patience till they were taken off, in order to their being scourged.

tate the form of the Roman republic. So Cic. Hence these Duumviri were, in Gr., called stratēgoi, and to the class of such Duumvirs belonged those whom Luke has here called stratēgoi. See Spanh., Heinsius, Krebs, Walch, and Munthe. Kuin. 'West. remarks, that the appellation still subsists at Messina, where the mayor of the city is called the Stradigo.'

(20.) 'As the laws made no provision to repair their loss, the girl's employers cunningly drop any seeming personal object, and pretend the public good. Kuin. remarks, that it was not allowed among the Romans, to worship any god, or recommend the worship of any, but such as were ordained by public authority, (so Serv., Jul. Paulus, Suet., Val. Max., Livy): and though, indeed, (as Walch observes,) they permitted foreigners to worship their own gods in the city, yet it was only to be done in private, secretly, and, as it were, by stealth, and in such a manner as should not interfere with, or be any hindrance to, the rites of the established religion, or give any occasion to civil dissensions. "It was, therefore, not lawful (continues he) among the Romans, to recommend a new religion to the citizens, or even attempt to detach them from that which had been established by public authority. Now, taking all these things into due consideration, together with the hatred of the Romans towards the Jews and their religion, and bearing in mind that it was the primary duty of the provincial, colonial, and municipal magistrates to punish severely all seditious persons, or those who in any way stirred up the minds of the people, and to extinguish, by whatever means, rising sedition or tumult, we shall easily see the reason why the accusers resort to the charge of turbulence and sedition, and why they add the circumstance, 'being Jews,' which suggests an aggravation of the offence, as having been committed by those who were bound to show a very different conduct. Moreover, we shall see why they insinuate, v. 21. an attempt to proselyte Romans, who were not to admit any foreign religion. They craftily, too, omit all mention of their loss, lest their impartiality might be suspected, and their accusation be ascribed to malice." Walch.'

(22.) Rent.] 'The Roman magistrates used to order the lictors to rend open the clothes of the criminal. No care was taken of the garments: but they were suddenly and violently rent open.' Burder Note, end of chapter.

24 Who having received such a charge, thrust them into the inner prison, and made their feet fast in the stocks.

25 ¶ And at midnight Paul and Silas <sup>g</sup> prayed, and <sup>h</sup> sang praises unto God: and the prisoners heard them.

26 And suddenly there was a great earthquake, so <sup>i</sup> that the foundations of the prison were shaken: and immediately <sup>j</sup> all the doors were opened, and every one's bands were loosed.

27 And the keeper of the prison awaking out of his sleep, and seeing the prison doors open, he drew out his sword, and would have killed himself, supposing that the prisoners had been fled.

29 Then he called for a light, and sprang in, and came <sup>m</sup> trembling, and fell down before Paul and Silas:

This the apostle refers to, when he speaks of their being shamefully entreated at Philippi, 1 Thess. 2:2. They commanded that they should be whipped as vagabonds, by the lictors or beakles who attended the prætors, and carried rods with them for that purpose; this was one of those three times that Paul was beaten with rods, according to the Roman usage, which was not under the compassionate limitation of the number of stripes not to exceed forty, which was provided by the Jewish law. It is here said, that they laid many stripes on them, v. 23. without counting how many, because they seemed vile unto them, Deut. 25:3.

Now, one would think, this might have satiated their cruelty; but no, they are imprisoned, and, it is probable, their present purpose was to try them for their lives, and put them to death; else why should there be such care taken to prevent their escape? The judges made their commitment very strict; as if they were dangerous men. Thus they endeavored to render them odious, that they might justify their base usage. The jailer was sensible that the magistrates had a great indignation against these men, and were inclined to be severe with them, therefore he thought to ingratiate himself with them, by exerting his power likewise against them to the uttermost. When magistrates are cruel, it is no wonder that the officers under them are so too. He put them into the inner prison, the dungeon, and, as if that were not enough, he made their feet fast in the stocks. Perhaps, having heard a report of the escape of the preachers of the Gospel out of prison, (24.) Made their feet fast in the stocks. It is generally supposed that these were the cippi, or large pieces of wood, used among the Romans, which not only loaded the legs of the prisoners, but sometimes distended them in a very painful manner. . . . Beza explains it of the numella, in which both the feet and the neck were fastened in the most uneasy posture that can be well imagined. The distressing situation of Paul and Silas, thus in the stocks, [in a damp, muddy pit,] and so lately scourged, renders their joyful frame, expressed by songs of praise, so much the more remarkable.

V. 27. 'Self-murder prevailed much among the Romans, especially about that time, and had, in the memory of some then living, been, as it were, dignified at Philippi by the example of those great men, Brutus and Cassius, among others, who fell on their own swords there.'

V. 28, 29. Paul cried, &c. As they were all in the dark, it is not easy to say, how Paul knew of the jailer's purpose, unless it were by hearing some desperate words that declared it, or by some immediate suggestion from God, which, amidst such a scene of wonders, is by no means incredible.

V. 29—34. By being 'saved,' the jailer doubtless meant deliverance from present death, and from future condemnation.—This faith implied [92] when the doors were fast barred, ch. 5:19. 12:9. he thought he would be wiser than other jailers had been, and therefore would effectually secure them by fastening them in the stocks; and they were not the first of God's messengers thus served, Jer. 20:2. Ps. 105:18. Oh what hard usage have God's servants met with, as in the former days, so in the latter times!*

V. 25—34. We have here the designs of the persecutors of Paul and Silas baffled and broken.

I. The persecutors designed to dishearten and discourage the preachers of the Gospel; but here,

1. Never were poor prisoners so truly cheerful, nor so far from laying their hard usage to heart. They had felt the smart of the prætors' rods, were very sore, and they had reason to fear the axes next, as their Master, first scourged, then crucified. In the mean time they were in the inner prison, their feet in the stocks, which, some think, not only held them, but hurt them; and yet, at midnight, when they should have been trying, if possible, to get a little rest, they prayed, and sang praises to God. No place, no time, amiss for prayer, if the heart be lifted up to God. No trouble, how grievous soever, should indispose, but rather dispose us for prayer; and in everything we must give thanks. We never want matter for praise, if we do not want a heart. And what should put the heart of a child of God out of tune for that duty, if a dungeon and a pair of stocks will not do it? They praised God that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name. They sang praises to Him, in some psalm, or hymn, or spiritual song; either one of David's, or one of their own, as the Spirit gave them utterance. This proves that singing of psalms is a gospel-ordinance, and ought to be used by all good Christians; and that it is instituted, not only to express their joys in a day of triumph, but to balance and relieve their sorrows in a day of trouble. Notice is taken of one circumstance, that the prisoners heard them. It intimates, how hearty they were in singing praises to God, in that they were heard all the prison over. We should sing psalms with all our heart. The saints are called upon to sing aloud upon their beds, Ps. 149:5. They knew the prisoners would hear them, yet they sang aloud, as not ashamed of their Master or of his service. The prisoners were made to hear the prison-songs of Paul and Silas, that they might be prepared for the miraculous favor showed to them, all for the sake of Paul and Silas, when the prison-doors were thrown open. By this extraordinary comfort which they were filled with, it was published, that He whom they preached was the Consolation of Israel. Let the prisoners that mean to oppose Him, hear and tremble before Him; let those that are faithful to Him, hear and triumph, and take of the comfort that is spoken to the prisoners of hope, Zeel. 9:12.

II. The persecutors designed to stop the progress of the Gospel, but here we find, in the prison, trophies of the Gospel's victories, and the jailer, their own servant, become a servant of Christ. Probably, some of the prisoners, if not all, were converted; see Job 36:8, 9, 10. Ps. 107:14, 15. But only the conversion of the jailer is recorded.

1. He is afraid for his life, and Paul makes him easy as to that care, v. 27, 28. He awoke; this signified the awakening of his conscience out of its spiritual slumber, Eph. 5:14. Jonah 1:6. Seeing the prison-doors open, he supposed the prisoners were fled; and then what would become of him? He knew the Roman law in that case, as executed not long ago on the keepers out of whose hands Peter escaped, ch. 12:19. It was according to that of the prophet, 1 K. 20:39, 42. The Roman lawyers, after this, in their readings on the law, Of the custody of criminals, take care to except an escape by miracle. In his fright, he was going to kill himself, to prevent a more terrible death, an expected, pompous, ignominious death, which he knew he was liable to for letting his prisoners escape; and the extraordinary strict charge the magistrates gave him concerning Paul and Silas, made him conclude they would be very severe on him if they were gone. The philosophers generally allowed self-murder, as the last remedy those in distress may have recourse to. The Stoics, notwithstanding their pretended conquest of the passions, yielded thus far to them. And the Epicureans, who indulged the pleasures of sense, to avoid its pains

2. God heartened them wonderfully by his signal appearances for them, v. 26. (1.) There was immediately a great earthquake, such a violent shock, that the very foundations of the prison were shaken. While the prisoners were hearkening to Paul and Silas, and perhaps making a jest of them, this earthquake would strike a terror on them, and convince them that those men were the favorites of heaven, and such as God owned. We had the house of prayer shaken, in answer to prayer, and as a token of God's acceptance of it, ch. 4:31. Here the prison shaken. The Lord was in these earthquakes, to show his resentment of the indignities done to his servants, to testify to those whose confidence is in the earth, the weakness and instability of that which they confide in, and to teach his people, that though the earth be moved, yet they need not fear. (2.) The prison-doors were thrown open, and the prisoners' fetters knocked off, every man's bands were loosed. Perhaps the prisoners, when they heard Paul and Silas pray, and sing psalms, admired them, and spake honorably of them; and to recompense them for, and confirm them in, their good opinion of them, they share in the miracle, and have their bands loosed. God hereby signified to these prisoners, as Grotius observes, that the apostles, in preaching the Gospel, were public blessings to mankind, as they proclaimed liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison-doors to them that were bound, Is. 61:1.

T.; for it has already been shown, that the covenant sealed to Abraham, was the same as the Christian covenant; and that circumcision was the sign of the same blessings of which baptism now is. Gen. 17:9—12. And the language, concerning the baptism of believers and their households, so much accords to that concerning the circumcision of Abraham and his household; that, in connexion with other scriptures; with the general and early use of infant-baptism in the primitive church; and with the consideration that we do not read in the N. chose rather to put an end to it. This jailer thought there was no harm in anticipating his own death; but Christianity by this proves itself to be of God, that it keeps us to the law of our creation,—revives, enforces, and establishes that; obliges us to be just to our own lives, and teaches us cheerfully to resign them to our graces, but courageously to hold them out against our corruptions. Paul eagerly stopped him from his proceeding against himself, v. 28. All the cautions of the Word of God against sin, and all appearances of it, and approaches to it, have this tendency, 'Do thyself no harm.' The jailer needs not fear being called to an account for the escape of his prisoners, for they are all here. It was strange some of them did not slip away, when the prison-doors were opened, and they were loosed from their bands; but their amazement held them fast, and, being sensible it was by the prayers of Paul and Silas they were loosed, they would not stir, unless they stirred; and God showed his power in hindering their spirits, as much as in loosing their feet.

2. He is afraid he shall lose his soul, and Paul makes him easy as to that care too. One concern leads him to the other, and a much greater; and being hindered from hastening himself out of this world, he begins to think, if he had pursued his intention, whether death would have brought him, and what would have become of him on the other side death,—a very proper thought dren of Christian parents were baptized adult; it must be allowed strongly to countenance the sentiments and practice of pædo-baptists; though we suppose, that the change of the initiatory ordinance, as far as infants were concerned, was silently and gradually; like that respecting the Sabbath; the Jewish converts still circumcising their male children, to avoid giving needless offence to the unconverted Jews. 1:3.—It seems also most probable, to me, at least, that Paul and Silas, in their painful condition, and in the jailer's house, did not baptize him and his family by immersion.—(34) Rejoiced, believing in God with all his house. 'He rejoiced through all his house, having believed in God.' The participle in Greek, rendered having believed, is in the singular number, it denoting the jailer alone.

(30.) What must, &c. 'Grotius thinks this inquiry went on the natural principles of the immortality of the soul; Whitby, with much greater propriety, that it refers to the testimony of the Pythoness, v. 17. I apprehend the sense to be very extensive. Probably a vast multitude of ideas rushed on his mind at once; the power and displeasure of God, manifested in the earthquake, the sweetness and joy of Paul and Silas in their bonds, their willing continuance in prison, when they might have escaped, and their generous solicitude for one who had used them so ill,—perhaps some kind, pious words, Paul and Silas might have uttered when he was fastening their feet in the stocks; and no doubt the Spirit of God added conviction and energy to all.' Doddr.—'The only interpretation of the jailer's cry, (as Kuin. and Heinr. acknowledge,) at all agreeable to the context, is the common one, "how shall I attain eternal salvation?" for he would not fear punishment, for the effects of the earthquake; besides, the prisoners were all there; nor of his gods, for confining innocent persons, for that was the magistrate's act. I am surpris'd any competent judge of phraseology should have thought his words of uncertain sense.'

(31.) Thou shalt be saved and thine house. 'The meaning cannot be, that the eternal salvation of his family could be secured by his faith, but that his believing in Christ would be the best security of his family from present danger, and that, if they also themselves believed, they would be entitled to the same spiritual and everlasting blessings with himself.'

(33.) Washed their stripes, which still remained unhealed. I mention the circumstance, as it serves to show, (and it is of great importance for such as have been snatched as a brand out of the fire, when there was but a step between them and death. Perhaps, the heinousness of the sin he was running into, helped to alarm him. The Spirit of God, that was sent to convince, in order to his being a Comforter, struck a terror on him, and startled him; but he called for a light, with all speed, and sprang in to the inner prison, and came trembling to Paul and Silas for relief. Observe,

(1.) How reverent and respectful his address to them is; he fell down before them, as one ready to sink under the load of his terror; as one that had on his spirit an awe of them, of the image of God on them, and of their commission from God. Probably he had heard what the damsel said of them, that they were the servants of the living God, which showed to them the way of salvation, and as such he thus expressed his veneration for them. He gave them a title of respect, Sirs, masters; it was but now, Rogues and villains, and he was their master; but now, Sirs, lords, and they are his masters. Converting grace changes people's language, of and to good people and good ministers; and to persons who are thoroughly convinced of sin, the very feet of those are beautiful, that bring tidings of Christ; yea, though disgracefully fastened in the stocks.

(2.) How serious his inquiry is; What must I do to be saved? His salvation is now his greatest concern, which before was the furthest thing from his thoughts. It is his own precious soul that he is in care about; convinced something must be done, and by him, too, in order to his salvation; that it is not a thing of course, a thing that will do itself, but a thing about which we must strive, wrestle, and take pains. He is willing to do anything. Those who are thoroughly convinced of sin, and truly concerned about their salvation, will surrender at discretion to Jesus Christ, will be glad to have Christ on his own terms, on any terms. God has appointed his ministers to assist us in consulting the Scriptures, and has promised to give his Holy Spirit to them that ask Him, to be their Guide in the way of salvation.

(3.) They very readily directed him what he must do, v. 31. They were always ready to answer such inquiries; though cold, sore, and sleepy, they do not adjourn to a more convenient time and place, but take him now, lest the conviction should wear off; now that God begins to work, it is time for them to set in as workers together with God. They do not upbraid him with his rude and ill carriage toward them; all this is forgiven and forgotten, and they are as glad to show him the way to heaven, as the best friend they have. They did not triumph over him. No, all is overlooked and easily passed by, if he will but believe in Christ. This is an example to ministers, to encourage penitents, to meet those that are coming to Christ, and take them by the hand; not to be hard on any for unkindness done to them; but to seek Christ's honor more than their own. Here is the sum of the whole Gospel, the covenant of grace in a few words; Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house, Luke 19:9. Those of thy house that are infants, shall be admitted into the visible church with thee, and thereby put into a fair way for salvation; those that are grown up, shall have the means of salvation brought to them, and, be they ever so many, let them believe in Jesus Christ, and they shall be saved; they are all welcome to Christ on the same terms.'

(4.) They proceeded to instruct him and his family in the doctrine of Christ, v. 32. They spake unto him the Word of the Lord. He was, for aught that appears, an utter stranger to Christ, therefore it is requisite he should be told who this Jesus is, that he may believe in Him, John 9:36. And the substance of the matter lying in a little compass, they soon told him enough to make his being baptized a reasonable service. They spake the Word not only to him, but to all that were in his house. Masters of families should take care that all under their charge partake of the means of knowledge and grace, and that the Word of the Lord be spoken to them; for the souls of the poorest servants are as precious as those of the masters, and are bought with the same price.

(5.) The jailer and his family were immediately baptized, and thereby took on them the profession of Christianity, submitted to its laws, and were admitted to its privileges, on their declaring solemnly, as the eunuch did, that they believed that Jesus Christ is the Son of God; he was baptized, he, and all his, straightway. Neither he nor any of his family desired time to consider whether they should come into baptismal bonds or no; nor did Paul and Silas desire time to try their sincerity, and to consider whether they should baptize them or no. But the spirit of grace worked such a strong to remember it,) that the apostles had not a power of working miraculous cures when they pleased; no, not even on their own bodies, or those of their dearest friends. Had they possessed such a power, it would have been their duty to use it, unless they had, (as Christ with such a power in fact had,) a discovery of the divine will, that in such or such instances the use of it should be waived. On the other hand, the continual use of such a power would have frustrated many of the noble purposes in providence, which their sufferings answered, and would have introduced many inconveniences, which an intelligent reader will easily apprehend from this general hint. Doddr.—And was baptized, &c. 'His being thus baptized with his household seems to be the only reason which the Greek commentators had to think this jailer's name was Stephanus, and that he is the person referred to, 1 Cor. 1:16. 16:15, 17. But it is much more probable that Stephanus was a Corinthian, from all the places here cited.' Id.—Baptized straightway. 'Immediately, instantly, at the very time, while the thing was doing; and if so, it is by no means likely there was any immersion in the case; indeed all the circumstances of the case, the dead of the night, the general agitation, the necessity of despatch, and the words of the text disprove it. The apostles, therefore, had another method of administering baptism besides immersion. . . . Moreover, as the Jews were accustomed to receive whole families of heathens, young and old, as proselytes, by baptism: so here the apostles receive whole families, those of Lydia and the jailer, by the same rite. It is, therefore, pretty evident, that we have in this chap. very presumptive proofs, 1. That baptism was administered without immersion, as in the case of the jailer and his family; and, 2. That children were also received into the church in this way; for we can scarcely suppose that the whole families of Lydia and the jailer had no children in them; and if they had, it is not likely that they should be omitted; for the Jewish method was invariably to receive the heathen children with their proselyted parents.' Dr. A. C.—Grotius supposes, from the peculiar phraseology, that 'the jailer took them to a bath within the precincts of the prison, and bathed them. Certainly if the distinction laid down by Campb. were invariably true, that nuptō always signifies to dip, and louō always to bathe, there could be no doubt as to this interpretation [of elouscn here], which after all may be the true one. Most commentators, however, with the Vulg., tr. "washed." Same. At that very hour, unseasonable as it was.'

35 ¶ And when it was day, the magistrates sent the serjeants, saying, Let those men go.

36 And the keeper of the prison told this saying, to Paul, The magistrates have sent to let you go: now therefore depart, and go in peace.

37 But Paul said unto them, They have beaten us openly uncondemned, being Romans, and have cast us into prison; and now do they thrust us out privily? Nay, verily; but let them come themselves, and fetch us out.

38 And the serjeants told these words unto the magistrates: and they feared, when they heard that they were Romans.

39 And they came and besought them, and brought them out, and desired them to depart out of the city.

faith in them, all on a sudden, as superseded further debate; and Paul and Silas knew by the Spirit, that it was a work of God that was wrought in them: so that there was no occasion for demur. This, therefore, will not justify such precipitation in ordinary cases.

(6.) The jailer was hereupon very respectful to Paul and Silas, as one that knew not how to make amends for the injury he had done to them, much less for the kindness he had received from them; he took them the same hour of the night, would not let them lie a minute longer in the innerprison; but washed their stripes, to cool them, and abate the smart of them; probably he bathed them with some healing liquor; as the good Samaritan helped the wounded man, by pouring in oil and wine. He brought them into his house, bid them welcome to the best room he had, and prepared his best bed for them. He set meat before them, such as his house would afford, and they were welcome to it; by which he expressed the welcome which his soul gave to the Gospel. What have we houses and tables for, but, as we have opportunity, to serve God and his people with them?

(7.) The voice of rejoicing, with that of salvation, was heard in the jailer's house; never was such a truly merry night kept there before; he rejoiced, believing in God, with all his house: none in his house refused to be baptized, and so make a jar in the harmony; but they were unanimous in embracing the Gospel, which added much to the joy. Observe, His believing in Christ is called believing in God; which intimates, that Christ is God. Believing in Christ is rejoicing in Christ. Out of the abundance of the joy in his heart, his mouth spake to the glory of God, and their encouragement who believed in God too. One cheerful Christian should make many.

V. 35—40. I. Orders are sent for the discharge of Paul and Silas, v. 35, 36.

1. The magistrates that had so basely abused them the day before, gave the orders early, as soon as it was day, which intimates, that either they were sensible the earthquake was intended to plead the cause of their prisoners, or their consciences had made them very uneasy. [Two ancient MSS. add, they were terrified by it.] They sent serjeants, those that had the rods, the vergers, the tipstaves, the beadles, those that had been employed in beating them, that they might go and ask them forgiveness. The order was, Let those men go. God turned their hearts, Ps. 76:10.

2. The jailer brought them the news, v. 36. Some think the jailer had betimes transmitted an account to the magistrates of what had passed in his house that night, and so had obtained this order. God could, by his grace, as easily have converted the magistrates, as the jailer; but God hath chosen the poor of this world, James 2:5.

II. Paul's insisting on the breach of privilege the magistrates had been guilty of, v. 37. It is probable the magistrates had some intimation they were Romans, and were made sensible their fury had carried them farther than the law could bear them out; and that was the reason they ordered their discharge. Now.

I. Paul did not plead this before he was beaten, though it is probable it might have prevented it, lest he should seem to be afraid of suffering for the truth which he had preached. Tully tells of one Ganius, who was ordered by Verres to be beaten in Sicily, that all the while he was under the lash he cried out nothing, but I am a citizen of Rome; Paul had nobler things to comfort himself with.

2. He did plead it afterward, to honor his sufferings, and the cause he suffered for; likewise to mollify the magistrates toward the Christians at Philippi, and to beget in the people a better opinion of the Christian religion, when they saw that Paul had a fair advantage against their magistrates, and might have called them to an account for what they had done, and yet did not; which was very much to the honor of that worthy name by which he was called. Now here,

(1.) Paul lets them know how many ways they had run themselves into a præmunire, and that he had law enough to know it. [1.] They had beaten them that were Romans; some think, Silas was a Roman citizen as well as Paul; others, that that does not necessarily follow. Paul was a citizen, and Silas his companion. Now both the lex Porcia and the lex Sempronia did expressly forbid the free body of a Roman citizen to be beaten with rods or otherwise. Roman historians give instances of cities that had their charters taken from them for indignities done to Roman citizens; we shall afterward find Paul making use of this plea, ch. 22:25, 26. To tell them they had beaten the messengers of Christ, and the favorites of heaven, would have had no influence on them; but to tell them they have abused Roman citizens, will put them into a fright; so common is it for people to be more afraid of Cesar's wrath than of Christ's, though He has warned us of the danger of offending his little ones. [2.] They had beaten them uncondemned, without a fair hearing, had not calmly examined what was said against them, much less inquired what they had to say for themselves. It is a universal rule of justice, Many may be acquitted in consequence of having had a hearing; while without a hearing no one can be condemned. Christ's servants would not have been abused as they have been, if they and their cause might but have had an impartial trial. [3.] It was an aggravation of this, that they had done it openly, which, as it was so much the greater disgrace to the sufferers, so it was the bolder defiance to justice and the law. [4.] They had cast them into prison, without showing any cause of their commitment, and in an arbitrary manner, by a verbal order. [5.] They now thrust them out privily; they had not, indeed, the impudence to stand by what they had done, but yet had not the honesty to own themselves in a fault.

(2.) He insists on it, that they should make them an acknowledgment of their error, and give them a public discharge, to make that the more honorable, as they had done them a public disgrace, which made that the more disgraceful; 'Let them come themselves and fetch us out, and give a testimony to our innocency, and that we have done nothing worthy of stripes or of bonds.' It was not a point of honor that Paul stood thus stiffly upon, but a point of justice, and not to himself, so much as to his cause; 'Let them come and stop the clamors of the people, by confessing that we are not the troublers of the city.'

III. The magistrates' submission, and reversing of their judgment, v. 38, 39.

1. The magistrates were frightened, when they were told that Paul was a Roman; lest some of his friends should inform the government of what they had done, and they should fare the worse for it. The proceedings of persecutors have often been illegal, even by the law of nations, and often inhuman, against the law of nature, but always sinful, and against God's law. 2. They came, and besought them not to take the advantage of the law against them, but to overlook the illegality of what they had done, and say no more of it; they brought them out of the prison, owning they were wrongfully put into it, and desired they would peaceably and quietly depart out of the city, as Pharaoh and his servants to Moses, Ex. 11:8. God can make the enemies of his people ashamed of their envy and enmity to them, Is. 26:11. Jerusalem is sometimes made a burdensome stone to them that heave at it, which they would gladly get clear of, Zech. 12:3. Yet if the repentance of these magistrates had been sincere, they would have desired them not to depart, but to stay and continue in their city, to show them the way of salvation. But many are convinced Christianity is not to be persecuted, who yet are not convinced it ought to be embraced, or at least are not persuaded to embrace it. They are compelled to honor Christ and his servants, to worship before their feet, and to know that He has loved them, Rev. 3:9. and yet do not go so far as to have benefit by Christ, or to come in for a share in his love.

IV. The departure of Paul and Silas, v. 40. They left the prison when legally discharged, and not till then, though illegally committed, and then, 1. They took leave of their friends; they went to the house of Lydia, where, probably, the disciples had met to pray for them, and there they saw the brethren, or visited them at their respective habitations; (which was soon done, they were so few;) and they comforted them, by telling them (saith an ancient Greek commentary) what God had done for them, and how he had owned them in the prison, &c. 2. They quitted the town. I wonder they should do so; for, after such an honorable discharge, surely they might have gone on at least for some time in their work without danger; but I suppose they went away on their Master's principle, Mark 1:38. Paul

V. 37. 'It was strictly forbidden by the Roman law (indeed by the common law of all nations) for any citizen to be punished or condemned unheard. Cic. Tacit. See Grot., Wetst.' Bloomf. Being Romans.] Note, end of ch. It appears from this that Silas was also a Roman citizen, how does not appear. See Bl. 'It was only afterwards that prisoners were put in public prisons before confession or conviction; prisoners were held in custodia liberâ, either by the magistrate, in his private house, or others, to whom he committed them.' Prisoners, at least in the E., were quite at the mercy of their keeper, who was only bound to produce them when called for.

and Silas had an extraordinary call to Philippi; and yet when come thither, they see little of the fruit of their labors, and are soon driven thence; yet they did not come in vain, though the beginnings here were small, the latter end greatly increased; now they laid the foundation of a church at Philippi, which became very eminent, more generous to Paul than any other, as appears from Phil., ch. 1:1. 4:15. Let not ministers be discouraged, though they see not the fruit of their labors presently; the seed sown seems to be lost under the clouds, but it shall come up again in a plentiful harvest in due time.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1—9. I. Here is Paul's coming to Thessalonica, the chief city of this country, called at this day Saloneeh, in the Turkish dominions. The opposition and persecution he met with, made him the more resolute. He did but pass through PRACT. OBS. 'The wisdom that is from above' is peculiarly requisite, that we may know when, and how far, we may bear with men's prejudices, in order to their edification; and when we must resolutely protest against them.—The greatest precaution should be used, that the ministers of Christ be men of good report: lest prejudices against individuals should be added to the carnal enmity of the human heart against the Gospel, to prevent their success; and that such as 'are of the contrary part, may have no evil thing to say of them.' Scriptural regulations, therefore, in this and similar concerns, tend exceedingly to the establishment of believers in the faith, and to the increase of the church in numbers. (1 Tim. 3:7. Tit. 2:7, 8.)—We have no ground to expect to be directed by immediate revelation, in the various actions of our lives; but, while we act according to the best of our judgment, in obedience to the Word, and dependence on the Spirit of God; we shall find circumstances, apparently casual, operate as prohibitions and directions, subverting our plans, and substituting others in their stead.—When we are, by any means, satisfied of the Lord's will respecting us; we should prepare for obedience, to whatever hardship, labor, and peril it may expose us: and those who go in simplicity, faithfulness, and affection, to preach the Gospel among ignorant or careless sinners, do the most for their help and benefit that man can do: though it seldom happens, that persons of this character are forward to invite them. The deplorable condition, however, of our fellow-creatures, in very many parts of the world, and even their insensibility to their own danger and misery, ought to stimulate our exertions, to carry or send them effectual help; and to rid, by our labors, contributions, and prayers, every scriptural attempt for that purpose. [Happily, at length, this subject receives and rewards attention, in several cities.] Satan, the father of lies, can declare the most important truths, when it subserves his purpose of deception and murder: and, if he were permitted, he could do more mischief by ingeniously connecting the doctrines of the Gospel with pernicious errors and im-

Amphipolis and Apollonia, the former a city near Philippi, the latter near Thessalonica; doubtless, he was under divine direction what places to pass through, and what to rest in. Apollonia was a city of Illyricum, which, some think, illustrates that of Paul, that he had preached the Gospel from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, Rom. 15:9. i. e. to the borders of Illyricum, where he now was: and we may suppose, though he be said only to pass through these cities, yet that he staid so long in them as to publish the Gospel there, and to prepare the way for the entrance of other ministers whom he would afterward send.

II. His preaching to the Jews first, in their synagogue, v. 1. which intimates, that one reason why he passed through those other cities mentioned, and did not continue long in them, was, because there were no synagogues in them; finding one in Thessalonica, by it he made his entry. It was always his manner to begin with the Jews, and not to turn to the Gentiles till they had refused it, that their mouths might be stopped from clamoring against him because he preached to the Gentiles; for if they received the Gospel, they would cheerfully embrace the new converts; if they refused it, they might thank themselves if the apostles carried it to those that would bid it welcome. I. He met them in their synagogue on the sabbath-day; thus he would respect both their place and their time of meeting. Sabbaths and solemn assemblies are always very precious to those to whom Christ is precious, Ps. 84:10. It is good being in the house of the Lord on his day. 2. He reasoned with them out of the Scriptures. They agreed with him so far as to receive the scriptures of the O. T.; but, therefore, thought they had reason to reject Christ; Paul received the Scripture, and, therefore, saw great reason to embrace Christ. It was requisite, then, in order to their conviction, that he should, by reasoning with them, the Spirit setting in with him, convince them that his inferences from Scripture were right, and their's wrong. The preaching of the Gospel should be both scriptural and rational; such Paul's was, for he reasoned out of the Scriptures. Reason must not be set up in competition with the Scripture, but it must be made use of in explaining and applying the Scripture. 3. He continued to do this three sabbath-days successively; for precept must be upon precept, and line upon line. All the laborers come not into the vineyard at the first hour, nor at the first call; nor are wrought on so suddenly as the jailer. 4. The drift and scope of his preaching and arguing was, to prove that Jesus is the Christ, v. 3. Paul had an admirable method of discourse; and showed he was himself both well apprized of the doctrine he preached, and thoroughly understood it, and that he was fully assured of the truth of it; therefore, he opened it like one that knew it, and alleged it like one that believed it. He showed them, moral practices, than by any species of superstition, persecution, and infidelity. Much he actually effects in this way, by means of antinomian, enthusiastical, and scandalous preachers; who, being confounded with the real servants of Christ, bring them also into contempt and abhorrence, with thousands, nay millions of superficial observers. But we must strenuously disclaim such coalitions: and commendations, from bad and suspicious characters, should more excite our grief and indignation, than all their calumnies and reproaches.—Too often indeed the laws of the state interfere with those of God, and the customs of the world contradict the wisdom and holiness of his service; yet, interested opposers frequently make these things a mere pretence for persecution, while they are actuated by avarice, ambition, or revenge alone. The vilest of malefactors may, therefore, expect more favorable treatment than zealous ministers, who will not let sinners go on unmolested in their ways of destruction. But the servants of Christ should suffer persecution peaceably, and forgive injuries readily: yet there may be cases, in which it will be proper for them to claim the protection of the laws, and to protest against the flagrant injustice of oppressive magistrates: especially when they violate the laws of their country which they are commissioned to execute, in vehement zeal against the objects of their contempt and aversion. This (which is far different from resisting the execution of the law itself, when deemed unreasonable,) may conduce to public justice, the peace of the church and of the community, and the credit of their profession. But when proper concessions are made by those who have acted illegally, Christians should never express personal resentment, or insist strictly on reparation; but manifest a disinterested public spirit in everything. Thus their enemies will be ashamed, silenced, or conciliated; the Lord will make them 'more than conquerors' in every conflict; and, instead of being cast down by their sufferings, they shall even become the comforters of their brethren, who have been exempted from so large a share of tribulation. SCOTT.

(1.) That it was necessary the Messiah should suffer, and die, and rise again; the O. T. prophecies made it necessary. The great objection the Jews made against Jesus being the Messiah, was, his ignominious death and sufferings; the cross was to them a stumbling-block, by no means agreed with their idea of the Messiah; but Paul here alleges, and makes it out undeniably, not only that it was possible He might be the Messiah, though He suffered, but that, being the Messiah, it was necessary He should suffer; He could not be made perfect but by sufferings; for if He had not died, He could not have risen again from the dead. This was what Christ Himself insisted on, Luke 24:26. and again, v. 46. He must needs have suffered for us, because He could not otherwise purchase our redemption for us; and He must needs have risen again, because He could not otherwise apply the redemption to us.

V. 40. Departed. They wisely complied with the request of the magistrates, that they might not seem, (as Brennius well observes,) to express any degree of obstinacy or revenge, or give suspicion of any design to stir up any kind of sedition. DONN.

NOTES. CHAP. XVII. V. 1—4. From the epistles to the Thessalonians, it is evident, that the apostle was remarkably successful among the idolatrous Gentiles also; and that he continued here a considerable time: but after the first three sabbaths, it is probable he left the Jews, and preached chiefly to the Gentiles.—As the historian says they, not we, it is conjectured, that Luke stayed behind at Philippi, and did not join the company till some time after.—Upon inspecting the history, I see nothing in it which negatives the supposition, that Paul pursued the same plan at Thessalonica, which he adopted in other places; and that, though he resorted to the synagogue only three sabbath-days; yet he remained in the city, and in the exercise of his ministry among the Gentile citizens, much longer; and until the success of his preaching had provoked the Jews to excite the tumult and insurrection, by which he was driven away. The Alexandrian and Cambridge manuscripts read "of the worshippers, and of the Greeks a great multitude." . . . If we be not allowed to change the present reading, . . . may not the passage . . .

be considered as describing the success of Paul's discourses, during the three sabbath-days, in which he preached in the synagogue? and . . . that his application to the Gentiles at large, and his success among them, was posterior to this? Paley.—It appears from the epistles to the Thessalonians, that the church at Thessalonica was chiefly formed of converted idolaters; and that Paul and his companions entered very particularly into the several parts of Christian doctrine and duty, in their practical instructions of the new converts, before they left the city: and in writing to the Philippians, the apostle observes, that they had sent twice to supply his wants, when at Thessalonica. Phil. 4:14—20. 1 Thess. 1:9, 10. 4:1—5. These things show, that he labored in this city much longer than the three sabbath-days here mentioned. Alleging. Placing it before their eyes; i. e., so manifestly expounding it, that we perceive the things which are proposed to be seen. Beza.

(1.) Amphipolis. The metropolis of the first division of Macedonia, as made by Paulus Æmilius: see on ch. 16:10. Cimon, the Athenian general, sent 10,000 thither as a colony. It stood on an island in the river Strymon, and had its name Amphipolis, because included between the two grand branches of that river, where they empty themselves into the sea. 4 And some of them believed, and consorted with Paul and Silas; and of the devout Greeks a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few.

5 ¶ But the Jews which believed not, moved with envy, took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and gathered a company, and set all the city on an uproar, and assaulted the house of Jason, and sought to bring them out to the people.

6 And when they found them not, they drew Jason and certain brethren unto the rulers of the city, crying, These that have turned the world upside down, are come hither also;

7 Whom Jason hath received: and these all do contrary to the decrees of Cesar, saying that there is another king, one Jesus.

(2.) That Jesus is the Messiah; 'This Jesus whom I preach unto you, and call on you to believe in, is Christ, the Christ, the Anointed of the Lord, He that should come, and you are to look for no other; for God has, both by the Scriptures and by miracles, and the gift of the Spirit, to make both effectual, borne witness to Him.' Note, Gospel-ministers should preach Jesus; He must be their principal subject; their business is to bring people acquainted with Him. What we are to preach concerning Jesus, is, that He is Christ; and therefore we may hope to be saved, and are bound to be ruled by Him.

III. The success of his preaching there, v. 4.

1. Some of the Jews believed, notwithstanding their rooted prejudices, and they not only associated with Paul and Silas, as friends and companions, but gave up themselves to their direction, as their spiritual guides; they put themselves into their possession, as an inheritance into the possession of the right owner, so the word signifies, 2 Cor. 8:5. They clave to Paul and Silas, and attended them wherever they went. They that believe in Jesus Christ, come into communion with his faithful ministers, and consort with them.

2. Many more of the devout Greeks, and of the chief women, embraced the Gospel. These were proselytes of the gate; the godly among the Gentiles, so the Jews called them; such as, though they did not submit to the law of Moses, yet renounced idolatry and immorality, worshipped the true God only, and did no man any wrong. These were the hoi sebomenoi Hellenes, the worshipping Gentiles; as in America they call those of the natives that are converted to the faith of Christ, the praying Indians; these were admitted to join with the Jews in their synagogue-worship. Of these a great multitude believed, more of them than of the thorough-paced Jews, that were wedded to the ceremonial law. And not a few of the chief women of the city, that were devout, and had a sense of religion, embraced Christianity. Particular notice is taken of this, for an example to the ladies, the chief women, and an encouragement to them to employ themselves in the exercises of devotion, and to submit themselves to the commanding power of Christ's holy religion, in all the instances of it; for this intimates how acceptable it will be to God, what an honor to Christ, and what great influence it may have on many, beside the advantages of it to their own souls.

No mention is here made of their preaching the Gospel to the Gentile idolaters at Thessalonica, yet it is certain they did, and that great numbers were converted; nay, it should seem, that church was chiefly composed of the Gentile converts, though notice is not taken of them here; for Paul writes to the Christians there, as having turned to God from idols, 1 Thess. 1:9. and that at the first entering of the apostles among them.

IV. The trouble given Paul and Silas at Thessalonica; wherever they preached, they were sure to be persecuted; bonds and afflictions did abide them in every city.

1. The authors of it; the Jews which believed not, that were moved with envy, v. 5. The Jews were in all places the most inveterate enemies to the Christians, especially to those Jews that turned Christians, whom they had a particular spleen against, as deserters. Paul, in his epistle to this church, notices the rage and enmity of the Jews against the preachers of the Gospel, as their measure-filling sin. 1 Thess. 2:15, 16.

2. The instruments; the Jews made use of certain lewd persons of the baser sort. All wise and sober people looked upon the apostles with respect, and valued them, and none would appear against them but a company of vile men, given to all manner of wickedness. Tertullian pleads this with those that opposed Christianity, that the enemies of it were generally the worst of men. Apologia, cap. 5. It is the honor of religion, that those who hate it, are generally the lewd fellows of the baser sort, that are lost to all sense of justice and virtue.

3. In what method they proceeded. (1.) They set the city in an uproar; began a riot, and then the mob was up presently. See who are the troublers of Israel,—not the faithful preachers of the Gospel, but the enemies of it. See how the devil carries on his designs; he sets cities in an uproar, sets souls in an uproar, and then fishes in troubled waters. (2.) They assaulted the house of Jason, where the apostles lodged, with a design to bring them out to the people, whom they had incensed and enraged against them, and by whom they hoped to see them pulled to pieces. The proceedings here were altogether illegal; if Jason's house must be searched, it ought to be done by the proper officers, and not without a warrant. What outrages men are carried to, by a spirit of persecution! [conscienceless, headless, heartless, irresponsible, unrepenting.] If men have offended, magistrates are appointed to inquire into the offence, and to judge of it; but to make the rabble judges, and executioners too, as these here designed to do, was to make truth fall in the street; to depose equity, and enthrone fury. (3.) When they could not get the apostles into their hands, then they fall on an honest citizen of their own, who entertained the apostles at his house, a converted Jew, and drew him out with some other of the brethren, to the rulers of the city. The apostles were advised to withdraw, for they were more obnoxious,—Retire before the torrent. But their friends were willing to expose themselves, being better able to weather this storm. For a good man, for such good men as the apostles, some would even dare to die. (4.) They accused them to the rulers, and represented them as dangerous persons, not fit to be tolerated; the crime charged on Jason, is, receiving and harboring them, v. 7. countenancing them, and promoting their interest. And what was the apostles' crime, that it should be no less than misprision of treason to give them lodging? Two very black characters are here given them, enough, if just, to make them odious to the people, and obnoxious to the magistrates.

[1.] That they were enemies to the public peace, and threw everything into disorder, wherever they came. In one sense it is true, that wherever the Gospel comes in its power to any place, to any soul, it works such a change there, that it may be said to turn the world upside down in that place, in that soul. But in the sense they meant it, it is utterly false: they would have it thought, that the preachers of the Gospel were incendiaries and mischief-makers wherever they came; that they sowed discord among relations, set neighbors together by the ears, obstructed commerce, and inverted all order and regularity. Because they persuaded people to turn from vice to virtue; from idols to the living and true God; from malice and envy to love and peace; they are charged with turning the world upside down, when it was only the kingdom of the devil in the world that they thus overturned. Their enemies chiefly, and many Jews, so Plin. 'Situated on what was called the Thermoic gulf, embellished and enlarged, according to Stephanus Byzantinus, by Philip king of Macedonia, who called it Thessalonica, on account of the victory he obtained there over the Thessalians; but prior to this called Thermo. Strabo, Tzetzes, and Zonaras say, it was called Thessalonica, from Thessalonica, wife of Cassander, and daughter of Philip.' Dr. A. C. It seems to have been (as now in a degree) a great centre of commerce and intercourse, between Asia and Europe. It now has 60,000 inhabitants. Ed.

V. 5—9. Jason seems to have been a relation of Paul, and a Jew, Rom. 16:21. Lewd fellows. 'Wicked men.—Of the baser sort.'—Here only, in this sense [graphically describing every mob]. The persons who performed the lowest offices in the markets. SCOTT.

(5.) Of the baser sort. 'Agoraios denotes what is connected with a market-place or a forum; and carries various significations, in reference to the different kinds of business accustomed to be done there. Thus in 19:38. agorai hēmerai are "days on which business is done in the forum." As applied to persons, it denotes those who keep the market. Wetst. has illustrated the various uses of the word, by a vast number of passages from the classical writers; e. g. Herod. and Xen. where it means market-people. But it also denoted not merely buyers and sellers in a market, but those idlers who (like the lazzaroni at Naples) almost lived in the market, and even slept by night under the porticoes and other places of shelter. Of such, it would seem, Horace speaks, as innati triviis ac pene forenses, born in the streets, and almost forum-dwellers. [vulg. loafers.] Cic. calls them, subrostrani [under-stallers]; [96]

Plantus, subbasilicani [under-porchers]; Cic. again, the fax and sentina [dregs and cess-pool] of the city. Hence agorai came to denote persons of the lowest and basest sort, the very dregs of society, a sense very frequent in the classical writers; and most of Wetst.'s examples tend to illustrate this last signification, which is noticed by Suid., Hesych., &c. Valckn. observes, that this use of the word is to be traced to the abhorrence in which the market rabble were held by the respectable citizens, and the notoriously lying and fraudulent character of the petty, huckstering traders; as also to the market-place [especially in such a commercial thoroughfare as Thessalonica] being the usual resort of those scurrae in the Grecian cities, who spent the day in utter idleness. Gathering a company. Lit. raising a mob: [blind leaders of the blind, as all mobs and mobbers are.] To the people. Demos is not here the people, or the mob (as Doddr.), but the popular assembly in the forum, or elsewhere. So 19:30. Bloomf. Lewd fellows of the baser sort. 'Probably a low kind of lawyers, (having a certain juridical credit, and so set on to accuse the apostles of sedition,) what we would call pettifoggers, or attorneys without principle, who gave advice for a trifle, always attended forensic litigations, and fomented disputes and lawsuits among the people,—wicked men of the forensic tribe.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

(6, 7.) Crying. Lit. shouting, bawling, vociferating. See 8:7. 21:34. This verb is often used in Thucyd., as hero, of the shouts and clamors of the populace. These accusers v. 7. take advantage of the ambiguity in the sense of Kurios, [Lord,] the name given by the Christians to Christ, [and so Doddr.] which was also that applied to kings and emperors.

8 And they troubled <sup>i</sup> the people, and the rulers of the city, when they heard these things.

9 And when they had taken security of Jason, and of the other, they let them go.

10 ¶ And the brethren immediately sent away <sup>j</sup> Paul and Silas by night unto Berea: who coming thither, went into the synagogue of the Jews.

11 These were more <sup>k</sup> noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness <sup>l</sup> of mind, and searched the Scriptures <sup>m</sup> daily, whether those things were so.

12 Therefore many of them believed: also of honorable women which were Greeks, and of men, not a few.

set the city in an uproar, and then laid the blame on them *; as Nero set Rome on fire, and then charged it on the Christians. If Christ's faithful ministers, even those that are most quiet in the land, be thus invidiously misrepresented and miscalled, let them not think it strange, or be exasperated by it; we are not better than Paul and Silas, who were thus abused. The accusers cry out, 'They are come hither also; they have been doing all the mischief they could in other places, and now they have brought the infection hither; it is therefore time for us to bestir ourselves, and make head against them.'

[2.] That they were enemies to the established government, and disaffected to that, and their principles and practices destructive to monarchy, and inconsistent with the constitution of the state, v. 7. They all do contrary to the decrees of Cesar; not to any particular decree, for there was as yet no law of the empire against Christianity; but contrary to Cesar's power, in general, to make decrees; for they say, There is another King, one Jesus; not only a King of the Jews, as our Savior was Himself charged before Pilate, but Lord of all; so Peter called Him, in the first sermon he preached to the Gentiles, ch. 10:36. It is true, the Roman government, both while it was a commonwealth, and after it came into the Cesars' hands, was very jealous of any governor under their dominion taking on him the title of king, and there was an express law against it. But Christ's kingdom was not of this world. His followers said indeed, Jesus is a King, but not an earthly king, not a rival with Cesar, nor his ordinances interfering with the decrees of Cesar, but who had made it a law of his kingdom, to render unto Cesar the things that are Cesar's. There was nothing in the doctrine of Christ that tended to the dethroning of * How exactly will this apply to the mobs in the U.S. Ed.

V. 10—15. It does not appear, that Silas came to Paul, while at Athens: and Timothy, when he arrived, was sent from Athens back to Thessalonica, as we learn from 1 Thess.: and both he and Silas again joined the apostle at Corinth.

(11.) More noble. 'Were of a better race, extraction, or birth; but the word refers more to their conduct, as a proof of their better disposition, than to their birth, or any peculiar lineal nobility.' Dr. A. C. 'The Gr. here, eugenēs, and the Lat. ingenuus, have a metaphorical sense, applied to the mind, and denote ingenuous, liberal, of good disposition and manners. So the classics.' Bloomf. 'The expression, as Whitby has observed, has in it a peculiar spirit and propriety, as the Jews boasted that they were free and noble, by virtue of their descent from Abraham and the other patriarchs. These Bereans, imitating the rational faith of their great progenitor, were his more genuine offspring.' Doddr. Searching. 'Lit. diligently examining, scrutinizing with judgment. Beza paraphrases thus: diligently and with judgment weighing everything, abandoning all prejudices, and yet not catching up anything lightly and inconsiderately.' Bloomf. It is easier to form a creed, and then go to the Bible and look up proof-texts of it, than to take the pains the Be-princes, or the depriving them of any of their prerogatives; and they knew it very well, and it was against their conscience that they laid this to their charge. And of all people it ill became the Jews to do it, who hated Cesar and his government, and sought the ruin of him and it, and who expected a Messiah that should be a temporal prince, and overturn the thrones of kingdoms, and were therefore opposing our Lord Jesus, because He did not appear under that character. Thus they have been most spiteful in representing God's faithful people as enemies to Cesar, and hurtful to kings and provinces, who have been themselves setting up a kingdom within a kingdom, a power not only in competition with Cesar's, but superior to it, that of the papal supremacy.

4. The great uneasiness this gave the city, v. 8. They had no ill opinion of the apostles or their doctrine, could not apprehend any danger to the state from them, and therefore were willing to connive at them; but if they be represented to them by the prosecutors as enemies to Cesar, they will be obliged to take cognizance of them, and to suppress them, for fear of the government; and this troubled them. Claudius, the present emperor, is represented by Suetonius, as a man very jealous of the least commotion, and timorous to the last degree, which obliged the rulers under him to be watchful against everything that looked dangerous, or gave the least cause of suspicion; therefore it troubled them to be brought under a necessity of disturbing good men.

5. The issue of this troublesome affair; the magistrates had no mind to prosecute the Christians; care was taken to secure the apostles, they absconded, and fled, and kept out of their hands; so that nothing was to be done but to discharge Jason and his friends, on bail, v. 9. The magistrates here were not so easily incensed against the apostles as the magistrates at Philippi, but were more considerate, and of better temper; so they took security of Jason and the other, bound them to their good behavior; and perhaps they gave bond for Paul and Silas, that they should be forth-coming when they were called for, if anything should afterward appear against them.

Among the persecutors of Christianity, as there have been instances of the madness and rage of brutes, so there have been likewise of the prudence and temper of men.

V. 10—15. In these vs. we have,

1. Paul and Silas removing to Berea, and preaching the Gospel there, v. 10. That command of Christ to his disciples, When they persecute you in one city, flee to another, intends their flight to be not so much for their own safety, as for the carrying on of their work, as appears by the reason given, Mat. 10:23. Thus the devil was outshot in his own bow. See here,

1. The care the brethren took of Paul and Silas, when they perceived how the plot was laid against them; they immediately sent them away by night, incognito, to Berea. This could be no surprise to the young converts, Paul at first told them it would be so, 1 Thess. 3:4. It should seem Paul and Silas would willingly have stayed, and faced the storm, if the brethren would have let them; but they would rather want their help than expose their lives, which, it should seem, were dearer to their friends than to themselves.

2. The constancy of Paul and Silas in their work; when they came to Berea, they went into the synagogue of the Jews, and made their public appearance there. Though the Jews at Thessalonica had been their spiteful enemies, and, for aught they knew, the Jews at Berea would be so too, yet they did not therefore decline paying their respect to the Jews, either in revenge, or fear. If others will not do their duty to us, yet we ought to do ours to them.

11. The good character of the Jews in Berea, v. 11. They were better disposed to receive the Gospel than the Jews at Thessalonica, were not so bigoted and prejudiced against it, not so peevish and ill-natured, they were more noble,—better bred; 1. They had a freer thought, lay more open to conviction, were willing to hear reason, and admit the force of it, and to subscribe to what appeared to be truth, though contrary to their former sentiments; this was more noble. 2. They had a better temper, were not so sour and morose, and ill-conditioned towards all that were not of their mind. As they were ready to come into a unity with those that by the power of truth they were brought to concur with, so they continued in charity with those that they saw cause to differ from; this was more noble. 3. They neither prejudged the cause, nor were moved with envy at the managers of it, but very generously gave both it and them a fair hearing, without passion or partiality; for,

(1.) They received the Word with all readiness of mind; were very willing to hear it, presently apprehended the meaning of it, and did not shut their eyes against the light, did not quarrel with the Word, nor find fault, nor seek occasion against the preachers of it; but bid it welcome, and put a candid construction on everything said; herein they were more noble than the Jews in Thessalonica, but walked in the same spirit, and in the same steps, with the Gentiles there, of whom it is said, that they received the Word with joy of the Holy Ghost, and turned to God from idols, 1 Thess. 1:6, 9. This was true nobility; and these were the most noble, if I may so say, the most gentleman-like men. Virtue and piety are true nobility, true honor: and without that, What are pedigrees and pompous titles worth?

(2.) They searched the Scriptures daily whether these things were so. Their readiness of mind to receive the Word, was not such, as that they took things on trust, on an implicit faith: no; but since Paul reasoned out of the Scriptures, and referred to the O. T., they had recourse to their Bibles, turned to the places he referred to, read the context, considered the scope and drift, compared other places, examined whether Paul's inferences from them were natural and genuine, and his arguments on them cogent, and determined accordingly. Observe, The reans did. Doddr. remarks, 'Not that Christianity cannot be proved otherwise than from the prophecies of the O. T. It might be demonstrated from various topics of external and internal evidence to those who never heard of any former revelation. Another very important additional argument does indeed arise from the accomplishment of prophecies; and when it has been asserted (as we know it has), by the authorized teachers of the Gospel, not only that Christ is a divine messenger, but also that his appearance was foretold to the Jews, then it is impossible to vindicate Christ's mission without showing that it was so. But in examining the particular texts in question, we are not only to inquire whether the sense given by the apostles be, in itself considered, most easy and natural, which is generally the case; but (especially on account of the obscurity which must of course attend prophecy) we are to consider whether the improbability of the sense they give in any particular instance, or in all instances, be sufficient to balance the other proofs they produced of being under divine guidance, before we can draw any conclusion to the prejudice of their plenary inspiration; so far should we be from concluding, without such an overbalance, that Christianity is false, which has generally been the way of indolent half-thinkers.' Ed.

13 ¶ But when the Jews of Thessalonica had knowledge that the word of God was preached of Paul at Berea, they came thither also, and stirred up <sup>n</sup> the people.

14 And then immediately the brethren sent away <sup>o</sup> Paul, to go as it were to the sea: but Silas and Timotheus abode there still.

15 And they that conducted Paul brought him unto Athens: and receiving a commandment unto Silas and Timotheus, <sup>p</sup> for to come to him with all speed, they departed.

16 ¶ Now while Paul waited for them at Athens, <sup>q</sup> his spirit was stirred in him, when he saw the city <sup>r</sup> wholly given to idolatry.

17 Therefore disputed he in the synagogue with the Jews, and with the devout <sup>s</sup> persons, and in the market daily with them that met with him.

doctrine of Christ does not fear a scrutiny; advocates for his cause desire no more, than that people will not say, These things are not so, till they have first, without prejudice and partiality, examined whether they be so or no. The N. T. is to be examined by the Old. The Jews received the O. T., and those that did so, if they considered things aright, could not but see cause sufficient to receive the New, because in it they see all the prophecies and promises of the Old fully and exactly accomplished. Those that read and receive the Scriptures, must search them, John 5: 39. study them, consider them, both that they may find out the truth, and not mistake the sense, and so run into error, or remain in it; and that they may find out the whole truth contained in them, and have an intimate acquaintance with the mind of God revealed in them. Searching the Scriptures must be our daily work; they that heard the Word in the synagogue on the sabbath-day, did not think that enough, but were searching it every day in the week, that they might improve what they had heard the Sabbath before, and prepare for what they were to hear the Sabbath after. Those are truly noble, and in a fair way to be more and more so, that make the Scriptures their oracle, touchstone, [and standard,] and consult them accordingly; they have their minds filled with noble thoughts, fixed to noble principles, and formed for noble aims and designs. These are more noble.

III. The preaching of the Gospel at Berea had the desired success; the people's hearts being prepared, much work was done suddenly, v. 12. 1. Of the Jews many believed; at Thessalonica, only some, v. 4. but at Berea, where they heard with unprejudiced minds, many believed; many more

(14.) As it were. [Hōs: sometimes, especially with epi, and a verb of motion, expressed or understood, it signifies, usque ad, hōs, right to. See many examples in Wetst., &c. As the text does not necessarily point out any sleights or feints, so we need not have recourse to any.]

V. 16, 17. It is probable, that the apostle did not at first intend to enter on his ministry at Athens, till Silas and Timothy joined him; perhaps, he had not determined whether he should attempt to publish the Gospel there, or pass over into Asia. The Athenians always import-

Jews than at Thessalonica. God gives grace to those whom He first inclines to make a diligent use of the means of grace, and particularly to search the Scriptures.

2. Of the Greeks likewise, the Gentiles, many believed, both of the honorable women, the ladies of quality, and of men not a few, men of the first rank, as should seem by their being mentioned with the honorable women. The wives [perhaps Jewesses, whose marriage with Gentiles, often served for proselyting] first embraced the Gospel, and then they persuaded their husbands to embrace it. For what knowest thou, O wife, but thou shalt save thy husband? 1 Cor. 7: 16.

IV. The persecution raised against Paul and Silas at Berea, which forced Paul thence.

1. The Jews at Thessalonica were the mischief-makers at Berea; as if they had a commission from the prince of darkness to go from place to place to oppose the Gospel, as the apostles had to preach it. Thus we read before, that the Jews at Antioch and Iconium came to Lystra, on purpose to incense the people against the apostles, ch. 14: 19. See how restless Satan's agents are in their opposition to the Gospel of Christ, and the salvation of souls! We must not think it strange, if persecutors at home extend their rage to stir up persecution abroad.

2. This occasioned Paul's remove to Athens. The Berean brethren showed themselves sensible, active men, by the care they took of Paul, v. 14. Aware of the coming of the persecuting Jews from Thessalonica; and fearing what it would come to, they lost no time, but immediately sent Paul, against whom they were most prejudiced, and enraged, away, hoping that would pacify them, while they retained Silas and Timothy, who, now Paul had broken the ice, might be sufficient to carry on the work without exposing him. They sent Paul to go even to the sea, so some; to go as it were to the sea, so we read it. He went out from Berea, in that road which went to the sea, that the Jews, if they inquired after him, might think he was gone to a great distance; but he went by land to Athens, in which there was no culpable dissimulation at all. They that conducted Paul, (as his guides and guards, he being both a stranger in the country, and one that had many enemies,) brought him to Athens. The Spirit of God directed him to that famous city; famous of old for its power and dominion, when the Athenian commonwealth coped with the Spartan; famous afterward for learning, it was the rendezvous of scholars; those that wanted learning, went thither to get it, because those that had learning went thither to show it. It was a great university, much resorted to from all parts, and therefore, for the better diffusing of gospel-light, Paul is sent thither, and is not ashamed or afraid to show his face among the philosophers there, and there to preach Christ crucified, though he knew it would be as much foolishness to the Greeks, as it was to the Jews a stumbling-block.

3. He ordered Silas and Timothy to come to him to Athens, when he found there was a prospect of doing good there; or, because there being none there that he knew, he was solitary and melancholy without them. Yet, it should seem, that, great as was the haste he was in for them, he ordered Timothy to go about by Thessalonica, to establish, and bring him an account of that church, 1 Thess. 3: 1, 2.

V. 16—21. A mere scholar, where Paul now was, would have had a great many curious questions to ask; but Paul, though bred a scholar, and an ingenious, active man, minds other work; it is not the improving of himself in their philosophy that he aims at, he has learned to call it a vain thing, and is above it, Col. 2: 8. his business is, in God's name, to correct their disorders in religion, and to turn them from the service of idols, and of Satan in them, to the service of the true and living God in Christ.

1. Here is the impression the abominable ignorance and superstition of the Athenians made on Paul's spirit, v. 16.

1. The city was wholly given to idolatry. This agrees with the account the heathen writers give of it, that there were more idols in Athens, than in all Greece besides; and that they had twice as many sacred feasts as others had. Whatever strange gods were recommended, they admitted them, and allowed them a temple, and an altar, so that they had almost as many gods as men. And this city, after the empire became Christian, continued incurably addicted to idolatry; and all the pious edicts of the Christian emperors could not root it out, till, by the irruption of the Goths, that city was in so particular a manner laid waste, that there are now scarcely any remains of it. It is observable, that there, where human learning most flourished, idolatry most abounded, and the most absurd and ridiculous idolatry; which confirms that of the apostle, that when they professed themselves to be wise, they became fools, Rom. 1: 22. and, in the business of religion, were of all other the most vain in their imaginations. The world by wisdom knew not God, 1 Cor. 1: 21. They might have reasoned against polytheism and idolatry [and how did the religion of reason first break forth in Socrates and Plato!], but, it seems, the greatest pretenders to reason were the greatest slaves to idols; so necessary was it to the re-establishing, even of natural religion, that there should be a divine revelation, and that centering in Christ.

2. The disturbance the sight of this gave to Paul; Paul was not willing to appear publicly, till Silas and Timothy came to him, that out of the mouth of two or three witnesses the Word might be established; but in the mean time his spirit was stirred within him; he was filled with concern for the glory of God, which he saw given to idols, and with compassion to the souls of men, which he saw thus enslaved to Satan, and led captive by him at his will. He had a holy indignation at the heathen priests; that led the people such an endless trace of idolatry; and at their philosophers, that knew better, and yet ed the deities and superstitions of every nation, along with their arts and learning; so that a satirist [Petronius] ludicrously observed, 'It was easier to find a god, than a man, in that city.' This fact most completely demonstrates the insufficiency of science and philosophy to guide men in matters of religion. The barbarous Scythians, the wild Indians, nay, the stupid Hottentots, have never deviated further from truth, or sunk into grosser darkness, in respect of God and religion, than the ingenious and philosophical Athenians did!—The apostle, however, was thus excited to begin his labors without delay, first in the synagogue with the Jews and proselytes; but he does not appear to have had great success among them. This was probably on the sabbath-day.

(16.) Wholly given to idolatry. [What need have we, in the most improved state of human reason, of being taught by a divine revelation!]

(17.) Devout persons. [*It appears plainly from this text, and perhaps also from v. 4. I think beyond any other, that the character of sebomenoi, or devout, is at least sometimes given by Luke to persons who used to worship the true God, and yet were not circumcised, which if they had been, I think they would not have been distinguished from Jews. But that the title was appropriated to such, and especially that such could properly be called proselytes of the gate, in the technical sense in which Maimonides, and almost all our modern writers from* 18 Then certain philosophers of the Epicureans, and of the Stoics, encountered him. And some said, What will this babbling say? Other some, He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange gods: because he preached unto them Jesus, and the resurrection.

19 And they took him, and brought him unto Areopagus, saying, May we know what this new doctrine, whereof thou speakest, is?

never said a word against it, but themselves went down the stream.

II. The testimony he bore against their idolatry, and his endeavors to bring them to the knowledge of the truth. He did not, [fanatic-like,] as Witsius observes, in the heat of his zeal, break into the temples, pull down their images, demolish their altars, or fly in the face of their priests; [for such demonstrations would have excited the same lower propensities in others;] nor did he run about the streets crying, 'You are all the bond-slaves of the devil,' though it was too true; but he observed decorum, doing that only which became a prudent man.

1. He went to the synagogue of the Jews, who, though enemies to Christianity, were free from idolatry, and joined with them in that among them which was good, and took the opportunity given him there of disputing for Christ, v. 17. He discoursed with the Jews, reasoned fairly with them, and put it to them, what reason they could give, why, since they expected the Messiah, they would not receive Jesus. There he met with the devout persons, that had forsaken the idol-temples, but rested in the Jews' synagogue, and he talked with these, to lead them on to the Christian church, to which the Jews' synagogue was but as a porch.

2. He entered into conversation with all that came in his way about matters of religion. In the market, agora, forum; i. e. the exchange, or place of commerce, he disputed daily, as he had occasion, with them that met with him, or that he happened to fall into company with, that were heathen, and never came to the Jews' synagogue. The zealous advocates for the cause of Christ will be ready to plead it in all companies, as occasion offers. The ministers of Christ must not think it enough to speak a good word for Christ once a week, but should be daily speaking honorably of Him to such as meet with them.

III. The inquiries some of the philosophers made concerning Paul's doctrine.

1. Some of the philosophers thought him worth making remarks upon, and they were those whose principles were most directly contrary to Christianity. (1.) The Epicureans, who thought God altogether such an one as themselves, an idle, inactive Being, that minded nothing, nor put any difference between good and evil; they would not own, either that God made the world, or that He governs it; nor that man needs to make any conscience of what he says or does, having no punishment to fear, or rewards to hope for; all which loose, atheistical notions, Christianity is levelled against. The Epicurians, [unlike their founder,] indulged themselves in all the pleasures of sense, and placed their happiness in them, in what Christ has taught us in the first place to deny ourselves. (2.) The Stoics, who thought themselves altogether as good as God, and indulged themselves as much in the pride of life as the Epicureans did in the lusts of the flesh and of the eye; they made their virtuous man to be no way inferior to God Himself, nay, to be superior. There is that in which a wise man excels God, so Seneca: to which Christianity is directly opposite, as it teaches us to deny ourselves, and abase ourselves, and to come off from all confidence in ourselves, that Christ may be all in all.

2. Their different sentiments of him, v. 18. (1.) Some called him a babbling, and thought he spoke, without any design, whatever came uppermost, as men of crazed imaginations do; What will this babbling say? this scatterer of words, that goes about, throwing here one idle word or story, and there another, without any intendment or signification; or, this picker up of seeds. Such a pitiful, contemptible animal, they took Paul to be, or supposed he went from place to place, venting his notions to get money, a penny here, and another there, as a little, worthless sort of bird, that hops here and there, and picks up here and there a grain. They looked upon him as an idle fellow, and regarded him, as we say, no more than a ballad-singer. (2.) Others called him a setter forth of strange gods, and thought he spoke with design to make himself considerable by that method. And if he had strange gods to set forth, he could not bring them to a better market than to Athens. He did not, as him, explain the word, will by no means follow.' Doddr.—Market. 'Agora: of the market-places at Athens, of which there were many, the most celebrated were the Old and New Forum. The former was in the Ceramicus, a very ample space, part within and part without the city. See Meurs. and Potter. The latter was outside of the Ceramicus, in a place called Eretria. See Meurs. And this seems to be the one here meant. For no forum, except the Ceramicus and the Eretriacum, was called, absolutely, agora, but had a name to denote which was meant, as Areopagiticum, Hippodamium, Piræum, &c. In process of time, and at this period when Paul was at Athens, the forum was transferred from the Ceramicus into the Eretria; a change which, indeed, had been introduced in the time of Augustus; and that this was the most frequented part of the city, we learn from Strabo. Besides, the Eretriac forum was situated before the stoa, or portico, in which the Stoics, v. 18. used to hold their discourses. It was moreover called kuklos, from its round form.' With them. 'With any whom he met with. It is well observed, by Harm., that though, with us, the carrying on religious disputations in the markets, would be thought improper, and the effect of intemperate zeal; yet it would, even now, not be strange in Arabia, and other parts of the E., where people meet in such places for conversation. And, what is most to the purpose, this was common at Athens, v. 21. See also Dio, Theonist., Diog. Laert., &c.' BLOOMF.

V. 18. In the forum, the apostle was encountered by certain philosophers, of different sects. The Epicureans were gay and superficial infidels, who amused themselves and others with various curious speculations. They ascribed the original of all things to chance; they professed to allow the existence of the gods, yet contended, that they did not interfere in the creation or government of the world, but indolently satisfied themselves with their own undisturbed felicity; they deemed the enjoyment of this present world the supreme good, and denied a future state of rewards and punishments. The Stoics allowed the existence of the gods, but supposed them to be bound by eternal and irresistible fatality; they affected almost to extinguish their own feelings and passions; they were most extravagantly proud and obstinate; they judged a virtuous man, according to their notions of virtue, to be independent of their deities, and in some respects superior to them; and spoke as if he might defy fate itself; they maintained, that virtue was its own reward, and expressed themselves very obscurely about a future state of retributions. [Note, end of ch.]—These two sects of philosophers, being alike opposite in their tenets to the doctrines of the Gospel, and being full of the pride of superior learning, encountered Paul, and thought of silencing him in the argument; and some of them despised him. Gods. 'Daimoniōn: the Gentiles used it for the objects of their worship in a good sense, not as we Christians use it at present, invariably in a bad sense.' Compb. Ought Christians to use a word in a good sense, which, in its best meaning, signifies the objects of abominable idolatries? Holy angels are never called demons in Scripture; but either evil spirits, or the supposed invisible objects of idolatrous worship; and this, with every object of it, is especially 'an abomination to the Lord.' SCOTT.

(18.) Epicureans.] 'The followers of Epicurus, who was born at Athens, about A. M. 3603, B. C. 341.—Stoics.] 'The followers of Zeno, who was born in the Isle of Cyprus, about 30 years B. C. His disciples were called Stoics, from Stoa, a famous portico at Athens, where they studied.' Dr. A. C. —'The attentive reader will easily see, how opposite the genius of each of these sects was, to the pure and humble spirit of Christianity, and how happily the apostle levels his incomparable discourse at some of the most distinguishing and important errors of each, while, without expressly attacking either, he seems intent on giving a plain summary of his own religious principles, in which he appears a most charming model of the true way of teaching and reforming mankind.' Babbling. 'Spermologos: it admirably expresses the contempt they had of an unknown foreigner, that pretended to teach all the several professors of their learned and illustrious body of philosophers.' Doddr.—Spermologos was the deadliest term that Demosthenes there (300 years before) bestowed on the most eager and decided of his rivals and antagonists, Aeschines.' Scott. Properly used, of those little insignificant birds, which support a precarious existence by picking up seeds scattered by the sower, or left above ground after the soil has been harrowed. See Max. Tyr., Aristoph., &c. It was metaphorically applied also to paupers, who prowled about the market-place, and lived by picking up anything which might be dropped by buyers and sellers; and likewise to persons who gleaned in the cornfields. See Eustath. on Hom. Od. Hence, it was at length applied to all persons of mean condition, who, as we say, "live on their wits." Thus it is explained by Harpoer., entelēs, mean and contemptible; and so Philo. See Kypke. Finally, it was applied to parasites, who, by flattery and buffoonery, contrived to pick up a living from the provisions of other men's tables. Furthermore, as sparrows, and other such minute birds as live by gathering up seeds, are especially noisy and garrulous, so the term was applied to insignificant praters and chatters. Kuin., Schl., Kypke. The Greek philosophers brought everything to the test of reason, and thought the greatest excellence of reasoning, consisted in conciseness of thought and brevity of diction. (Quintill., Walch.) But as Paul's oratory was not in persuasive words of man's wisdom (1 Cor. 2:4.), but consisted chiefly in the ubertas et copiosa dicendi vis, [a fertile and copious diction,] his disputers thought him loquacious, so Kuin. thinks. The resurrection. Not only of Christ, but of all the dead, by Christ.' Bloomf. 'Those philosophers thought, doubtless, that some such a hero, or inferior god, [as they expressed by daimōnes, or daimōnia, sometimes distinguished, as the dii minores,] was preached by Paul, when they heard him teaching that Jesus was the Son of God, the Savior of men, who had been a mighty benefactor to the human race, and after death had been received up into heaven.' Kuin. How like to this description are some modern (not heathen) ideas of Christ! ED.

V. 19—21. (19) New doctrine.] The word signifies newer: the new imagination, or system, of the preceding year, month, or week, soon became like an almanac out of date: it was the taste of the age and place, to discard and antiquate every hypothesis, as soon as it became vulgar; and to substitute some newer scheme in its place; and lively, ingenious students, especially in metaphysics, commonly run into this humor. If Paul, therefore, could start some newer speculation, than the newest fashion of philosophy among them, his doctrine would at least gratify and amuse them.—Areopagus. Some learned men think the word Areopagus is not properly translated 'Mars' hill,' or the hill of Mars, as it does not appear that a temple was built to Mars, in the place where the Areopagus convened. They argue, that the name was derived from the trial of murderers by the court there held. See on Mat. 5:44. The nature and functions of this court, or senate, which was highly celebrated in those ages and countries, must be learned from the Greek antiquaries; being far too complicated a subject for this publication.—The contemptuous neglect, and the interruption, which the apostle's admirable address met with from it, constrains the impartial inquirer to question, how far such a court, or council, deserved the encomiums so lavishly bestowed upon it. SCOTT.

(19.) Brought him.] 'Conducted him. Beza, Hammond, and some other critics, have thought Paul was brought to a formal trial before the judges; but it evidently appears to be a mistake, not only from the title by which Paul addresses them, (so Limborch,) but from the whole tenor of the story, and particularly as the persons bringing him are represented, not as accusing him, but only desiring to be informed.'

20 For thou bringest certain <sup>x</sup>strange things to our ears: we would know therefore what these things mean.

21 (For all the Athenians, and strangers which were there, spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell or to hear some new thing.)

many did, directly set forth new gods, nor avowedly; but they thought he seemed to do so, because he preached unto them Jesus, and the resurrection; from his first coming among them, he ever and anon harped upon these two strings, which are, indeed, the principal doctrines of Christianity,—Christ, and a future state; Christ our Way, and heaven our end; and though he did not call these gods, yet they thought he meant to make them so. 'Jesus they took for a new god, and anastasis, the resurrection, for a new goddess.' Thus they lost the benefit of the Christian doctrine, by dressing it up in a pagan dialect.

3. Their proposal to give him a free, full, fair, public hearing, v. 19, 20. (1.) They look upon it as strange and surprising. By this it should seem, that among all the learned books they had, they either had not, or heeded not, the books of Moses and the prophets, else the doctrine of Christ would not have been so perfectly new and strange to them. There was but one book in the world that was of divine inspiration, and that was the only book they were strangers to; which, if they would have given a due regard to it, would, in its very first page, have determined that great controversy among them, about the origin of the universe. (2.) They desire to know more of it, only because it was new and strange; 'May we know what this new doctrine is? Or, is it, like the mysteries of the gods, to be kept as a profound secret? If it may be, we would gladly know, and desire thee to tell us, what these things mean, that we may be able to pass a fair judgment on them.' (3.) The place they brought him to, in order to this public declaration of his doctrine; it was to Areopagus, the same word that is translated, v. 22. Mars-hill; it was the town-house, or guild-hall of their city, where the magistrates met on public business, and the courts of justice were kept; and it was as the theatre in the university, or the schools, where learned men met to communicate their notions. The court of justice which sat here, was famous for its equity, which drew appeals to it from all parts; if any denied a god, he was liable to the censure of this court; Diagoras was by them put to death, as a contemner of the gods; nor might any new god be admitted, without their approbation; hither they brought Paul to be tried, not as a criminal, but as a candidate.

4. The general character of the people of that city given on this occasion, v. 21. All the Athenians, i. e. natives of the place, and strangers, which sojourned there for their improvement, spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell or to hear some new thing; which comes in as the reason why they were inquisitive concerning Paul's doctrine, not because it was good, but because it was new. It is a very sorry character here given of these people, yet many transcribe it. (1.) They were all for conversation. Paul exhorts his pupil to give attendance to reading and meditation, 1 Tim. 4:13, 15. but these people despised those old-fashioned ways of getting knowledge, and preferred that of telling and hearing. It is true, that good company is of great use to a man, and will polish one that has laid a good foundation in study; but that knowledge will be very flashy and superficial, which is got by conversation only. (2.) They affected novelty; they were for telling and hearing some new thing; they were for new schemes and new notions in philosophy; new forms and plans of government in politics; and in religion, for new gods that came newly up, Deut. 32:17. new demons, new-fashioned images, and altars, 2 K. 16:10. they were given to change. Demosthenes, an orator of their own, had charged this on them, long before, in one of his philippics, that their common question in the markets, or wherever they met, was, if there was any news. (3.) They meddled in other people's business, and were inquisitive concerning that, and never minded their own. Tattlers are always busy bodies, 1 Tim. 5:13. (4.) They spent their time in nothing else, and a very uncomfortable account they must needs have to make of their time, who thus spend it. Time is precious, and we are concerned to be good husbands of it, because eternity depends on it, and it is hastening apace into eternity, but abundance of it is wasted in unprofitable converse. To tell and hear the new occurrences of providence concerning the public, in our own or other nations, and concerning our neighbors and friends, is of good use, now and then; but to set up for news-mongers, and to spend our time in nothing else, is to lose that which is very precious for the gain of that which is worth little.

V. 22—31. We have here Paul's sermon at Athens, a sermon to heathens, that worshipped false gods, and were without the true God; the object of which is, to lead his hearers, by the common works of Providence, to the knowledge and worship of the Creator. One discourse of this kind we had before, to the rude idolaters of Lystra, that deified the apostles, ch. 14:15. this recorded here, is to the more polite and refined idolaters at Athens, an admirable discourse, every way suited to his auditory, and the design he had upon them.

I. He lays down this as the scope of his discourse, that he aimed to bring them to the knowledge of the one only living and true God, as the sole and proper Object of their adoration; when he preached against the gods they worshipped, he had no design to draw them to atheism, but to the service of the true Deity. Socrates, who had exposed the pagan idolatry, was indicted in this very court, and condemned, not only because he did not esteem those to be gods whom the city esteemed to be so, but because he introduced new demons; and this was the charge against Paul. Now he tacitly owns the former part of the charge, but guards against the latter, by declaring that he does not introduce any new gods, but reduces them to the knowledge of one God, the Ancient of days.

1. He shows them that they needed to be instructed herein; for they had lost the knowledge of the true God that made them, in the worship of false gods that they made. The crime he charges on them, is, giving that glory to others which is due to God only; that they feared and worshipped demons, spirits that they supposed inhabited the images to which they directed their worship. 'You are in all things too superstitious; you easily admit everything that comes under show of religion, but it is that which corrupts it more and more; I bring you that which will reform it.' Their neighbors praised them for this as a pious people, but Paul condemns them for it. Yet it is observable, how he mollifies the charge, does not aggravate it, to provoke them; he uses a word which among them was taken in a good sense; You are every way more than ordinary religious, so some; you are very devout in your way: or, if it be taken in an ill sense, it is mitigated; 'You are, as it were, more superstitious than you need be;' and he says no more than what he himself perceived; I see it, I observe it. They charged Paul with setting forth new demons; 'Nay,' says he, 'you have abundance already, I will not add to them.'

2. He shows them that they themselves had given a fair occasion for the declaring of this one true God to them, by setting up an altar, To the unknown God; which intimated, an acknowledgment that there was a God, which was yet to them an unknown God; and it is sad to think, that at Athens, a place which was supposed to have the monopoly of wisdom, the true God was an unknown God, the only God that was unknown. There, where we are sensible we are defective and come short, just there, the Gospel takes us up, and carries us on. Various Doddr.—May.] This helps to prove, that those of the Areopagists who were there, were so, simply as philosophers, and that this place, the Areopagus, on Mars' hill, W. of the Acropolis, was chosen for convenience. It was called Mars' hill, so consecrated to him, or to the fabled place where, when he had slain the son of Neptune, Mars first pleaded a capital cause before the 12 gods. The whole seems to be an affair with philosophers, and not judges.

(20.) The 3 classes of Athens were, the politai, metoikoi, (both incl. here under the term Athenians), and the xenoi, here called epidemountes xenoi, tr. 'strangers which were there,' and including all who had not citizenship, though they had a fixed habitation, and were not mere sojourners. Such seems to be Kypke's view; whom see, and also Pricæus, who differs. Eo. 'The reason for the immense concourse of strangers, from every part of the world, arose (says Bl.), from the boundless liberality (see Thucyd. 2:33, 37.) of the Athenian government towards them.' Paris alone, in modern civilization, gives to the world this free use of knowledge, which made Athens 'the university of the Roman empire and of the world.' When will nations learn, that the advancement in civilization of any nation is a blessing to each and all others, not a matter for jealousy, 'protective systems,' and wars? See Wayland's Political Economy.

(21.) On the loquacity, and rage for novelty, of the Athenians, and of their busy and prying curiosity, into both public and private affairs, in which the inquirer could have no concern, all ancient writers coincide with Luke. See abundant examples in Wetst., &c. Their love of gossiping and news, is evident from the fact, that there were at Athens places called teschai, i. e. gossiping-houses, (corresponding to our coffee

see-houses [rather to the French cafés],) devoted to the reception of persons who met together to hear and tell news. Of these Meurs, tells us there were 360. The more respectable inhabitants used to resort to the shops of the surgeons (hiatreia) and koureia (shops of the barbers).<sup>2</sup>

V. 22. Too superstitious.] Exceedingly addicted 'to the fear of demons,' or the worship of invisible beings. The word is ambiguous, and might be understood either as commendation or a censure; and doubtless he chose it for that reason, to convey the implied censure in the most inoffensive manner. Xenophon uses the word, when commending one as a religious man.

SCOTT.

(22.) 'The plan of Paul's discourse ["so eminently characterized by depth of thought, solidity of sentiment, and energy of diction,"] is this: Exordium, relating what led to his address, viz. their religiousness, and worship of an unknown god, v. 22, 23.; Proposition: I announce who that unknown god is, v. 23.; Confirmation, containing, 1st. an annunciation of the true doctrine, v. 24—28., 2dly, an indirect exhortation to his hearers, to regulate their lives according to its precepts, v. 29, 30. with the reason added, v. 31.' Schoettg.—Too superstitious.] Deisidaimonesterous. 'Exceedingly addicted to the worship of the invisible powers. This English phrase, which is very agreeable to the etymology of the original word, has, what I think a translation of Scripture should always, if possible, have, the ambiguity of the original; whereas neither superstitious nor religious have that ambiguity.' Doddr. Bloomf. contends, (after the 'best critics of the last two cent.')] that the good sense is alone intended here, and refers to Hammond's 'masterly dissertation' on this word.

Eo.

23 For as I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you.

24 God that made the world, and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands;

25 Neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed any thing; seeing he giveth to all life, and breath, and all things;

26 And hath made of one blood all nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth; and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation;

a or, gods that ye worship. Ga. d c. 7:43. e Ps. 50:3. f Job 12:10. Zec. 12:1. b Mal. 2:10. i Ps. 31:15. j Is. 45:21. c Mat. 11:23.

conjectures the learned have concerning this altar dedicated to the unknown God.

(1.) Some think the meaning is, To the God whose honor it is to be unknown, and that they intended the God of the Jews, whose name is ineffable, and whose nature is unsearchable. It is probable they had heard from the Jews, and from the writings of the O. T., of the God of Israel, who had proved Himself to be above all gods, but was a God hiding Himself, Is. 45:15. The heathen called the Jews' God an uncertain God, the uncertain Deity of Moses, and the God without name. Now this God, says Paul, this God, who cannot by searching be found out to perfection, I now declare unto you.

(2.) Others think the meaning is, To the God whom it is our unhappiness not to know; which intimates, that they would think it their happiness to know Him. Some tell us, that on occasion of a plague that raged at Athens, when they had sacrificed to all their gods, one after another, for the staying of the plague, they were advised to let some sheep go where they pleased, and where they lay down, to build an altar, to the proper God, or the God to whom that affair of staying the pestilence did belong; and, because they knew not how to call Him, they inscribed it, To the unknown God. Others, from some of the best historians of Athens, tell us, they had many altars inscribed, To the gods of Asia, Europe, and Africa; To the unknown God: and some of the neighboring countries used to swear by the God that was unknown at Athens; so Lucian.

Now observe, how modestly Paul mentions this; that he might not be thought a spy, or one that had intruded himself, more than became a stranger, into the knowledge of their mysteries; he tells them he observed it, as he passed by, and saw their devotions, or their sacred things; it was public, and he could not forbear seeing it, and it was proper enough to make his remarks on the religion of the place; and observe how prudently and ingeniously he takes rise from this to bring in his discourse of the true God; [1.] He tells them, that the God he preached to them, was one that they did already worship, and therefore he was not a setter-forth of new or strange gods. [2.] He was one whom they ignorantly worshipped, which was a reproach to them who were famous all the world over for their knowledge. 'I come to take away that reproach, and it cannot but be acceptable, to have your blind devotion turned into a reasonable service.'

If He confirms his doctrine of one living and true God, by his works of creation and providence; 'The God whom I declare unto you to be the sole Object of your devotion, and call you to worship, is the God that made the world, and governs it; and by the visible proofs of these, you may be led to this invisible Being, and be convinced of his eternal power and Godhead.' The Gentiles in general, and the Athenians particularly, in their devotions, were governed, not by their philosophers, many of whom spake clearly and excellently well of one supreme Numen, and of his infinite perfections, and universal agency and dominion; (witness Plato, and long after, Cicero;) but by their poets and their idle fictions. Homer's works [with Hesiod's] were the Bible of the pagan theology, or demonology rather; and the philosophers tamely submitted to this, rested in their speculations, disputed them among themselves, and taught them their scholars, but never made the use they ought to have made of them in opposition to idolatry; so little certainty were they at concerning them, and so little impression did they make on them! Nay, they ran themselves into the superstition of their country, and thought they ought to do so.

Now Paul here sets himself, in the first place, to reform the philosophy of the Athenians, and to give them right notions of the one only living and true God, and then to carry the matter further than they ever attempted, to reform their worship, and to bring them off from their polytheism and idolatry. Observe what glorious things Paul here says of that God whom he served, and would have them to serve:

1. He is the God that made the world, and all things therein; the Father almighty, the Creator of heaven and earth. This was admitted by many of the philosophers; but those of Aristotle's school denied it, and maintained, 'that the world was from eternity, and everything always was what now it is.' Those of the school of Epicurus fancied, 'that the world was made by a fortuitous concourse of atoms, which, having been in a perpetual motion, at length accidentally jumped into this frame.' Against both these, Paul here maintains, that God, by the operations of an infinite power, according to the contrivance of an infinite wisdom, in the beginning of time made the world and all things therein; the rise of which was owing, not as they fancied, to an eternal matter, but to an eternal mind.

2. He is therefore Lord of heaven and earth, i. e. rightful Owner, Proprietor, and Possessor, of all the beings, powers, and riches of the upper and lower world, material and immaterial, visible and invisible. This follows from his making of heaven and earth. If He created all, without doubt He has the disposing of all; and where He gives being, has an indisputable right to give law.

3. He is, in a particular manner, the Creator of men, of all men, v. 26. He made of one blood all nations of men; He made the first man, He makes every man, is the Former of every man's body; and the Father of every man's spirit; He has made the nations of men, all nations in their political capacity; He made all of one blood, of one and the same nature, He fashions their hearts alike: descended from one and the same common ancestor, in Adam they are all akin, so they are in Noah, that hereby they might be engaged in mutual affection and assistance, as fellow-creatures and brethren, Mal. 2:10. He hath made them for to dwell on all the face of the earth, not to live in one place, but to be dispersed over all the earth; one nation, therefore, ought not to look with contempt, [or jealousy,] on another,* as the Greeks

* So Wayland, in another view. 'The most favorable commerce to any one country, is that, by which the riches of both countries are the most rapidly increased. A merchant, whose gains were all derived from the impoverishment of his customers, would very soon have none but paupers for neighbors. A nation, whose traffic caused the impoverishment of another nation, would very soon be obliged to discontinue commerce. The only traffic of this sort is the African slave-trade, and the result has been the almost entire depopulation of the slave coast. And thus we see in political economy, as in morals, every benefit is mutual: and we cannot, in the one case, any more than in the other, really do good to ourselves, without doing good to others; nor do good to others, without doing good to ourselves.'

'A good harvest in one country, is a benefit to every other country; because the favored country desires a larger amount of the productions of her neighbors, and has a larger fund wherewith to pay them. On the contrary, a famine, or a war, or any other calamity happening to one country, is a calamity to every other country, because the unfortunate country wants less of the productions of its neighbors; since it has less wherewith to pay for them. Hence that merchant is short-sighted, as well as morally thoughtless, who expects to grow rich by short crops, civil dissensions, calamity, or war, in the country with which he traffics. A wiser and farther-sighted reflection would teach him, that it is very difficult to grow rich by tradings with beggars, and that the benefit of one, is the benefit of all. What would be the amount of exchanges effected by the inhabitants of Great Britain, France, and the United States, either among themselves or with each other, if the productiveness of these several countries, were no greater than it was in the time of Julius Cæsar?'

Again: 'where virtue, frugality, and respect for right exist, riches will, by natural consequence, accumulate; and intellectual cultivation will, of necessity, succeed. So that all true benevolence may be defended, no less upon principles of political economy, than of philanthropy. The circulation of the Scriptures, the inculcation of moral and religious truth upon the mind of man, by means of Sabbath schools, and the preaching of the Gospel, are of the very greatest importance to the productive energies of a country. Intelligence, virtue, and equitable laws, will render men industrious, frugal, and consequently rich, and raise them from a savage to a civilized state. Just in proportion as a nation is thus transformed, are its products increased; the riches of the whole world are augmented; the portion of wealth which falls to the share of each man is rendered greater; and the ratio of capital to labor is higher. Just as a nation becomes intelligent and rich, its wants are multiplied, and the means of supplying them are provided. Hence, it becomes a better customer to other nations; it gives an additional impulse to their industry; and it repays them for their products, with whatever God has bestowed upon it, which will add to the happiness of others. . . . How much greater benefits does North America confer upon the world, than it would if it were peopled by its aboriginal inhabitants? How great a stimulus would be given to the industry of the world, at this time; and how greatly would the comforts and luxuries of men be increased, if Africa were peopled by civilized and Christianized men? . . . Civilized nations, then, could in no way so successfully promote their own interests, as by the universal dissemination of the principles of religion, and the means of education and religion.' Elts. Polit. Economy.

V. 23. Altar.] The ent, a classic relic, shows the form of some of these, with inscriptions. Their forms varied with the taste of the worshippers. To the unknown God.] Note, end of chapter. Ed.

(23.) There were several altars (in Athens, &c.) inscribed to 'the unknown gods;' (erected, so some, before sculpture was used, to deities forgotten in the lapse of time;) but we read not elsewhere of the one in Athens, 'to the unknown God,' of which Paul here speaks. See Bloomf. but Dr. A. Clarke also. Id.

V. 25. Wetst. here remarks, that Paul, with consummate art, so tempers his discourse, that at one time he contests on the side of the vulgar, against the philosophers: at another time with the philosophers, against the vulgar; and sometimes against both. 'Now the Stoics believed in the existence of one God, but the vulgar, thinking that all things could not be governed by one Being, divided the governance among many. The Stoics ascribed the origin of the human race to God. The common people of Athens thought that their nation had existed from all eternity: while the Epicureans ascribed the origin of men to fortuitous chance. The Stoics believed those only to be virtuous who had attained perfection. Paul teaches them that a conversion, or change for the better, is necessary for them also. The Stoics, moreover, taught that all things are bound by a fatalis necessitas: Paul, on the contrary, maintains, that the actions of men are to be imputed to themselves; so that they may be rewarded or punished for having done those things which it was in their power not to have done. Wetst.'

Bloomf. V. 26. Hath made of one blood.] Note, end of ch. Ed. 'In A. B., some others, with the Copt., Æth., Vulg., Itala, Clement, and Bede, the word blood is omitted; but blood is often used by the best writers, for race, stock, kindred. See many examples in Kypke.' Dr. A. C.—'By this expression the apostle showed them, in the most unaffected manner, that, though a Jew, he was not enslaved to any narrow views, but looked on all mankind as his brethren.' Doddr.—'Determining certain times and certain boundaries of the regions which they should inhabit.' Id.

27 That they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from every one of us :

28 For in him we live, and move, and have our being; as certain also of your own poets have said, For we are also his offspring.

29 Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device.

did on all other nations; for those on all the face of the earth are of the same blood. The Athenians boasted that they sprung out of their own earth, were aborigines, and nothing akin by blood to any other nation; which proud conceit of themselves the apostle here takes down.

4. That He is the great Benefactor of the whole creation, v. 25. He giveth to all life, and breath, and all things; He not only breathed into the first man the breath of life, but still breathes it into every man; He gave us these souls; He formed the spirit of man within him; He not only gave us our life and breath, when He brought us into being, but He is continually giving it us; his providence is a continued creation; He holds our souls in life; every moment our breath goes forth, but He graciously gives it us again the next moment; it is not only his air that we breathe in, but it is in his hand that our breath is, Dan. 5: 23. He gives to all the children of men their life and breath; for as the meanness of the children of men live on Him, and receive from Him, so the greatest, the wisest philosophers, and mightiest potentates, cannot live without Him; He gives to all, not only to all the children of men, but to the inferior creatures, to all animals, everything wherein is the breath of life, Gen. 6: 17. they have their life and breath from Him; and where He gives life and breath, He gives all things, all other things needful for the support of life. The earth is full of his goodness, Ps. 104: 24, 27.

5. That He is the sovereign Disposer of all the affairs of the children of men, according to the counsel of his will, v. 26. See here, (1.) The sovereignty of God's disposal concerning us; He hath determined every event, the matter is fixed; the disposals of Providence are incontestable, unchangeable, [Note, 2: 23.] (2.) The wisdom of his disposals; He hath determined what was before appointed; the determinations of the Eternal Mind are not sudden resolves, but the counterparts of an eternal counsel, the copies of divine decrees, Job 23: 14. Whatever comes forth from God, was before all worlds hid in God. (3.) The things about which his providence is conversant; these are time and place: the times and places of our living in this world, are determined and appointed by the God that made us. [1.] He has determined the times that are concerning us; times to us seem changeable, but God has fixed them. Our times are in his hands, to lengthen or shorten, imbitter or sweeten, as He pleases. He has appointed and determined our time to be born, and our time to die, Eccl. 3: 1, 2. and all that little that lies between them; the time of all our concerns in this world, whether prosperous times, or calamitous, He has determined them; and on Him we must depend, with reference to the times yet before us. [2.] He has also determined and appointed the bounds of our habitation; He that appointed the earth to be a habitation for the children of men, has appointed to the children of men a distinction of habitations on the earth; has instituted such a thing as property, to which He has set bounds, to keep us from trespassing one on another. The particular habitations in which our lot is cast, the place of our nativity and of our settlement, are of God's determining and appointing; which is a reason why we should accommodate ourselves to the habitations we are in, and make the best of that which is.

6. That He is not far from every one of us, v. 27. He is everywhere present, not only is at our right hand, but has possessed our reins, Ps. 159: 13. has his eye on us at all times, and knows us better than we know ourselves. Idolaters made images of God, that they might have Him with them in those images, which the apostle here shows the absurdity of; for He is an infinite Spirit, that is not far from any of us, and never the nearer, but in one sense the further off from us, for our pretending to realize or presentiate Him to ourselves by any image. He is nigh unto us, both to receive the homage we render Him, and to give the mercies we ask of Him, wherever we are; though near no altar, image, or temple. The Lord of all, as He is rich, Rom. 10: 12. so He is nigh, Deut. 4: 7. to all that call upon Him. He that will us to pray everywhere, assures us; that He is nowhere far from us; whatever country, nation, or profession, we are of, whatever our rank and condition in the world are, be we in a palace or in a cottage, in a crowd or in a corner, in a city or in a desert, in the depths of the sea or afar off on the sea, this is certain, God is not far from every one of us.

7. That in Him we live, and move, and have our being, v. 28. We have a necessary and constant dependence on his providence, as the streams on the spring, and the beams on the sun. (1.) In Him we live; i. e. the continuance of our lives is owing to Him and the constant influence of his providence; He is our Life, and the length of our days; if He suspend [his influence, or] the positive acts of his goodness, we die of ourselves. (2.) In Him we move; it is by the uninterrupted concurrence of his providence, that our souls move themselves in their outgoings and operations, that our thoughts run to and fro about a thousand subjects, and our affections run out toward their proper objects. It is likewise by Him that our souls move our bodies; we cannot stir a hand, or a foot, or a tongue, but by Him, who, as He is the first Cause, so He is the first Mover. (3.) In Him we have our being; not only from Him we had it at first, but in Him we have it still; to his continued care and goodness we owe it, not only that we have a being, and are not sunk into nonentity, but that we have our being, have this being, were and still are of such a noble rank of beings, capable of knowing and enjoying God; and are not thrust into the meanness of brutes, or the misery of devils.

8. That, upon the whole matter, we are God's offspring; He is our Father that begat us, Deut. 32: 6, 18. and He hath nourished and brought us up as children, Is. 1: 2. The confession of an adversary, in such a case, is always looked upon to be of use, therefore the apostle here quotes a saying of one of the Greek poets, Aratus, a native of Cilicia, Paul's countryman, who, in his Phænomena, in the beginning of his book, speaking of the heathen Jupiter, i. e. in the poetical dialect, the supreme God, says this of Him, 'for we are also his offspring.' And he might have quoted other poets to the purpose of what he was speaking, that in God we live and move, Virgil, Ovid, Lucan. But he chooses this of Aratus, as having much in a little. By this it appears, not only that Paul was himself a scholar, but that human learning is both ornamental and serviceable to a gospel-minister, especially for the convincing of those that are without; for it enables them to beat them at their own weapons, and to cut off Goliath's head with his own sword. How can the adversaries of truth be beaten out of their strong-holds by those that do not know them? It may likewise shame God's professing people, who forget their relation to God, and walk contrary to it, that a heathen poet could say of God, We are his offspring, formed by Him, formed for Him, more the care of his providence than ever any children were the care of their parents; and therefore are obliged to obey his commands, and acquiesce in his disposals, and to be unto Him for a name and a praise; since in Him and upon Him we live, we ought to live to Him; since in Him we move, we ought to move toward Him; and since in Him we have our being, and from Him we receive all the supports and comforts of our being, we ought to consecrate our being to Him, and to apply ourselves to Him for a new being, a better being, an eternal well-being.

III. From all these great truths concerning God, he infers the absurdity of their idolatry, as the prophets of old had done. If this be so,

1. Then God cannot be represented by an image. If we are the offspring of God, as we are spirits in flesh, then certainly He who is the Father of our spirits, is Himself a Spirit, and we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device, v. 29. We wrong God, and put an affront on Him, if we think so. God honored man in making his soul after his likeness; but man dishonors God, if he makes Him after the likeness of his body. The Godhead is spiritual, infinite, immaterial, and incomprehensible, therefore it is a very false and unjust conception which an image gives us of God, be the matter ever so rich, gold or silver; be the shape ever so curious, and be it ever so well graven by art and man's device, its countenance, posture, or dress, ever so significant, it is a teacher of lies.

2. Then He dwells not in temples made with hands, v. 24. He is not invited to any temple men can build for Him, nor confined to any. A temple is convenient for us to come together in to worship God; but God needs not any place of rest or residence, or the magnificence and splendor of any structure, to add to the glory of his appearance. A pious, upright heart, a temple not made with hands, but by the Spirit of God, is that which He dwells in, and delights to dwell in. See 1 K. 8: 27. Is. 66: 1, 2.

3. Then He is not worshipped, He is not served, or ministered unto, with men's hands, as though He needed anything, v. 25. He that

V. 28. In Him, &c. 'I. e. by,' Bloomf. In speculating on this text, we must avoid Spinosism, Soofeism, &c. the offspring of reasoning pride. Note, Dan. 3: 5. Ed.—For in Him we live, and move, and have our being. 'Live and are moved, and do exist.' No words can better express that continual and necessary dependence of all derived things, in their existence and all their operations, on their first and almighty Cause, which the truest philosophy, as well as theology, teaches. The thought, in words just like these, is found in an old Greek poet; but Paul does not mention it as a quotation; so that I rather think, with Le Clerc, that the poet borrowed it from hence, though to be sure, many of the ancients had before expressed themselves much to the same purpose. DODDR.

V. 29. Forasmuch then, &c., we ought, &c. 'Every man in the Areopagus must have felt the power of this conclusion.' Dr. A. C. Are the offspring of God. 'These words are well known to be found in Aratus, a poet of Cilicia, Paul's own country, who lived almost 300 years before this time. I wonder so few writers should have added, that they are, with the alteration of one only, to be found in the Hymn of Cleanthes to Jupiter, or the Supreme God, which I willingly mention as beyond comparison, the purest and finest piece of natural religion, of its length, which I know in the world of Pagan antiquity: and which, so far as I can recollect, contains nothing unworthy of a Christian, or, I had almost said, of an inspired pen.' DODDR.

31 Because he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness, by that man whom he hath ordained ; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead.

made all, and maintains all, cannot be benefited by any of our services, nor needs them. What need can God have of our services, or what benefit can He have by them, when He has all perfection in Himself, and we have nothing that is good but what we have from Him ? The philosophers, indeed, were sensible of this truth, that God has no need of us or our services ; but the vulgar heathen built temples, and offered sacrifices to their gods, with an opinion that they needed [and were obliged to them for] houses and food. See Job 35:5—8. Ps. 50:8, &c.

4. Then it concerns us all to inquire after God, v. 27. That they should seek the Lord, i. e. fear and worship Him in a right manner. Therefore God has kept the children of men in a constant dependence on Him for life, and all the comforts of life, that He might keep them under constant obligations to Him. Nothing, one would think, should be more powerful with us, to convince us that there is a God, and to engage us to seek his honor and glory in our services, and to seek our happiness in his favor and love, than the consideration of our own nature, especially the noble powers and faculties of our own souls. If we reflect on those, and contemplate these, we may perceive both our relation and obligation to a God above us. Yet, [as our natures have degenerated from the Adamic perfection of form and harmony,] so dark is this discovery, in comparison with that by divine revelation, and so unapt are we to receive it, that they who have no other, could but haply feel after God, and find Him. It was very uncertain whether they could by this searching find out God; it is but a peradventure, if haply they might. If they did find out something of God, yet it was but some confused notions of Him; they did but feel after Him, as men in the dark, or blind men, who lay hold on a thing that comes in their way, but know not whether it be that which they are in quest of or no.

V. 30, 31. God had indeed long borne with men's apostasy, ignorance, and idolatry : but 'the times of this ignorance' were expiring; and by his servants He now 'commanded all men, everywhere, to repent' of their idolatry and all other sins, and not to attempt any excuse or vindication of their conduct.—This was a most bold demand on the self-wise and self-admiring Stoics; and as opposite to their notions of virtue and of fatality, as to the Epicurean sentiments of chance and pleasure.—Thus far the apostle was permitted to proceed in introducing his subject; for much more he certainly intended to say, had not the levity and petulance of his audience constrained him to desist.—Contrast this address with the speculations of the Greek philosophers; with those of the Epicureans and the Stoics in particular. In this contrast, it appears dignified, rational, sublime. It asserts the Being and Unity of God; that He created the world, and all things in it; his universal providence; the intimate relation of men, all over the world, to each other; (though his hearers, the Greeks, had been accustomed to call the rest of mankind barbarians;) the palpable folly of idolatry, and its criminality, with calls to repentance: and it sets before them a future judgment, and a life beyond the grave: all this, in the compass of a few verses, in which not a word seems redundant, yet nothing is defective! Whence reflects on the endless mazes, in which these wise philosophers of Athens, and indeed all those of the ancient world, were wandering, on all these subjects, so awfully interesting; and compares the solid rationality of the sentiments, here so simply proposed, with their vain but ostentatious wisdom, must be very much struck indeed.—Then with regard to evidence. They had nothing to offer, but abstruse and bewildering reasonings, which were perfectly incomprehensible by the mass of mankind, and which brought home no effectual conviction to the mind of any one. All was among them without certainty, and without authority. But the apostle was able to confirm his doctrine, by arguments intelligible to all; the conclusiveness of which human nature feels, and cannot but feel. He would have appealed to miracles, (particularly the resurrection of Christ,) and to various other proofs; but his tired audience refused to hear him out.—The manner of the apostle, likewise, in addressing these idolaters and philosophers, who were

It is a very confused notion which this poet of their's has of the relation between God and man, and very general, that we are his offspring: as was also that of their philosophers. Pythagoras said, Men have a sort of a divine nature. And Heraclitus being asked, What men are? answered, Mortal gods; and, What are the gods? answered, Immortal men. And Pindar saith, God and man are near akin. It is true, that by the knowledge of ourselves, we may be led to the knowledge of God, but it is a very confused knowledge. This is but feeling after Him. We have therefore reason to be thankful, that by [and in] Christ, we have notices given us of God, much clearer than we could have by the light of nature; we do not now feel after Him, but with open face behold, as in a glass, the glory of God.

IV. He proceeds to call them all to repent of their idolatries, and to turn from them, v. 30, 31. This is the practical part of Paul's sermon before the university; having declared God to them, v. 23. from thence he properly presses on them repentance toward God; and would have taught them also faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ, if they would have had the patience to hear him. Having showed them the absurdity of their worshipping other gods, he persuades them to go on no longer in that foolish way of worship, but to return from it to the living and true God. Observe,

1. The conduct of God toward the Gentile world, before the Gospel came among them; The times of this ignorance God winked at. (1.) They were times of great ignorance; human learning flourished more than ever in the Gentile world, just before Christ's time; but in the things of God they were grossly ignorant. (2.) These times of ignorance God winked at. Understand it, [1.] As an act of divine justice. God despised or neglected these times of ignorance, and did not send them his Gospel, as now He does. Or rather, [2.] As an act of divine patience and forbearance; He winked at these times; He did not restrain them from these idolatries by sending prophets to them, as He did to Israel; He did not punish them in their idolatries, as He did Israel; but gave them the gifts of his providence, ch. 14:16, 17. Ps. 50:21. He did not give them such calls and motives to repentance as He does now; He let them alone; because they did not improve the light they had, but were willingly ignorant, He did not send them greater lights. Or, He was not quick and severe with them, but was long-suffering toward them, because they did it ignorantly, I Tim. 1:13.

strangers to the ancient Scriptures, and his reasoning with them on such principles as they allowed, or could not deny, should be compared with his addresses to the Jews, who professed to believe the Scriptures, and with whom he argued on the ground of that profession. Christianity might indeed be established by proofs, wholly independent of the O. T.; yet it called men to believe nothing, as actually accomplished, but what had been predicted, typified, or promised. Of this the inspired preachers never failed to avail themselves, in addressing the Jews; both as a most conclusive proof that their doctrine was from God, in addition to all miracles, and other internal and external evidences; and also, as peculiarly interesting to those who possessed, and professed to reverence, the sacred oracles. But to have brought proofs, from Scripture, to idolatrous or philosophizing Gentiles, would have been highly irrational; and Paul's example, especially in this particular, cannot be too carefully studied and copied by all, who are called to address infidels, or idolaters, or persons totally ignorant and careless in the concerns of religion.

(30.) God winked at. 'The beams of his eye did in a manner shoot over them.' Mr. Howe, in Doddr.—But now commandeth, &c. 'There is a dignity in this latter expression, becoming one who was conscious that he was indeed an ambassador from the King of heaven, who could (to allude to Livy's remarkable story) draw a circle about the greatest monarch, and demand a decisive answer before he stirred out of it.'

DODDR.

(31. Whereof He hath given assurance.) 'The sense of the argument is this: Jesus Christ, whom we preach as the Savior of men, has repeatedly told his followers that He would judge the world; and has described to us, at large, the whole of the proceedings of that awful time, Mat. 25:31. &c. John 5:25. Though He was put to death by the Jews, and thus became a victim for sin, yet God raised Him from the dead. By raising Him from the dead, God has set his seal to the doctrines He has taught: one of these doctrines is, that He shall judge the world; his resurrection, established by the most incontrovertible evidence, is therefore proof, an incontestable proof, that He [will] judge the world, according to his own declaration.'

redeemed it, by Him He governs it, and by Him He will judge it. (5.) God's raising Christ from the dead, is the great proof of his being appointed and ordained the Judge of quick and dead. His doing Him that honor, evidenced his designing Him this honor. God hath given assurance unto all men, sufficient ground for their faith to build on, both that there is a judgment to come, and that Christ will be their Judge; the matter is not left doubtful, but is of unquestionable certainty. (6.) The consideration of the judgment to come, and of the great hand Christ will have in that judgment, should engage us all to repent of our sins, and turn from them to God. This is the only way to make the Judge our Friend in that day, which will be a terrible day to all that live and die impenitent; but true penitents will then lift up their heads with joy, knowing that their redemption draws nigh.

V. 32—34. Here is a short account of the issue of Paul's preaching at Athens.

I. Few were the better: the Gospel had as little success there, as anywhere; for the pride of the philosophers there, as of the Pharisees at Jerusalem, prejudiced them against it.

PRACT. OBS. It is most evident, from this history, that the zealous servants of Christ must be despised and hated, by all kinds of unconverted persons, for his sake. Nothing, however, shall in any wise hurt them; and nothing should dismay them, or deter them from publishing the glad tidings of salvation.—But how strange is it, that men should grudge and envy others those privileges, of which they will not themselves accept! and that zeal for religious creeds or systems should induce them 'to take to themselves wicked men of the baser sort,' to set cities in an uproar, to assault and destroy men's houses, and to lay wait for their lives! Such proceedings disgrace and betray every cause they are brought to support; and the friends of truth and piety must mourn and lament, if any of their professed associates, take weapons of this kind from the enemies of God and his people, and use them to their annoyance. Mobs are always incompetent judges of liberty and privileges; and how egregiously absurd it is, for them and their leaders, to exclaim against others, as disturbers of the peace and order of the community!—But the kingdom of Christ is not of this world; and his most faithful servants will be the most peaceable subjects to that authority, which Providence places over them; they will be ready to obey the decrees of Cesar, unless he command them to break the laws of their other and more exalted 'King,' even 'Jesus,' 'the Prince of the kings of the earth;' and then they will meekly endure persecution for conscience' sake.—True dignity and nobleness of spirit greatly consist in an enlarged and unprejudiced mind, open to conviction, willing to investigate the truth, to examine the evidence adduced in support of men's opinions, and to treat religious inquirers with candor, seriousness, and diligence.—Nothing can be more ignoble and base, than bigotry and persecution; and many, who appear devout in their way, have, in every age and place, been most inveterate against the truth, and most active in stirring up others to oppose it.—The spiritual mind, however ingenious or cultivated, can take little delight in contemplating the most admired productions of science and genius, while it observes, that the persons concern-

V. 32. Given assurance. [Pistin paraschōn: Raphael, Krebs, Locsner, and Fischer, have learnedly illustrated this formula, and satisfactorily proved that it has no reference to what theologians call the "saving word," by which God operates faith in those who obey it, but merely signifies, "produce faith," by bringing forward arguments sufficient for the proof of anything; and thus confirm and establish its truth. So Polyb., Jos. The above critics have, moreover, shown, that pistis often signifies the arguments serving to establish any truth. See Appian, Thucyd., Strabo, &c.]

V. 34. Dionysius. 'Humanly speaking, his conversion must have been an acquisition of considerable importance to the Christian religion; for no person was a judge in the Areopagus, who had not borne the office of archon, or chief governor of the city, and was not of the highest reputation among the people, for his intelligence and exemplary conduct. The stories of the popish writers, about Dionysius being raised to the dignity of first bishop of Athens, by Paul himself, the judicious Calmet says, "have little foundation."'

Concluding Notes. — On the Philosophies of Greece, v. 18. Epicureans and Stoics, v. 18. — There were then two other sects at Athens, viz. the Academic (or Platonic) and the Peripatetic. But of these there is no mention; either because the Platonic dogmas seemed, for the most part, to make nearer approaches to Christianity, inasmuch that those of that sect, (as Valck. thinks,) would probably listen

1. Some ridiculed Paul and his preaching; they heard him patiently till he came to speak of the resurrection of the dead, v. 32. and then some began to hiss him, they mocked; what he had said before, was somewhat like what they had sometimes heard in their own schools; and some notion they had of a resurrection, as it signifies a future state; but if he speak of a resurrection of the dead, though it be of Christ Himself, it is altogether incredible to them, and they cannot so much as hear it, as being contrary to a principle of their philosophy,—Life, when once lost, is irrecoverable. They had deified their heroes after their death; but they never thought of their being raised from the dead, therefore they could by no means reconcile themselves to this doctrine of Christ's being raised from the dead. We are not to think it strange, if sacred truths, of the greatest certainty and importance, are made the scorn of profane wits.

2. Others were willing to take time to consider of it; they would not at present comply with what Paul said, or oppose it; but we will hear thee again of this matter of the resurrection from the dead. It should seem, they overlooked what was plain, and shifted off the application and the improvement of that, by starting objections against what would admit a debate. Thus many lose the benefit of the practical doctrines of Christianity, by wading beyond their depth into controversy; or rather, by objecting against that which has some difficulty in it; whereas, if any man were disposed and determined to do the will of God, as far as it is discovered to him, [and did it,] he should [constantly advance in the discovery of God's will, should, in particular,] know of the doctrine of Christ, that it is of God, and not of man, John 7:17. Those that would not yield to the present convictions of the Word, thought to get clear of them, as Felix did, by putting them off to another opportunity; they will hear of it again some time or other, but they know not when; and thus the devil cozens them of all their time, by cozening them of the present time.

3. Paul thereupon left them, for the present, to consider of it, v. 33. He departed from among them, as seeing little likelihood of doing any good with them at this time; but, it is likely, with a promise to those that were willing to hear him again, that he would meet them whenever they pleased.

II. Yet some were wrought upon, v. 34:

1. There were certain men that clave to him, and believed; when he departed from among them, they would not part with him so; wherever he went, they would follow him, with a resolution to adhere to the doctrine he preached, which they believed. 2. Two are particularly named; one was an eminent man, Dionysius the Areopagite; one of that high court, or great council, that sat in Areopagus, or Mars-hill. The accounts the ancients give of him is, that he was bred at Athens, had studied astrology in Egypt, where he took notice of the miraculous eclipse at our Savior's passion, that, returning to Athens, he became a senator; disputed with Paul, and was by him converted from his error and idolatry; and, being by him thoroughly instructed, was made the first bishop of Athens. So Eusebius, lib. 5. cap. 4. lib. 4. cap. 22. The woman, named Damaris, was, as some think, the wife of Dionysius; but rather, some other person of quality; and though there was not so great a harvest gathered in at Athens as there was at some other places, yet these few being wrought upon there, Paul had no reason to say he had labored in vain, [for how shall we estimate the worth of but a single soul!]

ed are wholly enslaved to sin, or given up to impiety and infidelity.—None are more childish in their superstitions, more impious in their speculations, or more credulous of absurd impostures, than some most eminent for genius and learning have been and are. The truths of the Gospel are, in some respects, as old as the fall of man; yet they are often 'strange things' in the ears even of the learned; and they, whose lives have been almost entirely spent in studying, hearing, or telling 'some new thing,' are frequently totally unacquainted with 'the good old way' to heaven; and talk about it in the most obscure and perplexed manner.—In addressing mankind about their souls, and eternal salvation, or its awful reverse, we should study their peculiar dispositions and opinions; and inquire what truths they admit, and what errors they maintain. Thus we may be able to combat them, from their own principles, and gradually point out the absurdity of their tenets, and the inconsistency of their conduct; and we may often graft the truth on such sentiments as they allow.—Sometimes we may produce the testimony of poets and prophets of their own, in confirmation of our sentiments; and if a man have acquired classical learning and general knowledge, he may thus make a good use of them; yet it is scarcely advisable for those, who are intended for the ministry, to spend any very great proportion of their valuable time, about these indecent fables and corrupt principles and practices, which must engross much attention, from those who aspire to proficiency in this kind of learning.—Notwithstanding all the renown of Athens, and of ancient Greece, God deemed those 'the times' and places 'of ignorance;' and He commanded them, yea, He commands us, and 'all men everywhere to repent;' nor will any proud pretensions to virtue, or vain reasonings about necessity or contingency, or any philosophical or theological system, excuse men in neglecting this call.

to Paul with some interest, when he discoursed, as was his custom, on the immortality of the soul, while the Peripatetics were, in that age, of far less celebrity; or, because they did not attend Paul's discourse; which, indeed, is not improbable, since their places of philosophical discussion, the Academia and Peripatus, were out of the city, and far removed from the Eretrian forum, [note v. 17.]

The Epicureans were, in fact, Atheists, maintaining that the world was not created by God, nor had any care been bestowed on it by Him. They accounted pleasure as the summum bonum; and therefore they directed, that virtue was to be cultivated for the sake of the pleasure, but not for itself. They maintained, that the soul would, after its departure from the body, perish together with it, and that thus there was nothing to be hoped or feared after death. See Cic., Seneca, Plut., Diog. Laert., Lucret., Clem. Alex., Brucker, and Borne.

The Stoics were of opinion, that the nature of God was fiery, and that it was diffused throughout all parts of the world. See Stob., Plut., Cic., Sen. They acknowledged that the world was created by God, but maintained that all things were bound by a kind of fatal necessity, to which they imagined even the Deity Himself to be subject. See Plut., Gellius, Sen. They denied that the wise man yielded in any respect to Jupiter. So Sen. Epistles 53 and 73. They denied the immortality of souls; though on the condition of souls after death, they varied in opinion. Cleanthes maintained the existence of all souls until the burning of the world. See Laert., Cic. Chrysippus, however, limited this to the souls of the good and wise. See Plut. and Laert. Others maintained, that the soul, when released from the bonds and imprisonment of the body, immediately returned to the celestial fire, namely, to God Himself. No wonder, then, Paul's doctrines, opposite as possible to these, seemed to them so unaccountable and unacceptable. Klein.

To the above accurate account of these two sects, a few particulars may be added from our own theologians. 'The Epicurean notions (says Dodd.) came near to those 8 Paul laboreth with his hands, and preacheth at Corinth to the Gentiles. 9 The Lord encourageth him in a vision. 12 He is accused before Gallio the deputy, but is dismissed. 18 Afterwards passing from city to city, he strengtheneth the disciples. 24 Apollos, being more perfectly instructed by Aquila and Priscilla, 28 preacheth Christ with great efficacy.

AFTER these things, Paul departed from Athens, and came to Corinth :

2 And found a certain Jew named <sup>a</sup> Aquila, born in Pontus, lately come from Italy, with his wife Priscilla ; (because that Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome ; ) and came unto them.

3 And because he was of the same craft, he abode with them, and <sup>b</sup> wrought : for by their occupation they were tent-makers.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 1—6. Paul was not persecuted at Athens, but, having little prospect of doing good there, he departed, leaving the care of those there who believed, with Dionysius ; and from thence he came to Corinth, where he was now instrumental in planting a church that became, on many accounts, considerable. Corinth was the chief city of Achaia, now a province of the of our gay world ; and as to the Stoics, though different writers, according to their fondness for, or prejudices against, the philosophy of the pagans, and of this sect in particular, have represented their doctrines in a very different view ; and, indeed, the notorious inconsistency between some of their own writers and some of the ancients in their accounts of them, has greatly perplexed the matter : yet I think Dr. Benson has expressed himself, on the whole, in a very impartial and judicious manner. "Some of them exempted the human will from fatality ; and maintained, that virtue was its own sufficient reward, and vice its own sufficient punishment. As to their belief of future rewards and punishments, they exceedingly fluctuated ; though they had some expectations of a future state of existence, as well as of the conflagration and renovation of the world ; with relation to which, several of them seem to have expected a continual revolution of exactly similar events, at equally distant periods of time." DODDR.

Ep. Pearce has, with equal brevity, spirit, and truth, observed : "The Epicureans acknowledged no gods, except in name only ; and they absolutely denied that they exercised any providence over the world : and while the Stoics professed to believe both the existence of the gods, and their providence in the world, they attributed all human actions to fate ; and so destroyed the foundation of all religion, as much as the atheistical Epicureans did." Bloomf.

On the Unity of the Human Race, v. 26.

Some having disputed that men are all of one blood, i. e. race, the physiological proofs, in part, were (in Vol. I.) promised. The Ed. finds nothing more to the purpose than Wiseman's Lects. 1—4, (to which the reader is referred,) whose object is to show "how the very sciences whence objections have been drawn against [revealed] religion, have themselves [being more deeply studied] in their progress entirely removed them."

Blumenbach distinguishes the inhabitants of the earth, by the width of the skull, into 3 varieties, Mongul (olive or yellow), Caucasian (white), Negro (black), and 2 intermediate classes, the Malay (between the Caucasian and Negro), and the American (between the Caucasian and Mongul) ; the Malay being tawny, and the American red, or copper-colored. In every race, there is occasionally a morbid variety, called albino. The Caucasian comprehends all the nations of Europe, excepting the Laplanders, Finlanders, and Hungarians ; the inhabitants of W. Asia, including Arabia, Persia, and upwards as far as the river Oby, the Caspian Sea, and the Ganges ; and those of N. Africa. The Negro race comprises all the rest of Africa. The Mongul embraces all Asia, but the Caucasian and Malayan, the Hungarian, Finlander, Laplander, and Esquimaux. The Malayan embraces the natives of Malacca and the Papuans, i. e. the Australians and Polynesians. The American includes all the aborigines of the new world, except the Esquimaux.

The great problem to be solved is, how could such varieties as we have seen, have taken their rise in the human species ? Was it by a sudden change, which altered some portion of one great family into another ; or are we to suppose a gradual degradation, as naturalists call it, whereby some nations or families passed gradually through successive shades, from one extreme to the other ? And, in either case, what is to be considered the original stock ? It must be owned, that the present state of this science does not warrant us in expressly deciding in favor of either hypothesis ; nor, consequently, in even discussing the last consequence. But, independently of this, it has arrived so far, as to leave no reasonable room to doubt the common origin of every race. For, I think we may say, after looking through all that has been done in this yet infant science, that the following points, embracing all the elements of the problem, have been satisfactorily solved :

(1.) Accidental, or, as they are called, sporadic varieties, may arise in one race, tending to produce in it the characteristics of another. A close analogy exists, of course, between man and other animals : now, the skull of the wild boar (so Blumenb.) differs not less from the tame swine, its undoubted descendant, than do the skulls of any two human races from one another. The mastiff's and greyhound's skulls differ far more. So of all domestic cattle. Changes in the hair are no less ordinary and remarkable. Fowls and dogs in Guinea are as black as the inhabitants. Swine and sheep in Italy are mostly black, in England white. Sheep in the West Indies and other hot climates entirely lose their wool, and become covered with hair. Around Angora, almost every animal, sheep, goats, rabbits, and cats, have beautiful long silken hair ; dogs and horses carried into the hills, from India, are soon covered with wool, like the shawl-goats of that climate. Contrast the slow, massive, long-horned ox of Rome, with the small-headed, clean-limbed breed an English farmer most prizes. On the Gold Coast, dogs strangely degenerate ; their ears grow long and stiff, and their color reddish, like the fox, their barking in 3 or 4 broods turns to a howl or yelp. Comp. the one and two bumped camel, the bunch of the zebu, the tail of the Syrian sheep, and the formation on the loins of the Bosjan Hottentots.

(2.) These varieties may be perpetuated. Witness the number of albino animals, as white rabbits, or cream-colored horses, which probably arose originally from disease. A sheep, deformed by the accident of being born with very short legs, transmitted this to its posterity, which are the valued ancon or otter breed, in England. Why may not the same causes have similarly operated in the human race ? Buckingham relates a case, on the E. of Jordan, of a family of unmixed Arab descent, who, except the father, had negro features, a deep black color, and crisped hair. Red hair is occasionally noticed, not only in the Caucasian, but among the Esquimaux, Papuans, Tahitians, and negroes. Indeed, all the Arabs of the Jordan valley, have flatter features, darker skins, and coarser hair than any other tribes. The peculiarity of 6 fingers, runs in some families, &c. The most remarkable case of transmission of varieties, is that in the family of Lambert, (called the porcupine man.) who, with his children and grandchildren, were covered except the soles, palms, and face, with "warts as thick as packthread, and half an inch long," or "a series of horny excrescences (shed once a year) of a reddish brown, hard, elastic," of that length, which rustled against one another when rubbed by the hand. "Past all doubt, then, a race may be empire, [and the seat of government of Greece,] a rich and splendid city. Now here we have,

1. Paul working for his living, v. 2, 3.

1. Though bred a scholar, yet he was master of a handicraft trade. He was a tent-maker, an upholsterer ; he made tents for the use of soldiers and shepherds, of cloth or stuff, or (as some say, tents were then generally made) of leather or skins, as the outer covering of the tabernacle. Hence to live in tents was to live under skins. Dr. Lightfoot shows, that it was the [laudable] custom of the Jews, [still prevalent in the E.] to bring up their children to some trade, yea, though they gave them learning or estates. Rabbi Judah says, 'He that teaches not his son a trade, is as if he taught him to be a thief.' And another saith, 'He that has a trade in his hand, is as a vineyard that is fenced.' 2. Though entitled to a maintenance from the churches, yet he worked to get bread ; which is more to his praise, who did not ask for supplies, than to their's, who did not supply him unasked, knowing what straits he was reduced to. See how humble Paul was ; but he had learned of his Master, who came not to be ministered to, but to minister. See how industrious he was ; even those that are redeemed from the curse of the law, are not exempt from that sentence, In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat bread. See how careful

Paul was to recommend his ministry ; he therefore maintained himself with his own labor, that he might not make the Gospel of Christ burdensome, 2 Cor. 11:7, &c. 2 Thess. 3:8, 9. 3. We may suppose he was master of his trade, yet he wrought with Aquila and Priscilla, who were of that calling ; so that he got no more than day-wages. Poor tradesmen must be thankful if their callings bring them in a maintenance for themselves, and their families, though they cannot do as the rich merchants that raise estates by their callings. 4. Though himself a great apostle, yet he chose to work with Aquila and Priscilla, because he found them intelligent in the things of God, as appears afterward, v. 26. and he owns they had been his helpers in Christ Jesus, Rom. 16:3. This is an example to those who go to service, to seek for those services in which they may have the best help for their souls.

Concerning this Aquila we are here told, he was a Jew, born in Pontus, v. 2. Many Jews of the dispersion were seated in that country, as appears, 1 Pet. 1:1. He was lately come from Italy to Corinth, because by a late edict of the emperor Claudius Cesar, all Jews were banished from Rome ; for the Jews were generally hated ; every occasion was taken to put hardship and disgrace on them ; God's heritage was as a speckled bird, the birds round about were against her, Jer. 12:9. The Gentiles had such confused nopropagated by this man, with this same rugged coat, and if the accidental origin should be forgotten, it is not impossible they might be deemed a different species of mankind." Might not the different races owe their origin to some similar ancestral accident ? It has been proved by Le Cat, Camper, and Lawrence, that the skin of the fairest European, may, under certain circumstances, become as black as a negro's, over the whole or a great part of the body ; so may we suppose, that the principle which causes the change, and which is evidently inherent in the white, may, under the influence of peculiar climate, be brought into activity, and rendered perpetual by descent.

(3.) Climate, food, civilization, &c., may strongly influence the production of varieties, or, at least, render them fixed, characteristic, and perpetual. Some changes from climate, &c., are above noted : generally speaking, the whitest nations are nearer the pole, and the darkest more under the influence of tropical heat ; but we know not the principles on which color depends ; for the negro child of ten days, however sheltered from the sun, turns black, as well as the European exposed to a tropical sun ; scarce a shade of difference can be discovered in the color of the aborigines from one extremity of America to the other. But that climate gives color, though by laws not fully known, is evident, for the features of the Caucasian race are found perfectly black in Abyssinia ; Burckhardt notes Turks and Arabs by origin, becoming black in Africa ; and the Portuguese, in 300 years residence in India, have become black as Caffres ; a negro brought to Europe, was known to have got quite a light complexion ; not only on the coast, but in the very heart of Central Africa, are many nations of various races and physiognomy, some without a sign of negro features, who yet are perfectly of a glossy black. The Mogul children and women are remarkably white ; smoke and exposure to the sun give the men their yellow tint. Cuvier has noticed that domestication makes the greatest changes in animals ; civilization comes nearest to this agent in man, and adds moral influences. House slaves improve physically, while field slaves remain the same, in the U. S. Wandering Arabs are spare, thin-bearded, small ; sedentary ones, stout, thick-bearded, large. So the well-fed chiefs are taller and stouter than their half-starved subjects. In some nations, probably from the use of food requiring great mastication, the incisor teeth become blunt and rounded, and the canine teeth are undistinguishable from the grinders. This is the case with many, perhaps most, Egyptian mummies, and with the Greenlanders and Esquimaux, who eat their meat uncooked, with most extraordinary contortions of jaw.

After showing that races, proved to be the same by language, have run into and become identified with races quite different in color and physical characteristics, and learnedly following out the above propositions more fully, Dr. Wiseman thus sums up the results :—

"Imperfect as the study yet remains, we have seen it established : 1. Among animals acknowledged to be of one species, there have arisen varieties similar to those in the human race, and not less diverse from one another. 2. Nature tends, in the human species, to produce varieties in one race approaching to the characteristics of the others. 3. Sporadic varieties, of the most extraordinary sort, may be propagated by descent. 4. We can find sufficient proofs in the languages and in the characteristics of larger bodies, or entire nations compared, of their transition from one race to another. 5. Though the origin of the black race is yet involved in mystery, yet are there sufficient facts collected to prove the possibility of its having arisen from another ; particularly if, in addition to the action of heat, we admit that of moral causes acting upon the physical organization." Wiseman.

The Ed. thinks the most conclusive argument of the unity of origin contended for, is derived from the complete uniformity throughout the human race in the number of the primitive faculties (with their organs) of every individual, as shown by the science of phenology. Ed.

NOTES. CHAP. XVIII. V. 2. 'There had been a congregation of Christians at Rome, from the earliest periods of the Gospel, which originated (as some think) with certain of those who had been present at the feast of Pentecost, when the Holy Spirit was imparted ; and was doubtless fostered and promoted by those Jewish Christians who had occasion to repair to that city on commercial or other business. Pontus.] Many Jews were settled in this province, probably on account of the considerable commerce which was carried on thence with most parts of the civilized world. Priscilla.] Diminutive of Prisca, as she is called, 2 Tim. 4:19. Anciently, names of persons, especially of females, were sometimes pronounced in the simple, and sometimes in the diminutive form ; as Terentilla, Catullus, &c.' Bloomf.—Command all Jews, &c.] 'I pretend not certainly to determine, whether that Christus, whom Suetonius mentions as the occasion of those tumults among the Jews, for which they were expelled from Rome, were, as Usher and Vandale suppose, a seditious Jew, or whether, as it is generally thought, the name be a corruption of Christus : yet I think the latter much more probable, and that the spread of Christianity, which was looked upon as a sect of the Jews, and which we know prevailed at Rome about this time, gave that jealous and wretched emperor an unnecessary alarm. the occasion of which Suet., not thoroughly understanding it, has misrepresented. And if this were the case, it might be, as Lardner well observes, an additional reason why Jos., who is always cautious on this head, has passed over it without notice.' DODDR.

4 And he reasoned in the <sup>c</sup>synagogue every sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks.

5 And when <sup>d</sup>Silas and Timotheus were come from Macedonia, Paul was pressed in spirit, and testified to the Jews that Jesus <sup>e</sup>was Christ.

6 And when they opposed <sup>f</sup>themselves, and blasphemed, he shook <sup>g</sup>his raiment, and said unto them, Your <sup>b</sup>blood be upon your own heads; I am clean: from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles.

7 And he departed thence, and entered into a certain man's house, named Justus, one that worshipped God, whose house joined hard to the synagogue.

8 And <sup>i</sup>Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord, with all his house: and many of the Corinthians hearing, believed, and were baptized.

9 ¶ Then spake the Lord to Paul in the night by a vision, Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace:

tions, they could not distinguish between a Jew and a Christian. Suetonius, in the Life of Claudius, speaks of this decree in the ninth year of his reign, and says, The reason was, because the Jews were a turbulent people,—assiduo tumultuantes; and that it was impulsore Christo,—upon the account of Christ; some zealous for Him, others bitter against Him, which occasioned great heats, such as gave umbrage to the government, and provoked the emperor, who was a timorous, jealous man, to order them all to be gone. If Jews persecute Christians, it is not strange if heathens persecute both.

II. Paul preaching to the Jews, both the native Jews and the Greeks, i. e. those that were more or less proselyted to the Jewish religion, and frequented their meetings.

1. He reasoned with them in the synagogue publicly every Sabbath. See in what way the apostles propagated the Gospel, by fair arguing; God invites us to come and reason with Him, Is. 1:18. 41:21. Paul was a rational as well as scriptural preacher.

2. He persuaded them; it denotes, either the urgency of his preaching; he followed his arguments with affectionate persuasions: or, its good effect; he persuaded them, i. e. prevailed with them; so some. He brought them over to his own opinion. Some were convinced by his reasonings, and yielded to Christ.

V. 1—6. Some think the preaching about this time at Rome, that Jesus was the promised Messiah, and 'the King of Israel,' gave occasion to this severity; but this is very uncertain. Paul, however, being acquainted with the character of these two excellent persons, went to lodge with them; and having in his youth learned their trade of making tents, which were much used in those warm climates, he wrought at it for his livelihood.—Whatever assistance Paul received from the churches at Antioch, or Philippi, or other cities, he was often reduced to great necessity, by the expenses of his journeys; and we learn from many intimations in his writings, that he frequently wrought with his own hands for his subsistence, lest he should be chargeable to his converts.—On the sabbath-days, however, as usual, 'he reasoned' with the Jews at Corinth in the synagogue, concerning the kingdom and salvation of Christ, and endeavored to 'persuade' both them, and the Gentiles, who joined in their worship, to believe in Jesus as the Messiah.—(5.) Pressed in Spirit.] It is not to be supposed, that the apostle was excited, or constrained, by a vehemence of natural temper, to act improperly on this occasion; and if the ardor of his own spirit was holy, no doubt it was excited by the Holy Spirit. On the other hand, how can it be supposed, that the Holy Spirit urged and constrained him, except by exciting and invigorating holy affections in his heart?

(5.) Pressed in spirit.] Rather, now, when his help was come, instabat verbo, (Vulg.) he applied himself closely to the work of teaching. So Kuin.; and most commentators of the last century prefer the reading logō (of MSS. and Verss.), i. e. word, &c., instead of pneumatī, [106]

3. He was yet more earnest in this matter when his fellow-laborers came, v. 5. and brought him good tidings from the churches in Macedonia, and were ready to assist him, and strengthened his hands, then Paul was more than before pressed in spirit, which made him more than ever pressing in his preaching. He was grieved for the obstinacy and infidelity of his countrymen the Jews, was more intent than ever on their conversion, and the love of Christ constrained him to it, 2 Cor. 5:14. it is the word used here, it pressed him in spirit to it. And being thus pressed, he testified to the Jews, with all possible solemnity and seriousness, as that which he was perfectly well assured of himself, and attested to them as a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Jesus is the Christ, the Messiah promised to the fathers, and expected by them.

III. He abandons the unbelieving Jews, v. 6.

1. Many, indeed most of them, persisted in their contradiction; opposed and blasphemed; they set themselves in battle array, so the word signifies, against the Gospel. They resolved they would not believe it themselves, and would do all they could to keep others from believing it; they could not argue against it, but what was wanting in reason they made up in ill language; they blasphemed, spake reproachfully of Christ, and in Him of God Himself, as Rev. 13:5, 6. To justify their infidelity, they broke out into downright blasphemy.

2. Paul, that was pressed in spirit to testify to them, v. 5. when they opposed that testimony, and persisted in their opposition, was pressed in spirit to testify against them, v. 3. and his zeal herein also he showed by a sign, he shook his raiment, shaking off the dust of it, as before they shook off the dust of their feet, ch. 13:15. for a testimony against them. He had done his part, and was clean from the blood of their souls; it is very comfortable to a minister to have the testimony of his conscience for him, that he has faithfully discharged his trust by warning sinners. They would certainly perish if they persisted in their unbelief, and the blame would lie wholly on themselves; if anything would frighten them at last into a compliance with the Gospel, surely this would.

3. Having given them over, yet he does not give over his work; From henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles; and the Jews cannot complain. The guests that were first invited will not come, and the provision must not be lost, guests must be had therefore from the highways and the hedges. Thus the fall and diminishing of the Jews were the riches of the Gentiles; and Paul said this to their faces, not only as what he could justify, but to provoke them to jealousy, Rom. 11:12, 14.

V. 7—11. Here we are told,

I. That Paul changed his quarters, v. 7.

It should seem, not to lodge, for he continued with Aquila and Priscilla, but to preach; it was not the first time God's ark had taken up its lodging in a private house. The man was one that worshipped God: not an idolater, though a Gentile, but a worshipper of the God of Israel, and Him only, as Cornelius: that Paul might give the less offence to the Jews, though he had abandoned them, he set up his meeting [in some large room, comp. 19:9. in] that man's house, which was next door to the synagogue; not chosen to draw people from the synagogue to the meeting; but I rather think in charity, to show that he was ready to return to them if they were but willing to receive his message, and would not contradict and blaspheme as they had done.

II. That Paul saw the good fruit of his labors presently, both among Jews and Gentiles.

1. Crispus a Jew, an eminent one, believed on the Lord Jesus, with all his house, v. 8. It was for the honor of the Gospel, that there were some rulers, and persons of the first rank both in church and state, that embraced it. This would leave the Jews inexcusable, that the ruler of their synagogue, who may be supposed to have excelled the rest in knowledge of the Scriptures, and zeal for their religion, believed the Gospel, and yet they opposed and blasphemed it. Not only he, but his house, believed, and, probably, were baptized with him by Paul. 1 Cor. 1:14.

2. Many of the Corinthians, who were Gentiles, and some of them of an ill character, as appears, 1 Cor. 6:11. hearing, believed, and were baptized: probably most came only for curiosity, but hearing, they believed, by the power of God working on them; and believing, they were baptized, and so fixed for Christ.

III. That Paul was encouraged by a vision to go on with his work at Corinth, v. 9. when musing on his work, communing with his own heart upon his bed, and considering whether he should continue here or no, what method he should take here, and what probability there was of doing good, then Christ appeared very seasonably to him, and in the multitude of his thoughts within him delighted his soul with divine consolations.

1. He renewed his commission and charge to preach the Gospel, 'Be not afraid of the Jews, though very outrageous, (and perhaps the more enraged by the conversion of the chief ruler of their synagogue,) or of the magistrates of the city, for they have no power against thee but what is given them from above. It is the cause of heaven thou art pleading, do it boldly; speak out, use all the liberty of spirit that becomes an ambassador for Christ.'

2. He assured him of his presence with him, which was sufficient to put life and spirit into him; I am with thee, to protect thee, bear thee out, and deliver thee from all thy fears. The same promise ratified the spirit. Our English critics have contended for it with ability.' Bloomf., whom see.

(6.) Blood, &c.] The phrase is thought to have had origin in 'the custom of the Hebrews, Egyptians, &c., to put their hands on the heads of victims, imprecating on them the evils which hung over the sacrificer or the people.' The Turks, &c., still have a custom of swearing 'upon their head,' placing the hand there.

V. 8. 'Several persons bore office in a Jewish synagogue (like the Ruling Elders in the Scottish church): the chief was called simply, the Archisynagogus (synagogue-ruler). See 13:15. Mat. 9:18.' Bloomf.

V. 9—11. The apostle, at this time, seems to have been greatly discouraged in respect of his ministry, by the virulent enmity of the Jews, and the dissolute character of the Gentiles; and especially by a consciousness of his own insufficiency, and manifold infirmities. 1 Cor. 2:3—5. 2 Cor. 10:7—11. 12:7—10. Gal. 4:12—16. (10.) In this he evidently spake of those, who were his by election, the gift of the Father, and the purchase of his atonement, though at that time in an unconverted state. John 6:36—40. 10:14—18. 11:49—53.—People, &c.] 'So they are called, who are still heathens, not because of any absolute decree of their election to eternal life; but because Christ saw that they were disposed to believe, and by faith become his people; as elsewhere, (John 10:16.) he calls those his sheep who should hereafter believe in Him.' Whitby. Thus, in opposing the doctrine of God's decrees, and predestination, the original depravity and carnal enmity of the human heart, and the necessity of regeneration,

10 For I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee, to hurt thee: for I have much people in this city.

11 And he continued there a year and six months, teaching the word of God among them.

12 ¶ And when Gallio was the deputy of Achaia, the Jews made insurrection with one accord against Paul, and brought him to the judgment-seat, 13 Saying, This fellow persuadeth men to worship God contrary to the law.

14 And when Paul was now about to open his mouth, Gallio said unto the Jews, If it were a matter of wrong, or wicked lewdness, O ye Jews, reason would that I should bear with you; general commission, Mat. 28:19, 20. They that have Christ with them, need not to fear, and ought not to shrink.

Mat. 28:20. k sat there. 1 Ja. 2:6. m Ro. 13:3.

3. He gave him a warrant of protection to save him harmless; 'No man shall set on thee to hurt thee.' He does not promise, that no man should set on him, for the next news we hear, is, that he is set upon, and brought to the judgment-seat, v. 12. but 'No man shall set on thee to hurt thee; the remainder of their wrath shall be restrained; thou shalt not be beaten and imprisoned here, as thou wast at Philippi.' Or, we may take it more generally, No man shall set on thee, to do evil to thee; whatever trouble they may give thee, there is no real evil in it. They may kill thee, but they cannot hurt thee; for I am with thee, Ps. 23:4. Is. 41:10.

4. He gave him a prospect of success; 'For I have much people in this city.' The Lord knows them that are, yea, and that shall be his: for it is by his work on them that they become his, and known unto Him are all his works. I have them, though they yet know Me not; for the Father has given them Me; I have them written in the book of life; and of all that were given Me I will lose none; I have them, for I am sure to have them; whom He did predestinate, them He called. In this city, though a very profane, wicked city, full of impurity, and the more so, for a temple of Venus there, to which there was a great resort; yet in this heap, that seems to be all chaff, there is wheat; in this ore, that seems to be all dross, there is gold. Let us not despair concerning any place, when even in Corinth, Christ had much people.

IV. That upon this encouragement he made a long stay there, v. 11. of a year and six months, not to take his ease, but to follow his work, teaching the Word of God among them; and it being a city flocked to from all parts, he had an opportunity there [as at Jerusalem and Antioch] of preaching the Gospel to strangers, and sending notice of it thence to other countries. The people Christ has at Corinth must be called in by degrees, some by one sermon, others by another. Those that are converted, too, have particular need at Corinth to be taught by Paul himself: for no sooner was the good seed sown, than the enemy came and sowed tares, the false apostles, those deceitful workers, whom Paul, in his epistles to the Corinthians complains so much of, judaizing preachers, who, under color of the Christian name, undermined the very foundations of Christianity. Soon after Paul came to Corinth, it is supposed, he wrote 1 Thess., which, in order of time, was the first of all the epistles he wrote by divine inspiration; and the second epistle to the same church was written not long after. Ministers may be promoting the great ends of their ministry, by good letters, as well as by good sermons.

V. 12—17. We have here an account of some disturbance given to Paul and his friends at Corinth, but no great harm done, nor much hinderance given to the work of Christ there.

I. Paul is accused by the Jews before the Roman governor, v. 12, 13. Gallio, deputy of Achaia, i. e. pro-consul; for Achaia was a consular province of the empire. This Gallio was elder brother to the famous Seneca; in his youth he was called Novatus, but took the name of Gallio on his being adopted into the family of Julius Gallio; he is described by Seneca, his brother, to be a man of great ingenuity and great probity, and a man of a wonderful good temper; he was called Duleis Gallio, — Sweet Gallio, for his sweet disposition; and is said to have been universally beloved.

1. The Jews, ringleaders in every mischievous confederacy against Paul, with one accord came upon him, with violence and fury, to the disturbance of the public peace, and hurried him away to the judgment-seat, and, for aught that appears, allowed him no time to prepare for his trial.

2. Paul is falsely accused before Gallio,

v. 13. They could not charge him with persuading men not to worship God at all, or to worship other gods, Deut. 13:2. but only to worship God in a way contrary to the law. The Romans allowed the Jews in their provinces the observance of their own law; what then? Does their toleration include a power of imposition? But the charge was unjust; for their own law had in it a promise of a Prophet, whom God would raise up to them, and Him they should hear. Now Paul persuaded them to believe in this Prophet, who was come, and to hear Him, which was according to the law; for He came not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it. The law relating to the temple-service those Jews at Corinth could not observe, because of their distance from Jerusalem, and there was no part of their synagogue-worship which Paul contradicted. Thus when people are taught to worship God in Christ, and to worship Him in the Spirit, they are ready to quarrel, as if they were taught to worship Him contrary to the law; whereas this is indeed perfective of the law.

II. Gallio, on the first hearing, or rather without any hearing at all, dismisses the cause, and will not take any cognizance of it, v. 14, 15. 1. He shows himself very ready to do the part of a judge, in any matter proper for him to take cognizance of. 'If you could charge the prisoner with theft or fraud, with murder or rapine, or any act of immorality, I should think myself bound to bear with you in your complaints, though they were clamorous and noisy.' But, 2. He will by no means allow them to make a complaint to him of a thing that was not within his jurisdiction, v. 15. therefore, when they were urgent, and pressing to be heard, he drove them from the judgment-seat, v. 16. and ordered another cause to be called.

Now, (1.) Here was something right in Gallio's conduct, and praise-worthy,—that he would not pretend to judge of things he did not understand; or himself be the tool of the Jews' malice, to give judgment against Paul: he looked upon the matter to be not within his jurisdiction, and therefore would not meddle with it. But, (2.) It was certainly wrong to speak so slightly of a law and religion which he might have known to be of God, and which he ought to have acquainted himself with. In what way God is to be worshipped, whether Jesus be the Messiah, whether the Gospel be a divine revelation, were not questions of words and names, as he scornfully and profanely called them; they are questions of vast imporare virtually denied, or at best, totally lost sight of. 'Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.'—'God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love, wherewith He loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ; by grace are ye saved.' 13:42—48, v. 48. John 3:3—8. Eph. 2:4—10. Tit. 3:3—7.—Were such persons as the idolatrous, licentious Corinthians disposed of themselves, independently of divine grace 'preventing them,' to embrace the humbling, pure Gospel of Christ; and to change their jovial and sensual rites, for the spiritual worship of the heart-searching, holy God? Sc.

(10.) I have much people in this city.] Comp. John 10:16. 'Many who have not resisted my Spirit, and consequently are now under its teachings, and are ready [very soon, so the use of the present tense intimates, Bl.] to embrace my Gospel as soon as thou shalt declare it.' Dr. A. C.—'The expression takes in all who should, according to the gracious purpose of Christ, be converted to Christianity, whatever their tempers then were, even not excepting those very vicious, ill-disposed, corrupt persons, whose character in their unregenerate state is described in such strong terms, 1 Cor. 6:9, 10, 11. where the apostle speaks of what they were before they were converted.' DODDR.

V. 12—17. (17) Sosthenes.] Some think he was the same person as Crispus, before mentioned (8); others, that he succeeded him as chief ruler of the synagogue, when Crispus embraced Christianity. Some think he was the leading person in the prosecution of Paul, and that he was contemptuously and cruelly treated by those Greeks, who favored the apostle: others conjecture, he was a Christian, and that the Jews excited the Greeks to abuse him, when they could not prevail to wreak their malice on Paul. We afterwards read of Sosthenes, among the apostle's chief friends: (1 Cor. 1:1.) if this was the same person, as it is probable from the manner in which Luke mentions him; the latter opinion is favored by it; for the conversion of a leading persecutor would scarcely have been passed over in silence.—The Alexandrian manuscripts and some ancient versions read Jews, instead of Greeks; and it has been conjectured that (they all) was the original reading, and that some transcribers took the liberty of inserting Greeks, and others Jews, in the copies which they wrote. This indeed would remove the difficulty, and clearly show that Sosthenes was a Christian; but the authority for the alteration, is scarcely sufficient to warrant the conclusion. See Paley's Horæ Paulinæ.—Gallio probably deemed both Jews and Christians to be ignorant and deluded fanatics; and concluded that it was of no consequence who was right or wrong, in disputes of this nature. A mixture of philosophical skepticism, and political contempt of religious concerns, compared with affairs of state, seems to have influenced his conduct.—(12) Was the deputy.] Here only.—See on 13:7.—'Dr. Lardner justly observes, that this is another instance of the exact propriety with which Luke expresses himself. For though the province of Achaia, which comprehended all the rest of Greece, had a more various fortune than that of Cyprus, and frequently changed its form of government; yet, A. D. 44, (which is generally supposed to have been about 8 years before this event,) it was restored to the senate, and so became proconsular.' DODDR.

(12.) When, &c.] 'Rather, on Gallio's entering on the proconsulship, Kuin., Beza, Pisc. The Jews, it seems, waited for the arrival of a new proconsul, to make their request, as thinking they should then be less likely to meet a refusal.' Bloomf.—Achaia.] 'All that part of Greece which lay between Thessaly and the southernmost coasts of Peloponnesus.' Dr. A. C. 'After conquering Greece, the Romans divided it into 2 provinces, Macedonia (comprehending Illyricum, Macedonia proper, Epirus, Thessaly) and Achaia, i. c. all Greece proper.' BLOOMF.

(13.) Contrary to the law.] 'Jewish worship was allowed by law, and Roman was established by law. The Jews probably intended to accuse Paul of acting contrary to both laws. "He is not a Jew, for he does not admit of circumcision; he is not a Gentile, for he preaches against the worship of the gods. He is setting up a worship of his own, in opposition to all laws; and persuading many people to join him; he is, therefore, a most dangerous man, and should be put to death." Id.

(14.) Wrong . . . Wicked lewdness.] 'Adikēma . . . hradiourgēma: the former (so some) means violation of the law of the city; the latter, crime. But there seems a climax, from the greater to the less, thus, "felony or misdemeanor." Our word rogue is doubtless from this latter word, and roguery (perhaps in ridiculing their ceremonies, by tricks, &c.) being a term of equally extensive signification, would be no bad translation.' Id.

15 But if it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look ye to it; for I will be no judge of such matters.

16 And he drave them from the judgment-seat.

17 Then all the Greeks took Sosthenes, the chief ruler of the synagogue, and beat him before the judgment-seat. And Gallio cared for none of those things.

18 ¶ And Paul after this tarried there yet a good while, and then took his leave of the brethren, and sailed thence into Syria, and with him Priscilla and Aquila; having shorn his head in Cenchrea: for he had a vow.

19 And he came to Ephesus, and left them there: but he himself entered into the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews.

20 When they desired him to tarry longer time with them, he consented not;

21 And he departed from thence, and came to Cenchrea, and in which, if he had understood them himself aright, he would have seen himself nearly concerned. He speaks as if he boasted of his ignorance of the Scriptures, and took a pride in it; as if it were below him to notice the law of God, or make any inquiries concerning it.

III. The abuse done to Sosthenes, and Gallio's unconcernedness in it, v. 17.

I. The parties put a great contempt on the court, when they took Sosthenes and beat him before the judgment-seat. It is uncertain who this Sosthenes was, and who the Greeks were, that abused him. Most probably he was a Christian, and Paul's particular friend; that appeared for him, and conveyed him away, when Gallio dismissed the cause: so that, when they could not light on Paul, they fell foul on him who protected him. It is certain there was one Sosthenes, a friend of Paul, and well known at Corinth; it is likely he was a minister, for Paul calls him his brother, and joins him with himself in his first epistle to the church at Corinth, 1 Cor. I. 1. as he does Timothy in his second, and it is probable that this was he; he is said to be a ruler of the synagogue, either joint ruler with Crispus, v. 8. or a ruler of one synagogue, as Crispus was of another. As for the Greeks that abused him, very probably they were either Hellenist Jews, or Jewish Greeks, those that joined with the Jews in opposing the Gospel, v. 4, 6. and that the native Jews put them on to do it, thinking it would in them be less offensive. They were so enraged against Paul, that they beat Sosthenes; and so enraged against Gallio, because he would not countenance the prosecution, that they beat him before the judgment-seat, whereby they did, in effect, tell Gallio, that they cared not for him; if he would not be their executioner, they would be their own judges.

2. The court put no less a contempt on the cause, and the persons too; Gallio cared for none of these things. If by this be meant that he cared not for the affronts of bad men, it was commendable; while he steadily adhered to the laws and rules of equity, he might despise their contempts; but if it be meant, (as I think it is,) that he concerned not himself for the abuses done to good men, it carries his indifference too far, and gives us but an ill character of him. Here is wickedness done in the place of judgment, (which Solomon complains of, Eccl. 3: 16.) and nothing done to discountenance and suppress it.) Gallio, as a judge, ought to have protected Sosthenes, and restrained and punished the Greeks that assaulted him; for a man to be mobbed in the street or in the market, perhaps, may not be easily helped; but to be so in his court, the judgment-seat, the court sitting and not concerned at it, is an evidence that truth is fallen in the street, and equity cannot enter.

V. 18—23. I. Paul's departure from Corinth, v. 18. not till some time after the trouble he met with there; from other places he had departed when the storm rose, but not from Corinth, because there it was no sooner risen than it fell again. Some tell us Gallio privately countenanced him, and that this occasioned a correspondence between Paul and Seneca, which some of the ancients speak of. After this he tarried there yet a good while, some think, beyond the year and half, mentioned v. 11.

1. When he went, he took leave of the brethren, solemnly, and with much affection, with suitable comforts and counsels, and prayers, commending what was good, reproving what was otherwise, and giving them necessary cautions against the wiles of the false apostles; and his farewell sermon would leave impressions on them.

2. He took with him Priscilla and Aquila, because, being strongly attached, they had a mind to accompany him; or they seemed not inclined to stay long at a place; a disposition which may come from a good principle, and have good effects, and therefore ought not to be condemned in others, though it ought to be suspected in ourselves.

3. At Cenchrea, hard by Corinth, the port where those that went to sea from Corinth took ship, either Paul or Aquila (for the original does not determine which) had his head shaved, to discharge himself from the vow of a Nazarite. Those that lived in Judea were, in such a case, bound to do it at the temple; but those who lived in other countries might do it in other places. Some throw it on Aquila, who was a Jew, v. 2. and retained, perhaps, more of his Judaism than was convenient; but I see no harm in admitting it of Paul, of whom we must admit the same thing, ch. 21: 24, 26. not only in compliance for a time with the Jews, 1 Cor. 9: 20. but because the vow of the Nazarites, though ceremonial, and as such ready to vanish away, had yet a moral and very pious significance, and therefore was fit to die the last of all the Jewish ceremonies. The Nazarites are joined with the prophets, Amos 2: 11. and were very much the glory of Israel, Lam. 4: 7. and therefore it is not strange if Paul bound himself for some time with the vow of a Nazarite from wine and strong drink, and from being trimmed, to recommend himself to the Jews; and from this he now discharged himself.

II. Paul's calling at Ephesus, the metropolis of Asia the Less, and a sea-port.

1. There he left Aquila and Priscilla, intending shortly to settle there for some time; Aquila and Priscilla might, by private conversation, being very intelligent, judicious Christians, dispose the minds of many to give Paul, when he should come among them, a favorable reception, and to understand his preaching; therefore he calls them his helpers in Christ Jesus, Rom. 16: 3.

2. There he preached to the Jews in their synagogue; though he did but call there in his journey, yet he would not go without giving them a sermon. We must not con-

I apprehend, therefore, the real case was, that just as Sosthenes came out of the court, the mob laid hold of him, in a riotous manner, and beat him, probably with their fists; and though some flying report of their assault might reach Gallio, he did not seem to take any notice of it, perceiving no great mischief was likely to follow, and willing to leave so troublesome a plaintiff as Sosthenes to feel some of the consequences of that confusion which his own bigotry and ill-nature had occasioned.'

V. 18—23. Before he embarked, he cut off his hair at Cenchrea, on account of a vow he had taken, respecting some of his multiplied deliverances. Perhaps some casual defilement made it necessary for the apostle to cut off his hair, and begin again the appointed term; and being at so great a distance [from Jerusalem] it might be judged allowable to do this at Cenchrea; and to offer the required sacrifices when he came to the temple. It is not indeed recorded, that he did offer them; but this by no means proves that he did not.—The voyage and circuit here briefly stated must have taken up a long time; yet they are related in very few words; which shows, that the design of the narrative is not so much to gratify curiosity, as to give an instructive specimen of the manner, in which Christianity was at first propagated. The travels, labors, and success of the apostle, also, were far greater than a superficial reader would suppose; for the events of years, and the conversion of thousands, are sometimes recorded in a few verses. SCOTT.

(18.) Vow.] 'The obligation of a Nazarite's vow could only be fulfilled in Jerusalem, nor is it probable Paul would have bound himself by any ritual ceremony. The vow, Acts 21: 23. was not voluntary, but at the apostle's instigation: so this should rather seem a civil vow, so Salmasius, who observes, that such were often undertaken by the Jews; as, for instance, when travelling, not to shave their heads before they arrived at a certain place; not to take food or drink till they had effected something purposed. See Acts 23: 14.; also after recovering from a disorder, or escaping any other peril or calamity. See Jos. So the Gentiles used to consecrate their hair to the gods who had preserved them. See Juv., &c. Wetst. But such a civil vow, savors too much of Jewish and Gentile manners, to have been adopted by Paul. I prefer to follow the Vulg. and Chrysostom; and, removing the stop after "Aquila," refer 21 But bade them farewell, saying, I must by all means keep this feast that cometh in Jerusalem: but I will return again unto you, if God will. And he sailed from Ephesus.

22 And when he had landed at Cesarea, and gone up, and saluted the church, he went down to Antioch.

23 And after he had spent some time there, he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples.

24 ¶ And a certain Jew named Apollos, born at Alexandria, an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures, came to Ephesus.

25 This man was instructed in the way of the Lord; and being fervent in the spirit, he spake and taught diligently the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John.

3. The Jews at Ephesus, so far from driving Paul away, courted his stay with them, v. 20. to instruct them in the Gospel, being more noble, and better bred than those Jews at Corinth, and other places; and it was a sign God had not quite cast away his people, but had a remnant among them.

4. Paul would not stay with them now; he had further to go; he must by all means keep this feast at Jerusalem; not that he thought himself bound in duty to it, he knew the laws of the feasts were no longer binding, but he had business at Jerusalem, which would be best done at the time of the feast; which of the feasts it was, we are not told, probably the passover, the most eminent.

5. He intimated his purpose, after this journey, to come and spend some time at Ephesus; being encouraged by their kind invitation to hope he should do good among them; it is good to have opportunities in reserve, when one good work is over, to have another to apply ourselves to; but he inserts that necessary proviso, if God will. Our times are in God's hand; we purpose, but He disposes; therefore we must make all our promises with submission to the will of God, ch. 16:7. [Jam. 4:13—15.]

III. Paul's visit to Jerusalem; a short visit, but it served as a token of respect to that truly mother-church.

1. He came by sea to that port that lay next to Jerusalem, v. 21, 22. He chose to go by sea, for expedition and safety. Joppa had been the port for Jerusalem, but Herod having improved Cesarea, and the port at Joppa being dangerous, that was generally made use of.

2. He went up, and saluted the church; I think plainly the church at Jerusalem, emphatically called The Church, because there the Christian church began, ch. 15:4. Paul thought it requisite to show himself among them, that they might not think his success among the Gentiles had estranged him from them; or that the honor God had put on him, made him unmindful of the honor he owed to them. The ministers at Jerusalem were constant residents, Paul a constant itinerant; but he took care to keep up a good correspondence with them, that they might rejoice with him in his going out, and he with them in their tents, and they might both congratulate and wish well to one another's comfort and success. God's people are the salt of the earth, dispersed and scattered; yet it is good to see one another sometimes, that we may confirm mutual love, may the better keep up our spiritual communion, and long the more for that heavenly Jerusalem, in which we hope to be together for ever.

IV. His return.

1. He spent some time in Antioch, among his old friends there, ch. 13:1; to refresh himself with the sight and conversation of the ministers there; and a very good refreshment it is to a faithful minister, to have for a while the society of his brethren; for as iron sharpeneth iron, so doth a man the countenance of his friend. Paul's coming to Antioch would bring to remembrance the former days, which would furnish him with matter for fresh thanksgiving.

2. Thence he went over the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, where he had preached the Gospel, and planted churches; which, though very briefly mentioned, ch. 16:6. was yet a glorious work, as appears by Gal. 4:14, 15. where Paul speaks of his preaching of the Gospel to the Galatians at the first, and their receiving him as an angel of God. These country-churches, for such they were, Gal. 1:2. and we read not of any city in Galatia where a church was, Paul visited in order as they lay, watering what he had been instrumental to plant, and strengthening all the disciples. His very coming among them, and owning them, were a great strengthening to them and their ministers. Disciples need to be strengthened, for they are compassed about with infirmity; ministers must do what they can to strengthen them, to strengthen them all, by directing them to Christ, and bringing them to live on Him, whose strength is perfected in their weakness, and who is Himself their Strength and Song.

V. 24—28. The sacred history leaves Paul on his travels, and meets Apollos at Ephesus, to give us some account of him, which was necessary to our understanding some passages in Paul's epistles.

I. His character.

1. He was born at Alexandria, in Egypt, of Jewish parents; for there were abundance of Jews in that city, since the dispersion, as it was foretold, Deut. 28:68. Apollos, some think the same with Apelles, Rom. 16:10.

2. He was a man of excellent good parts, and well fitted for public service, an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures of the O.T. in the knowledge of which he was, as a Jew, brought up. (1.) He had a great command of language, was an eloquent man, a prudent man, so some; a learned man, so others; a good historian, an excellent qualification for the ministry: one that could speak well, so it properly signifies; he was famous for speaking pertinently and closely, fully and fluently, on any subject. (2.) He had a great command of scripture-language, which was the eloquence he was remarkable for; he came to Ephesus, being mighty in the Scriptures, so the words are placed; having an excellent faculty of expounding scriptures, he came to Ephesus, a public place, to trade with that talent, for the honor of God and the good of many. He was mighty in the Scriptures; understood their sense and meaning, knew how to apply them, how to reason out of them, and strongly; a convincing, commanding, confirming power went along with all his expositions and applications of the Scripture.

3. He was instructed in the way of the Lord; i. e. had some acquaintance with the doctrine of Christ, some general notions of the Gospel, and the principles of Christianity, that Jesus is the Christ, and that Prophet that should come into the world; the first notice of this would be readily embraced by one so mighty in the Scriptures as Apollos was, and therefore understood the signs of the times. He was instructed, catechised, so the word is, either by his parents or by ministers; he was taught something of Christ, and the way of salvation by Him.

4. Yet he knew only the baptism of John; the preparing of the way of the Lord, by that voice crying in the wilderness, rather than the way of the Lord itself. We cannot but think he had heard of Christ's death and resurrection, but he was not let into the mystery of them, had not had opportunity of conversing with any of the apostles, since the pouring out of the Spirit; or he had himself been baptized only with the baptism of John, but not with the Holy Ghost, as the disciples were at the day of Pentecost.

II. The employment and improvement of his gifts at Ephesus; seeking opportunities of doing and getting good, he found both.

1. Though he had not the miraculous gifts of the Spirit, as the apostles had, he made a very good use of the gifts he had; for the dispensation of the Spirit, whatever the measure of it is, is given to every man to profit withal. And our Savior, by a parable, designed to teach his ministers, that though they had but one talent they must not bury that.

We have seen how Apollos was qualified with a good head and a good tongue; he had a good stock of useful knowledge, and an excellent faculty of communicating it. Let us now see what he had further to rethe words, "having shaved," &c. to Aquila [so Valck.]: which mode is favored by the construction, and removes all difficulties. We are not, however, with Grot., Hamon., Schl., &c., to understand a vow of Naziritishness, but (as Alb., Heum., and Heinr.) a civil vow, because of deliverance, or some good event.

(21.) Must by all means, &c. Because he desired to seize that opportunity of meeting a great number of his countrymen at Jerusalem, to whom he might preach the Gospel, or whom, if already converted, he might further instruct, or might remove the prejudices that were groundlessly imbibed against him.

(22.) Go up. The phrase is often used absolutely in the SS. of going up to Jerusalem: Xen. uses the Gr., in the very same sense, of persons going from Greece to the capital of Persia. Bloomf.—Went down to Antioch. [I. e. Antioch in Syria, as the word is generally to be understood when without addition.]

(23.) Over all the country, &c. As this would take him up a great deal of time, most commentators, very reasonably, allow 4 years for this journey, including his stay at Ephesus: i. e. from the year 54 to 58. Doddr.—Went over . . . in order. [If Paul went up to Jerusalem at this time, which we are left to infer, for Luke has not expressed it, v. 22. it was his fourth journey thither: and this is generally supposed to have been the 21st year after his conversion. His first journey is men-

V. 24. Apollos.] Contracted for Apollonios (read in Cod. Cant.): as Artemas for Artemonius, &c.

V. 25—27. It does not appear that Apollos had ever been among the Christians; nor is it known when, and by whom, he received Christian baptism. (27.) Believed through grace. [I. e. through the Gospel, says Dr. Hammond, or through the favor of God in vouchsafing them the knowledge of it.] Whitby. (9—11. John 1:10—13. Eph. 2:4—10. Tit. 3:4—7.)—The best comment on these words is what we are told elsewhere: "Paul planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase." Doddr. (1 Cor. 3:4—9.)

(25.) Knowing only the baptism of John. [It is generally supposed he had been in Judea when John was baptizing, and having been baptized by him into the faith of a Messiah shortly to appear, on hearing something more of the Gospel, he believed in Christ, under that character, but had not yet been baptized in the name of Christ, nor received the gifts of the Spirit, which were then often miraculously communicated in that ordinance. If this was indeed the case, as John the Baptist was beheaded more than 20 years before, Apollos could not now be, as is generally supposed, though I think nowhere asserted, a young man; and consequently his condescension in submitting to the instruccommend him as a preacher; and his example is recommended to all such: (1.) He was a lively, affectionate preacher, ferucut in spirit; had in him a great deal of divine fire as well as divine light; was burning, as well as shining. He was full of zeal for the glory of God, and the salvation of precious souls. This appeared both in his forwardness to preach, when called to it by the rulers of the synagogue, and in his fervency in preaching; he preached as one in earnest, and that had his heart in his work. What a happy composition was here! Many are fervent in spirit, but weak in knowledge, in scripture-knowledge, and far to seek for proper words, and full of improper ones; and, on the other hand, many are eloquent enough, and mighty in the Scriptures, and learned, and judicious, but they have no life or fervency. Here was a complete man of God, thoroughly furnished for his work; both eloquent and fervent, full both of divine knowledge and of divine affections. (2.) He was an industrious, laborious preacher; he spake and thought diligently; he took pains, what he delivered was elaborate; and he did not offer that to God, or to the synagogue, that cost him nothing; he first worked it on his own heart, and then labored to impress it on those he preached it to; he taught diligently, accurately, exactly; everything he said was well weighed. (3.) He was an evangelical preacher; though he knew only the baptism of John, yet that was the beginning of the Gospel of Christ, and to that he kept close; for he taught not the ceremonial law or Gentile philosophy, but the things of the Lord, of the Lord Christ, that tended to make way for Him, and to set Him up. (4.) He was a courageous preacher; he began to speak boldly in the synagogue, as one who, having confidence in God, did not fear the face of man; he spake as one that knew the truth of what he said, and had no doubt of it; the worth of what he said, and was not afraid to suffer for it; in the synagogue, where the Jews not only were present, but had power, there he preached the things of God, which he knew they were prejudiced against.

2. He there made a good increase of his gifts in private, not so much in study, as in conversation with Aquila and Priscilla. (1.) Aquila and Priscilla heard him preach in the synagogue. Though in knowledge he was much inferior to them, yet, having excellent gifts for public service, they encouraged his ministry, by a diligent and constant attendance on it. Thus young ministers, that are hopeful, should be countenanced by grown Christians, for it becomes them to fulfil all righteousness. (2.) Finding him defective in his knowledge of Christianity, they took him to them, to lodge in the same house with them, and expounded to him the way of God, the way of salvation by Jesus Christ, more perfectly. They did not take occasion from what they observed of his deficiency, either to despise him themselves, or to disparage him to others; did not call him a young, raw preacher, not fit to come into a pulpit, but considered the disadvantages he had labored under, as knowing only the baptism of John; and having themselves got great knowledge in the truths of the Gospel, by their long and intimate conversation with Paul, they communicated what they knew to him, and gave him a clear, distinct, and methodical account of those things, which, before, he had but confused notions of. [1.] See here an instance of what Christ has promised, that to him that hath, shall be given; he that has, and uses what he has, shall have more. He that diligently traded with the talent he had, doubled it quickly. [2.] See an instance of truly Christian charity in Aquila and Priscilla; they did good according to their ability. Aquila, though a man of great knowledge, yet did not undertake to speak in the synagogue, because he had not such gifts for public work as Apollos had; but he furnished Apollos with matter, and then left him to clothe it with acceptable words. Instructing young Christians and young ministers privately in conversation, who mean well, and perform well, as far as they go, is a piece of very good service, both to them and to the church. [3.] See an instance of great humility in Apollos; he was a very bright young man, of great parts and learning, newly come from the university, a popular preacher, and one mightily cried up and followed; and yet, finding that Aquila and Priscilla were judicious, serious Christians, that could speak intelligently and experimentally of the things of God, though they were but mechanics, poor tent-makers, he was glad to receive instruction from them, to be showed by them his defects and mistakes, and to have his mistakes rectified by them, and his deficiencies made up. Young scholars may gain a great deal by converse with old Christians, as young students in the law may by old practitioners. Apollos, though he was instructed in the way of the Lord, did not rest in the knowledge he had attained, nor thought he understood Christianity as well as any man, which proud, conceited young men are apt to do, but was willing to have it expounded to him more perfectly. They that know much, should covet to know more, and what they know, to know it better, pressing forward toward perfection. [4.] Here is an instance of a good woman, though not permitted to speak in the church or in the synagogue, yet doing good with the knowledge God had given her, in private converse. Paul will have the aged women to be teachers of good things, Titus 2: 3, 4.

III. Here is his preferment to the service of the church of Corinth, which was a larger sphere of usefulness than Ephesus at present was. Here we have,

1. His call. He himself inclined to go, v. 27. and his friends encouraged him, and, he being a stranger there, they gave him letters of recommendation. In this way, among others, the communion of churches is kept up, by the recommending of members and ministers to each other, when ministers, as Apollos here, are disposed to remove.

2. His success. (1.) Believers were greatly edified, and they that had received the Gospel were very much confirmed; he helped them much, who had believed through grace. Note, It is through grace that we believe; it is God's gift. Those who, through grace, do believe, yet still need help; and it is the business of faithful ministers to help them, much; which, when a divine power goes along with them, they will be able to do. (2.) Unbelievers were greatly mortified, their objections fully answered, the folly and sophistry of their arguments discovered, so that they had nothing to say in defence of the opposition they made to the Gospel, v. 28. He mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, before the people; he did it earnestly, and with great vehemence; he took pains to do it; his heart was upon it; he did it effectually, and to universal satisfaction. Now what he aimed to convince them of, was, that Jesus is the Christ, the Messiah promised to the fathers, who should come, and they were to look for no other. If the Jews were but convinced of this,—that Jesus is Christ, even their own

PRACT. OBS. While the zealous ministers of Christ carefully shun whatever may entangle them in the affairs of this life; they will submit to any hardship or labor, which may be rendered subservient to their usefulness, or remove obstacles out of their way: and to work at a trade, for daily bread, in order to preach the Gospel without charge, differs exceedingly from carrying on lucrative business, in order to grow rich, and live in abundance, in connexion with the office of an evangelical preacher.—The knowledge of anything, by which an honest living can be earned, is a very valuable acquisition: it never can prove injurious to any man; it cannot be taken from him; and it may, on one occasion or other, be peculiarly useful to him.*—Even among affluent persons, the ministers of Christ are more likely to do good, by showing an entire indifference to all those things which wealth can purchase; than by affecting a style of living, which emulates that of the very persons, from tions of these private Christians is the more remarkable, and the more amiable. DODDR.

(27.) Through grace.] These words may either refer to Apollos or to the people at Corinth.' Dr. A. C. 'Through grace, qualifies helped; so all the best commentators.' BLOOMF.

V. 28. 'It appears from passages in 1 Cor. that several of the Christians there, charmed with the eloquence of Apollos, were ready to set whose liberality it requires and almost demands support.—The love of Christ is the best bond of friendship; and the communion of the saints sweetens labor, contempt, and even persecution.—Whatever be their motives, such magistrates as take care to prevent, or impartially to punish, those crimes which are injurious to the welfare of the community; and who refuse to use their authority, [by putting down the free discussion of truth,] in persecuting one religious sect at the instance of another, or in imposing doctrines, forms, and modes of worship on men's consciences; certainly best understand and perform the duties of their office. Yet, indifference to all religion, and to the infinitely momentous interests of eternity, is no necessary concomitant of toleration, but rather a disgrace to it; as it shows that rulers, of this description, are actuated merely by indolence and worldly policy, and not by a regard to the rights of conscience, or by a sense of their duty to God: and their toleration or protection of his worshippers, will often be partial and contemptuous, and attended by improper connivance at those who violate the peace of society; as well as a total and systematical neglect of the due improvement of the talents entrusted to them. We should, however, be thankful for security, thus continued to us, in Providence [making every effort and sacrifice necessary to preserve it, and transmit it unimpaired]; and we must not forget to pray for those who seem more to regard the liberties of mankind, than the salvation of their own souls. 6 The Holy Ghost is given by Paul's hands. 9 The Jews blaspheme his doctrine, which is confirmed by miracles. 13 The Jewish exorcists 16 are beaten by the devil. 19 Conjuring books are burnt. 24 Demetrius, for love of gain, raiseth an uproar against Paul, 33 which is appeased by the town clerk.

AND it came to pass, that while Apollos<sup>a</sup> was at Corinth, Paul having passed through the upper coasts, came to Ephesus; and finding certain disciples, law would teach them to hear Him. Ministers' business is to preach Christ, not themselves. The way he took to convince them, was, by the Scriptures; for the Jews owned the Scriptures to be of divine authority; and it was easy for him, who was mighty in them, to show that Jesus is the Christ. Note, Ministers must be able not only to preach the truth, but to prove it and defend it, and to convince gainsayers with meekness, and yet with power, instructing those that oppose themselves; and this is real service to the church.

NOTES. CHAP. XIX. V. 1—4. 'We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost?' they must have meant, that they had never been led to expect his miraculous powers, or been informed of anything respecting the extraordinary communication of them to believers, at that time; or about the Gospel being especially 'the ministration of the Spirit.' (John 7:37—39. 2 Cor. 3:7—11.) 'As Apollos had left Jerusalem, and gone to Alexandria, before the miraculous effusion of the Holy Ghost on the apostles, at the day of Pentecost; so had they also done, and had been travelling into other parts of the world, where the Gospel had not yet been planted.' Whitby. This is not improbable: and perhaps, like Apollos, they endeavored to communicate to the Jews in different places what they had learned from John the Baptist, concerning Jesus, the Messiah, 'the Lamb of God,' 'the Son of God,' and 'the Bridegroom' of the church; and, having just before arrived at Ephesus, they had not become acquainted with Aquila and Priscilla. But hearing of Paul, it is probable they introduced themselves to him, as persons who believed in Jesus as the promised Messiah: and, perhaps, being regarded as teachers of this doctrine, the apostle might suppose that they had received the Holy Spirit, at the day of Pentecost, or by the laying on of the hands of the apostles; till their answer showed that they had very imperfect views of the Christian doctrine. Scott.

(1, 2.) Upper.] 'I. e. inland, to wit, Galatia and Phrygia; so called in reference to the maritime situation of Ephesus, which was Katō, below.' Kuin. Certain disciples.] 'Pious Jews, who having waited for the kingdom of God, and being many years before baptized by John, or some of his disciples, had, on receiving some evidences of Christianity, believed in Jesus; but... had not enjoyed an opportunity, before, of being instructed in anything relating to the Holy Spirit, more than might be learned from the O. T.' Doddr. Not so much as heard, &c.] 'They could not mean they had not heard of the Holy Spirit; for John, in his baptism, announced Christ as about to baptize with the Holy Ghost, Mat. 3:11., but they simply meant, that they had not heard that this Spirit in his gifts had been given to, or received by any one.' Dr. A. C. 'Paul, hearing these were separatists, probably, and suspecting they were John's disciples, went to give them more correct notions, and seems to have said more than is recorded, and Kuin. is persuaded he appealed to Joel 3:1. That he had asked them if they were baptized, may be collected from v. 3. [Luke often leaves out minor circumstances in a narrative.] And when they answered they had been, he, to know if they were votaries of the same Messiah with himself, further asked, "have ye experienced the effects of the Holy Spirit?" John and his disciples baptized none but Jews, and as these were so, the Heb. phrase ruch hqdsh [Holy Spirit] could not but be familiar to them; and by this they believed the prophets were inspired. See Ez. 11:5. These Ephesian Jews then seem to have meant, that they had never heard the Messiah was come, and who He was; that they had not known that the period spoken of by Joel 3:1 (note, Acts 2:17), had arrived, when the Spirit was to be poured out upon all men, still less had they been imbued with it. Kuin.' Bloomf.

CHAP. XIX. We left Paul in his circuit visiting the churches, ch. 18: 23. but we have not forgotten, nor has he, his promise to his friends at Ephesus, to return to them, and make some stay there; now this ch. shows us his performance of that promise, his coming to Ephesus, and his continuance there two years.

V. 1—7. To Ephesus, that city of great note, Paul came to preach the Gospel, while Apollos was at Corinth, v. 1. and grudging not that Apollos entered into his labors there, though there were those that made him the head of a party against Paul, 1 Cor. 1:12. yet Paul had no jealousy of him, nor any way disliked the affection the people had for him. He passed through the upper coasts, Pontus and Bithynia, that lay N. At his first coming, he met with some disciples there, who professed faith in Christ as the true Messiah, but were much of the standing Apollos was of when he came to Ephesus, ch. 18: 25. Observe,

1. How Paul catechised them. 1. They did believe in the Son of God; but Paul inquires, whether they believed in the Spirit, whose operations on the minds of men, for conviction, conversion, and comfort, were revealed some time after the doctrine of Jesus being the Christ. That was not all; extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost were conferred on the apostles and others presently after Christ's ascension, which was frequently repeated on occasion; had they participated of these gifts? We are not now to expect any such extraordinary gifts as they had then. The canon of the N. T. being long since completed and ratified, we depend on that as the most sure Word of prophecy. But graces of the Spirit are given to all believers, which are as earnest to them, 2 Cor. 1:22. 5:5. Eph. 1:13. Luke 11:13. Now it concerns us all who profess the Christian faith, seriously to inquire, whether we have received the Holy Ghost or not. The tree will be known by its fruits. Do we bring forth the fruits of the Spirit? Are we led by the Spirit? Do we walk in the Spirit? Are we under the government of the Spirit?

2. They owned their ignorance in this matter; that there is a promise of the Holy Ghost we know from the O. T., and that that promise will be fulfilled in its season, we doubt not; but we have not heard whether the Holy Ghost be indeed yet given as a Spirit of prophecy. They knew, as Dr. Lightfoot observes, that, according to the tradition of their nation, after the death of Ezra, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, the Holy Ghost departed from Israel, and went up; and they professed they had never heard of his return. They spake as if they expected it, and wondered they did not hear of it, and were ready to welcome the notice of it. The gospel-light shone more and more, gradually; not only clearer and clearer, in the discovery of truths not before heard of, but further and further, in the discovery of them to persons that had not before heard of them.

3. Paul inquired, how they came to be baptized, if they knew nothing of the Holy Ghost; for if they were baptized by any of Christ's ministers, they were instructed concerning the Holy Ghost, and were baptized in his name. 'Surely your baptism was a nullity, if you know nothing of the Holy Ghost. Ignorance of the Holy Ghost, is as inconsistent with a sincere profession of Christianity, as ignorance of Christ is.' Applying it to ourselves, those are baptized to no purpose, that do not receive and submit to the Holy Ghost. Let us often consider, unto what we were baptized, that we may live up to our baptism.

4. They own, they were baptized unto John's baptism; i. e. as I take it, in the name of John, not by John himself, but by some weak, well-meaning disciple of his, that ignorantly kept up his name, as the head of a party, retaining the spirit and notion of those disciples of his that were jealous of the growth of Christ's interest, and complained to him of it, John 3:26. Some of these, not thinking that the kingdom of (3, 4.) Unto.] 'Eis: Some, as Kuin. take the eis to denote the final cause: q. d. "To what purpose, then, were ye baptized? what doctrine did ye profess on baptism?" And they determine the answer to be, "Namely, that we should profess the doctrine which John announced, to which we were bound by his baptism." And thus "the baptism of John" will signify John's doctrine and baptism. This mode of interpretation, however, seems to need confirmation. The "baptism of repentance," (5) signifies the baptism by which those who receive it are bound to reformation of life. See on Mark 1:4.' Bloomf.

V. 5, 6. Several learned critics, of different sentiments concerning baptism, have argued, that these are the words of Paul, showing the disciples, that when John baptized those who heard his doctrine, he virtually baptized them in the name of Jesus; and not the words of the historian, relating to the baptism of these persons, subsequent to the apostle's instruction of them. Some of those, who first contended for this interpretation, did it out of zeal against such as they called Rebaptizers, lest they should adduce this example in support of their practice. Yet, by maintaining the baptism of John, and the baptism of Christ, to be entirely the same, they have furnished their opposers with a far more plausible argument, than that which they wanted to wrest from them. But, however that may be, I cannot think, that any impartial man, who never heard of these controversies, would, either from reading the original, or our version, put this construction on the words. If John could, in any sense, be said to 'baptize his disciples in the name of the Lord Jesus;' Jesus himself must have been baptized virtually in his own name. John 3:22—24. Even Paul's question, 'Unto what then were ye baptized?' implies a distinction between different kinds of baptism; and denotes, that, while he understood they had been baptized, he also concluded that they had not received Christian baptism, having never heard of the Holy Spirit, in whose name Christians were baptized. Mat. 28:19, 20, v. 19.—'This is visible even in the words of Paul here: John said to those that came to his baptism (4), not that they did, but that "they should, believe in Him that was coming after him;" now they were not to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, till they did actually believe in Him, which they who had received John's baptism were so far from doing, that they "were musing whether John himself were not the Christ." Whitby. After Christ's ascension, no inquiry was made, that we read of, whether the converts had been baptized by John, or not: and if but one of the 3000, who were baptized on the day of Pentecost, had been John's disciple, (and probably numbers were such) the baptism of John, and that of Jesus, must have been distinct ordinances. (2:41.) The difference between that introductory institution to the Christian dispensation, and the initiatory external seal of that dispensation, has been already considered, Mat. 3:5, 6.—Some have indeed said, that if John's baptism and Christ's were different, our Lord had no communion with the N. T. church in baptism, as He had with the O. T. church in circumcision. But 'He was made under the law,' to fulfil its righteousness, as our Surety; and must, therefore, both on that account, and as our example, obey every command, and attend on heaven, which John spake of as at hand, was so very near as it proved, rested in what they had, and thought they could not do better than to persuade others to do so too; and so, ignorantly, in a blind zeal for John's doctrine, they baptized here and there one in John's name, or, as it is here expressed, unto John's baptism, looking no further themselves, nor directing those that they baptized any further.

5. Paul explains to them the true intent and meaning of John's baptism, as principally referring to Jesus Christ, and so rectifies the mistake. He owns John's baptism was a very good thing, as far as it went; John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance. But John's baptism had a further reference, and he never designed that those he baptized should rest there, but told them, that they should believe on Him who should come after him, i. e. on Christ Jesus; that his baptism of repentance was designed only to prepare the way of the Lord, and to dispose them to receive and entertain Christ, whom he left them big with expectations of; nay, whom he directed them to; Behold the Lamb of God.

6. When they were thus showed the error they were led into, they thankfully accepted the discovery, and were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, v. 5. As for Apollos, of whom it was said, ch. 18:25. that he knew the baptism of John, that he rightly understood the meaning of it when he was baptized with it, though he knew that only; yet, when he understood the way of God more perfectly, he was not again baptized, any more than Christ's first disciples that had been baptized with John's baptism, and knew it referred to the Messiah at the door, and with an eye to that, submitted to it, were baptized again. But to these here, who received it only with an eye to John, and looked no further, as if he were their savior, it was such a fundamental error as was as fatal to it, as it would have been for any to be baptized in the name of Paul, 1 Cor. 1:13. therefore when they came to understand themselves better, they desired to be baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, and were so. Not by Paul himself, as we have reason to think, but by some of those who attended him. It does not therefore follow hence, that there was not an agreement between John's baptism and Christ's; or that they were not for substance the same; much less does it follow that those who have been once baptized in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, which is the appointed form of Christ's baptism, may be again baptized in the same name; for those that were here baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, had never been so baptized before.

II. Paul solemnly prayed to God to give them the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost, signified by his laying his hands on them, which was a gesture used in blessing, by the patriarchs, especially in conveying the great trust of the promise, as Gen. 48:14. The Spirit being the great promise of the N. T. the apostles conveyed it by the imposition of hands, Is. 44:3. The prayer was granted; The Holy Ghost came on them, in a surprising, overpowering manner, and they spake with tongues and prophesied, as the apostles did, and the first Gentile converts, ch. 10:44. This was intended to introduce the Gospel at Ephesus, [called by Jos. the foremost city in Asia, i. e. Asia proper, v. 10.,] and to awaken in the minds of men an expectation of some great things from it; and some think it was further designed to qualify these twelve men for the work of the ministry, and that they were the elders of Ephesus, to whom Paul committed the care and conduct of that church. They had the Spirit of prophecy, that they might understand the mysteries of the kingdom of God themselves, and the gift of tongues, that they might preach them to every nation and language. Oh! what a wonderful change was here made on a sudden in these men; they that but just now had not so much as heard that there was any Holy Ghost, are now themselves filled with the Holy Ghost; for the Spirit, like the wind, blows where and when He listeth.

V. 8—12. Paul is here very busy at Ephesus to do good.

I. He begins, as usual, with the Jews.

1. He preached to them in their synagogue, v. 8. as Christ used to do. Thus he would bear his testimony to public worship on sabbath-days. Where there were no Christian assemblies yet formed, he frequented the Jewish assemblies, while the Jews were not as yet wholly cast off. Paul went into the synagogue, because there he had them together, and had them, it might be hoped, in a good frame.

2. What he preached to them; the things concerning the kingdom of God among men, the great things which concerned God's dominion over all men, and favor to them, and men's subjection to God, and happiness in God. Or, more particularly, the things concerning the kingdom of the Messiah, which the Jews were in expectation of, and promised themselves great matters from; he opened the Scriptures which spake of this, gave them a right notion of this kingdom, and showed them their mistakes about it.

3. How he preached to them. (1.) Argumentatively; he disputed; gave reasons, scripture-reasons; and answered objections. He preached dialogue-wise; he put questions to them, and received their answers; gave them leave to put questions to him, and answered them. (2.) Affectionately; he persuaded; he used not only logical arguments, but rhetorical motives; showing them, that the things he preached concerning the kingdom of God, were things concerning themselves, which they were nearly concerned in, every institution of God, then in force: whereas, there was not the same reason for his joining in the ordinances of the Gospel, which He appointed merely as our Lord and King. Doubtless He ate the passover with his disciples, yet it does not appear that He partook of the eucharist: Mat. 26:26—29. Luke 22:14—18. it is not probable that He did; neither can it be supposed, that He was 'baptized into the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,' which is essential to Christian baptism. I apprehend therefore, that these persons, having been further instructed by Paul, were admitted into the church by baptism, previously to the communication of the Holy Spirit to them, by the imposition of the apostle's hands, in his miraculous powers and gifts. (8:14—17. 10:44—48.)

SCOTT.

(5.) When they heard this. 'I think it evident, beyond all dispute, that the baptism of John and of Christ were in their own nature quite different, and that it is plain in fact, that, when persons were converted to Christianity, they were baptized of course, without inquiring whether they had or had not, received the baptism of John, which we know vast numbers did, Mat. 3:5, 6, who probably afterwards received Christian baptism. Comp. Acts 2:38—41. 4:4, 6:7. Doddr. 'As there is no evidence in the N. T. of persons being rebaptized, unless this be one, many criticisms have been hazarded, to prove that these persons were not rebaptized. I see no need of this. To be a Christian, a man must be baptized in the Christian faith; these persons had not been baptized into that faith, and therefore were not Christians; they felt this, and were immediately baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus. This is a plain case; but let one instance be produced of a person being rebaptized, who had before been baptized in the name of the Holy Trinity, or even in the name of Jesus alone. In my view, it is an awful thing to iterate baptism, when it has been before "essentially performed;" I mean administered by sprinkling, washing, or plunging, by or in water, in the name of the Father, Son, and Spirit, [that] being invoked at the time; and it matters not at what period of his life a person has had it.' Dr. A. C. See Kuin. against Anabaptists, whose note is omitted for want of room: his arguments are mostly contained in what is here given, from Henry, Scott, &c. See Bl. Ed. 'Those who were baptized by John, were bound to the metanoia [repentance and change] to which he exhorted them, and were prepared for the kingdom of the Messiah that was to come. The apostles, while Jesus was on earth, baptized those who applied for baptism; (Jn. 3:5, note, and 28. 4:1, 2.) thus binding them to Jesus, and his doctrine, and instituting the new economy, soon to be established by the Messiah. So Jn. 4:1. "He makes disciples and baptizes," comp. with v. 2. That Jesus was the Messiah the apostles were not at that time assured, (see on Mat. 16:20. 10:7.) and so they did not baptize them to Jesus the Messiah. Those who had undergone John's baptism, and had been taught by Jesus Himself, and admitted his doctrine, were not rebaptized by the apostles. See Jn. 3:26. Nor were the apostles again baptized by Jesus; for they were nursed up under his instruction, and in due time taught his Messiahship, and were baptized with the Holy Spirit. But when, after Christ's departure to heaven, a church had, by his direction, been established by the apostles, whose foundation He Himself had laid, and into which they who should account Jesus as the Messiah, and profess his doctrine, were to be received; then also those who had been baptized by John, or after his death, by his disciples, and who had not enrolled themselves in the number of Jesus' followers, while He was on earth, nor accounted Him as Messiah (see Acts 2:37, and 41.): were by the apostles again baptized; as were by Paul these 12 here. At Acts 2. it is not indeed expressly said, that any of John's disciples were among the baptized, but from the silence of Luke nothing can be proved. Of Apollos (Acts 18.) it is nowhere said he was not rebaptized, but (and so Ernesti) the thing is passed by, as well known and usual.'

KUIN.

(6.) Spake, &c. 'I can by no means accede to the harsh interpretations of these words propounded by the foreign commentators. The plain and simple sense is, "they spake with other, and to them, strange and foreign tongues, and sustained the character of prophets and inspired teachers." See Ecumenius and Chrysostom.'

BLOOMF.

V. 8—12. The handkerchiefs and aprons (probably such as both men and women, at their work, wore to save their other clothes) could not convey any virtue from the apostle, but were mere tokens of the Lord's omnipotent operation, as the waving of the rod of Moses had been. 'These cures wrought on absent persons, some of them a considerable distance from Ephesus, might conduce greatly to the success of the Gospel among those, whose faces Paul himself had not seen.' Doddr. 'Asia, throughout the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of Paul, does not mean the whole of Asia Minor, or Anatolia, nor even the whole of the proconsular Asia, but a district in the anterior part of that country, called Lydian Asia, divided from the rest, much as Portugal is from Spain, and of which district Ephesus was the capital.' Paley.—[The most extensive and flourishing district W. of Mt. Taurus and the river Halys, was dignified by the Romans with the exclusive title of Asia. See note, end of Acts.] (10.) Two years. The apostle, in his address to the elders of Ephesus, mentions 3 years, 20:31. and most commentators date the beginning of these 3 years from his first coming to Ephesus. (18:19—21.) Nine months, however, seem far too short a time for his voyage and journey to Jerusalem, and his circuit, by Antioch, and through Galatia and Phrygia, and the upper regions of Asia. The circuit itself could not be made, without travelling perhaps 1000 miles, probably on

10 And this continued by the space <sup>p</sup> of two years; so that all they which dwelt in Asia <sup>a</sup> heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks.

11 And God wrought special <sup>r</sup> miracles by the hands of Paul:

12 So that from his body were brought unto the sick <sup>s</sup> handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them.

13 ¶ Then certain of the vagabond Jews, exorcists, took upon them <sup>t</sup> to call over them which had evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus, saying, We adjure <sup>u</sup> you by Jesus, whom Paul preacheth.

and therefore ought to concern themselves about, 2 Cor. 5:11. Paul was a moving preacher, master of the art of persuasion. (3.) Undauntedly, and with a holy resolution; boldly, as one that had not the least doubt of the things he spake of, nor the least distrust of Him he spake from, or the least dread of them he spake to.

4. How long he preached to them; for the space of three months, a competent time for them to consider; in that time those among them that belonged to the election of grace were called in, and the rest were left inexcusable. Thus long Paul preached the Gospel with much contention, 1 Thess. 2:2. yet he did not fail, nor was discouraged.

5. His success. (1.) Some were persuaded to believe in Christ; intimated, some think, in the word persuading; he prevailed with them. (2.) Divers continued in infidelity, and were confirmed in their prejudices against Christianity. When Paul called on them before, and preached only some general things to them, they courted his stay among them, ch. 18:20. but now that he settled among them, and his word came more closely to their consciences, they were soon weary of him. They had an invincible aversion to the Gospel, were resolved they would not believe, and did their utmost to raise and keep up in others an aversion to it, spake evil of that way before the multitude, to prejudice them against it. Though they could not show any manner of evil in it, yet they said all manner of evil concerning it.

II. When he had carried the matter as far as it would go in the synagogue, and found that their opposition grew more obstinate, he left the synagogue; they hated to be reformed, hated to be instructed, and therefore he departed from them. Here we are sure there was a separation, and no schism; for there was a just cause for it, and a clear call to it. Now observe,

1. When Paul departed from the Jews, he took the disciples with him, and separated them, to save them from that untoward generation; according to the charge Peter gave to his new converts, ch. 2:40. he separated them which believed, to be the foundation of a Christian church, now that there were a competent number to be incorporated, that others might attend with them on the preaching of the Gospel, and might, on their believing, be added to them.

2. When Paul separated from the synagogue, he set up a meeting of his own, in the school of one Tyrannus; he left the synagogue, that he might go on with more freedom; and he had by this separation a double advantage, (1.) Now his opportunities were more frequent. In the synagogue, he could only preach every sabbath-day, ch. 13:42. but now he set up a lecture every day, and those whose business would not permit them to come one day, might come another day; (2.) Now they were more open. To the synagogue of the Jews none might come, or could come, but Jews or proselytes; Gentiles were excluded; but when he set up a meeting in the school of Tyrannus, both Jews and Greeks attended his ministry, v. 10. Thus, as he describes his gate of opportunity at Ephesus, 1 Cor. 16:8, 9. a wide door, and an effectual was opened to him, though there were many adversaries. Some think this school of Tyrannus was a divinity-school of the Jews; if so, it shows that though Paul left the synagogue, he still kept as near it as he could, as he had done, ch. 18:7. But others think it was a philosophy-school of the Gentiles, belonging to one Tyrannus, or a retiring place, for so the word sometimes signifies, belonging to a principal man or governor of the city; some convenient place it was, which Paul and the disciples had the use of, either for love or money.

3. Here he continued his labors for 2 years, from the end of the 3 months he spent in the synagogue, v. 8. and after they were ended, he continued for some time in the country about, preaching, therefore he might justly reckon it in all 3 years, as he does, ch. 20:31.

4. The Gospel hereby spread far and near, v. 10; not only all that dwelt in Ephesus, but all that dwelt in that large province called Asia, which Ephesus was the head city of; Asia the Less, so called. There was great resort to Ephesus from all parts of the country, for law, traffic, religion, or education; which gave Paul opportunity of sending the Gospel to all that country: all heard the Word of the Lord Jesus. The Gospel is Christ's Word, a word concerning Christ. This they heard, or at least heard of it; some of all sects, some out of all parts, both in city and country; and by them it was communicated to others; so they all heard the Word of the Lord Jesus, or might have heard it. Probably, Paul sometimes made excursions himself into the country, to preach the Gospel, or sent his assistants, and thus the Word of the Lord was heard throughout that region.

III. God confirmed Paul's doctrine by miracles, which awakened people's inquiries after it, fixed their affection to it, and engaged their belief of it, v. 11, 12. I wonder we have not read of any miracle wrought by Paul, since the casting of the evil spirit out of the damsel at Philippi; it is certain he wrought many at Corinth, though Luke has recorded none, for he tells them, 2 Cor. 12:12. the signs of his apostleship were among them, in wonders and mighty deeds.

But here at Ephesus they were special [extraordinary] miracles, either such things were done, as could by no means be ascribed to second causes; or, as all miracles are of this character, these were even uncommon miracles, such miracles as had not been wrought by the hands of any other of the apostles. As God's instrument, he not only cured the sick that were brought to him, or that he was brought to; but they got Paul's handkerchiefs, or the aprons, (so some,) he wore when he worked at his trade, and the applying of them to the sick, cured them immediately. Or, they brought the sick people's handkerchiefs, or their girdles, or caps, or head-dresses, and laid them for a while to Paul's body, and then took them to the sick. The former is more probable. Now was fulfilled that word of Christ to his disciples, Greater works than these shall ye do. We read of one that was cured by the touch of Christ's garment, when it was on Him; but here were people cured by Paul's garments when taken from him. Christ gave his apostles power against unclean spirits and all manner of sickness, Mat. 10:1. Accordingly those to whom Paul sent relief, had it in both these cases; the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them; both significant of the great design and blessed effect of the Gospel, to heal spiritual diseases, and to free souls from Satan.

V. 13—20. To show how many ways Christ triumphed over Satan, we have here two remarkable instances of it, in those that were not only violently possessed by him, but voluntarily devoted to him.

I. The confusion of some of Satan's servants, vagabond Jews, that were exorcists, who used Christ's name profanely, in their diabolical enchantments. Observe,

1. Their general character; they were of the Jewish nation and religion, but vagabonds; went about from town to town, to get money by conjuring; to tell people their fortunes, and pretended by spells and charms to cure diseases, and bring people to themselves; that were melancholy or distracted. They called themselves exorcists, because in doing their tricks they used forms of adjuration, by such and such commanding names. The superstitious Jews, to put a reputation on these magic arts, wickedly attributed the invention of them to Solomon. Josephus, Antiq. lib. 8. cap. 2. And Christ seems to refer to this, Mat. 12:27. By whom do your children cast them out?

2. At Ephesus were some, seven sons of one Sceva, a Jew, and chief of the priests, v. 14. head of one of the 24 courses of priests. One would think the temple would find both employment and encouragement enough for the sons of a chief priest, if they had been twice as many. But, probably, it was a vain, rambling, rakish humor that took them all to turn mountebanks, and stroll all the world over to cure mad folks.

3. Their profaneness; they took upon them, to call over evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus; not as those who venerated Christ, and confided in Him, as we read of some who foot, besides the voyage from Ephesus to Cesarea; and the stay in each place, in order to answer the intended purposes, must have been considerable. Neither does it appear, how he could say, 'Remember, that by the space of 3 years, I ceased not to warn every one of you night and day with tears,' if he had been absent from them 9 months of the time. It is therefore most natural to conclude, that after he had preached 2 years in the school of Tyrannus, he continued at Ephesus some months longer, before he went into Macedonia. Scott.

(9.) Departed... separated. [Apostas...aphōrise: the words evidently denote separating from church communion. [Tyrannus: tyrant, or king.] A not very unfrequent name, we are told, like King among us. Commentators are not quite agreed what sort of a school this Tyrannus taught. Lightf., Vitr., Hamm., Doddr., and Schoettg. think it was a kind of Beth Midrasch, or Divinity Hall, designed for reading theological lectures. Others, as Pearce, Ros., and Kuin. think it was a philosophical-lecture-room, (for the Gr., see Wetst., is applied to them as well as to boys' schools,) and that Tyrannus was a rhetorician or sophist. If the former conjecture be true, he was probably a converted Jew; [Dr.

A. C. says Jews, besides the rabbins, kept schools;] if the latter, a converted Gentile.

(10.) All, &c. 'Infinite was the number of persons who resorted to this capital and emporium of Asia Minor, on all kinds of business, religious, political, and commercial.' Grot.

(12.) Handkerchiefs. [Soudaria: sweat-wipers. Aprons.] Simikinthia: lit. half girdles, pinafores, aprons (contr. for afore onc). See Bl. Ed.

V. 13—20. Num. 22:5. It was common in those days for persons to exorcise such as were possessed with evil spirits, especially among the Jews; and, whatever methods they employed, they seem to have, in one way or other, expressed a dependence on God, and at some times, at least, to have succeeded. Mat. 12:27, 28. Jesus I know, and Paul I know, &c. The words are ambiguous; and might imply a confederacy with Jesus and Paul, in consequence of which the evil spirit would have gone out, had Paul thus spoken to him: and Satan might intend to bring the Gospel into suspicion by the insinuation. Mat. 12:22—30. Yet they may signify, that the evil spirit knew the power and authority of Jesus, and the efficacy of the apostle's faith, to engage that power by his word;

14 And there were seven sons of one Sceva, a Jew, and chief of the priests, which did so.

15 And the evil spirit answered and said, Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are ye?

16 And the man in whom the evil spirit was, leaped upon them, and overcame them, and prevailed against them, so that they fled out of that house naked and wounded.

17 And this was known to all the Jews and Greeks also dwelling at Ephesus; and fear fell on them all, and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified.

18 And many that believed came, and confessed, and shewed their deeds.

19 Many of them also which used curious arts, brought their books together, and burned them before all men: and they counted the price of them, and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver.

20 So mightily grew the word of God, and prevailed.

cast out devils in Christ's name, and yet did not follow with his disciples, Luke 9:49. whom He would not have to be discouraged; but as those who were willing to try all methods to carry on their wicked trade, and it should seem, had this design; if the evil spirits should yield to an adjuration in the name of Jesus, by those that did not believe in Him, they would say, it was no confirmation of his doctrine to those that did; for it was all one, whether they believed it or no. If they should not yield to it, they would say, the name of Christ was not so powerful as the other names they used, which the devils had often by collusion yielded to. They said, We adjure you by Jesus, (not, whom we believe in, or depend on, or have any authority from, but) whom Paul preaches; as if they had said, 'We will try what that name will do.' PRACT. OBS. V. 1—20. Alas! many seem not to have 'heard, that there is a Holy Ghost!' and many regard all that is spoken concerning his graces and consolations, to be enthusiasm and delusion!—Surely such books as are indecent and licentious, scornfully infidel, or heretical in essential matters, would be condemned to the flames, if 'the Word of God grew mightily and prevailed' among us; not indeed by the sentence of the inquisitor, but by the voluntary choice of the possessors. Were all such books destroyed in this [laud], their price would be found immensely more than '50,000 pieces of silver!' Will not then these so that if Paul had commanded, he must have yielded. But he knew not them, and would not obey their command. A man must himself be 'possessed with a spirit' of incredulity, who can doubt of this having been a real possession, and maintain that this event was merely the effect of insanity. 16:16—18. Mat. 8:23, 29. (19.) The price.] Some reckon it to have been almost £7000, supposing shekels to be meant. I think it evident, that these books did not merely contain an account of the tricks, by which jugglers of any description imposed on men's senses; for in that case, the persons concerned might have used the books, to detect the artifices of such impostors. They contained the rules and forms of those abominable incantations, by which an intercourse with evil spirits has continually been attempted, or conducted. These being in reality the regulations of the worship of the devil, the devised means of worshipping him, and of seeking help and information from him, ought by all means to be destroyed, and forgotten, if possible: though the attempt to revive these practices, by publishing books on such subjects, forms one of the bad effects which attend on the manifold advantages of the liberty of the press in this Christian age and nation. Exorcists.] 'An exorcist is one, who impels another, as in the name of God, to the confession of the truth, or to any action. I adjure, is used for commanding anything, interposing the authority of God. 4. The confusion they were put to; let them not be deceived, God is not mocked, nor shall the glorious name of Jesus be prostituted to such a vile purpose as this; what communion hath Christ with Belial? (1.) The evil spirit gave them a sharp reply, v. 15. 'I know Jesus has conquered principalities and powers, and Paul has authority in his name to cast out devils; but what power have you to command us in his name, or who gave you any such power, seeing you hate his instructions?' Ps. 50:16, 17. This was extorted out of the mouth of the evil spirit by the power of God, to gain honor to the Gospel, and to put those to shame, that made an ill use of Christ's name. (2.) The man in whom the evil spirit was, gave them a warm reception, leaped upon them, in the height of his frenzy and rage, overcame them, and all their enchantments, prevailed against them, and was every way too hard for them; so that they fled out of the house, not only naked, their clothes pulled off their backs, but wounded. This is written for a warning to all those who name the name of Christ, but do not depart from iniquity. The same enemy that overcomes them with his temptations, will overcome them with his terrors; and their adjuring him in Christ's name to let them alone, will be no security. If we resist the devil, by a true and lively faith in Christ, he will flee from us; but if we think to resist him by the bare using of Christ's name, or any part of his Word, as a spell or charm, he will prevail against us.

5. The general notice taken of this, and the good impression it made on many, v. 17. (1.) Men were terrified; fear fell on them all.—In this instance, they saw the malice of the devil, whom they served, and the power of Christ, whom they opposed; and both were awful considerations. (2.) God was glorified; the name of the Lord Jesus, by which his faithful servants cast out devils, and cured diseases, without any resistance, was the more magnified; for now it appeared to be a name above every name.

II. Here is the conversion of others of Satan's servants, and the evidences of their conversion.

1. Those that had been guilty of wicked practices, confessed them, v. 18.; what ill lives they had led, and what a great deal of secret wickedness their own consciences charged them with, which the world knew not of; secret frauds and secret filthinesses; they showed their deeds; took shame to themselves, and gave glory to God, and warning to others; confessions not extorted, but voluntary, to ease their consciences, which the late miracles had struck a terror upon. Where there is true contrition for sin, there will be an ingenuous confession of sin to God in every prayer, and to man whom we have offended, when the case requires it.

2. Those that had conversed with wicked books, burnt them, v. 19. Many also of them which used curious arts, impertinent things, busy bodies, so the word is used, 2 Thess. 3:11. 1 Tim. 5:13. that traded in the study of magic and divination; in books of judicial astrology, casting of nativities, telling of fortunes, raising and laying of spirits, interpreting of dreams, predicting future events, and the like; to which some think, are to be added plays, romances, love-books, and unchaste and immodest poems. Stres. These, having their consciences more awakened than ever, to see the evil of those practices which these books instructed them in, brought their books together, and burned them before all men. Ephesus was notorious for the use of these curious arts; hence spells and charms were called Literæ Ephesiæ. Here people furnished themselves with all those sorts of books, and, probably, had tutors to instruct them in those black arts. It was therefore much for the honor of Christ and his Gospel, to have such a noble testimony borne against those curious arts, in a place where they were so much in vogue. In a holy indignation at the sins they had been guilty of, Is. 2:20.; and being steadfastly resolved never to use them, they burnt them. Those that truly repent of sin, will keep themselves as far as possible from the occasions of it. Thus, too, they prevented their doing mischief to others. Thus they showed a contempt of the wealth of this world; for the price of the books was found to be 50,000 pieces of silver; which some compute to be £1500 of our money; probably the books were scarce, perhaps prohibited, and therefore dear; or had cost so much; yet, being the devil's books, they did not think that would justify them in being so wicked as to sell them again. They joined together in making this bonfire, in joy [as it were] of their conversion, and made it before all men, that Christ and his grace in them might be the more magnified, and all about them the more edified.

III. A general account of the progress and success of the Gospel in and about Ephesus, v. 20. It is a blessed sight to see the Word of God thus growing and prevailing mightily, by the addition of many to the church, and by the advancement of those in knowledge and grace.

V. 21—41. Paul is here brought into Ephesian converts rise up in judgment against such professors of the Gospel, especially, as trade in pernicious books and pamphlets; and who encourage such publications, for lucre's sake, as they must know are likely to do great mischief in the world? And is it not a proof, that the Word of God declines in its influence and authority, when books pretending to teach, and persons professing to exercise, forbidden and magical arts, are publicly advertised among us? But let no friend of the Gospel countenance any pretensions of this kind; whether they be human impositions, or diabolical delusions. SCOTT.

V. 21, 22. Thus he laid the plan of his voyages and journeys, backward and forward, of some thousands of miles, as if it had been no more ended, Paul purposed in the spirit, when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem, saying, After I have been there, I must also see Rome.

22 So he sent into Macedonia two of them that ministered unto him, Timotheus and Erastus; but he himself stayed in Asia for a season.

23 And the same time there arose no small stir about that way.

24 For a certain man named Demetrius, a silversmith, which made silver shrines for Diana, brought no small gain unto the craftsmen;

some trouble at Ephesus, just when forecasting to go thence. See,

1. He was a man of vast designs for God, and was for making his influences as far diffusive as might be. Having spent above two years at Ephesus, (1.) He designed a visit to the churches of Macedonia and Achaia, especially of Philippi and Corinth, the chief cities of those provinces, v. 21. He purposed in the spirit; either in his own spirit, not communicating his purpose as yet; or by the direction of the Holy Spirit, by whom he was led. (2.) Thence he designed to visit the brethren at Jerusalem, and give an account to them of the prospering of the good pleasure of the Lord in his hand; and thence he intended to go to Rome, to see Rome, an expression people commonly used, that they would go see Rome, would look about them there; what he designed, was, to see the Christians there, and to do them some service, Rom. 1:11. Lightfoot supposes it was on the death of the emperor Claudius, who died the second year of Paul's being at Ephesus, that Paul thought of going to Rome, because while he lived, the Jews were forbidden Rome, ch. 18:2. (3.) He sent Timothy and Erastus into Macedonia, to give notice of his intended visit, and to get their collection ready for the poor saints at Jerusalem. Soon after, he wrote the first epistle to the Corinthians, designing to follow it himself, as appears 1 Cor. 4:17, 19. For the present, he stayed in Asia, about Ephesus, founding churches.

2. He was seconded in his purpose, and obliged to pursue it by the troubles he at length met with at Ephesus. Strange, he had been quiet there so long; yet it should seem he had met with trouble there, not recorded in this story; for in his epistle, written at this time, he speaks of his having fought with beasts, at Ephesus, 1 Cor. 15:32. which seems to be meant of fighting with wild beasts in the theatre, according to the barbarous treatment they sometimes gave the Christians. And he speaks of the trouble which came to them in Asia, near Ephesus, when he despoiled of life, and received a sentence of death within himself, 2 Cor. 1:8, 9.

As to the trouble here related, in general, there arose no small stir about that way, v. 23. Some historians say, that famous impostor Apollonius Tyanæus, who set up for a rival with Christ, and gave out himself, as Simon Magus, to be some great one, was at Ephesus about this time. But it seems the opposition he gave to the Gospel was so insignificant, that Luke did not think it worth noticing.

I. A great complaint against Paul and the other preachers of the Gospel, for drawing people off from the worship of Diana, and so spoiling the trade of the silversmiths that worked for Diana's temple.

1. The complainant is Demetrius, a silversmith, a principal man, it is likely, of the trade, and one that would be thought to understand and consult the interests of it, more than others of the company. The most advantageous branch of his trade, was, making silver shrines for Diana, v. 24. Some think, these were medals, stamped with the effigies of Diana, or her temple, or both; others think, they were representations of the temple, with the image of Diana in it, in miniature; so small, that people might carry them about with them, as the papists do their crucifixes. Those that came from far, when they went home, bought these little temples or shrines, to carry home with them, to gratify the curiosity of their friends, and to preserve, in their own minds, the idea of that stately edifice. See how craftsmen, and crafty men too, above the rank of silversmiths, make an advantage to themselves of people's superstition, and serve their worldly ends by it.

2. The persons he appeals to, are not the magistrates, but the mob, the craftsmen, a company of mechanics, who had no sense of anything but their worldly interest, who would be actuated as little by reason, and as much by fury, as he could desire.

3. His complaint and representation are very full. (1.) He lays it down for a principle, that the art and mystery of making silver shrines for the worshippers of Diana, was very necessary to be supported and kept up, v. 25. It is natural for men to be jealous for that, whether right or wrong, by which they get their wealth: and many have, for this reason alone, set themselves against the Gospel of Christ, because it calls men off from those crafts which are unlawful, how much wealth soever is to be gotten by them. (2.) He charges it on Paul, that he had dissuaded men from worshipping idols. The words, as laid in the indictment, are, that he had asserted, They are no gods which are made with hands, v. 26. Could any truth be more plain and self-evident than this, or any reasoning more cogent and convincing than those of the prophets, The workman made it, therefore it is not God? Yet this must be looked upon as a heretical and atheistical notion, and Paul as a criminal for maintaining it; not that they could advance anything against it, but that the consequence of it was, that not only at Ephesus, the chief city, but almost throughout all Asia, among the country people, who were their best customers, and whom they thought they were surest of, he had persuaded and turned away much people from the worship of Diana; so that there was not now such a demand for the silver shrines as had been, nor such good rates given for them. There are those who will stickle for that which is most grossly absurd and unreasonable, and which carries along with it its own conviction of falsehood, as this does, that those are gods which are made with hands, if it have but human laws, and worldly interest and prescription, on its side. (3.) He reminds them of the danger their trade was in of going to decay. Whatever touches that, touches them in a tender part. This our part, so the word is, 'our interest or share of trade and commerce, will not only come into danger of being lost, but will bring us into danger, and we shall become not only beggars, but malefactors.' (4.) He pretends a mighty zeal for Diana, and a jealousy for her honor; Not only this craft; if that were all, he would not have spoken with so much warmth, but the temple of the great goddess Diana, and her magnificence; we would not, for the world, see the diminution of the honor of that goddess, whom all Asia and the world worship. See what the worship of Diana had to plead in its behalf, — pomp and numbers. The magnificence of the temple was the thing that charmed them; they could not bear the thoughts of anything than a progress through a single province! (21.) Purposed in the Spirit. 20:22. It does not appear, that pneuma with the article as here, and without the possessive pronoun, or something to fix the application of it, is used in the N. T., except for the Holy Spirit. (20:22—24.) SCOTT.

(21.) These things, &c. Many events referred to in the Epistles happened during this period. Philemon, probably, (Phil. 19.) and Epaphras, afterwards ministers at Colosse, were converted about this time: Col. 1:4, 78. 2:1. 4:12, 13. The apostle was also visited by several Christians from neighboring parts, during his abode here, particularly by Sosthenes and Apollos from Corinth, and by some of the family of Chloe, a woman, as it seems, of some figure there, (1 Cor. 1:1, 11.) as also by Stephanus, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, all from the same place; (1 Cor. 16:17.) and Onesiphorus, who afterwards so affectionately visited him at Rome, was, as Timothy had frequent opportunities of observing, very serviceable to the apostle here; 2 Tim. 1:16—18. And there is great reason to believe he wrote 1 Cor. from hence, (1 Cor. 16:18.) and about this time; for it is plain that Aquila and Priscilla were then with him in Asia, 1 Cor. 16:19. as they now were, Acts 18:18, 19, 26. that it was after Apollos had visited Corinth, had watered Paul's plantation there, and was returned to Ephesus again, 1 Cor. 3:6. 16:8, 12. and that it was when Paul himself, having lately given a charge to the Galatian churches on that head, (comp. 1 Cor. 16:1, 2. with Acts 18:23.) intended a journey from Asia to the Macedonian and Corinthian churches, and was sending Timothy to prepare his way, 1 Cor. 4:17, 19. 16:5, 10. comp. with our v. and the next.

V. 23—31. (26.) No gods, &c. 'This plainly shows that the contrary opinion generally prevailed, namely, that there was a kind of divinity in the images of their supposed deities [note, Dan. 3:5.] . . . though some of them . . . learned to speak of them just as papists now do; who indeed may seem to have borrowed some of their apologies from the heathens.' DODD. [See Bl.] The vulgar, both among pagans and papists, always have supposed, that there is some kind of divinity in the image: but the more learned and philosophical palliate the absurdity, by considering the image as the visible representation of the invisible deity or saint. It might also be easily shown, that the processions, and very many other observances of the papists, are copied from pagan customs; and far more clear illustrations of these pompous ceremonies may be made from Virgil, Horace, Ovid, Juvenal, and other classical writers, than from the Holy Scriptures, or even the Apocrypha. SCOTT.

(24.) Shrines.] Naoses: called also by classic writers, naidia, i. e. temple-shapes. Comp. note and cut, Is. 3:18—23, v. 20. 'These little silver models of the temple were bought by strangers for curiosity or devotion, as are the models of the Santa Casa [holy house] at Loretto, in Italy, by the pilgrims. Even Diana's effigy was worshipped with singular fervency by even the most remote and barbarous nations, and they dedicated temples to her: for she presided not only over hunting, but the compounding of poison or drugs, (lit. pharmacy.) and was therefore worshipped by those who cultivated the magic arts. She was regarded as the author and distributor of health and sickness, and was especially invoked by women in travail. It was an early custom for worshippers of idols to carry these portable chapels, (made of wood or metal, in which were enclosed images of the gods or goddesses,) in journeys for a safeguard; and sometimes they sent them, by way of expiating an offence, to other towns, to be placed in the temples there.' II. The popular resentment.

1. A great displeasure against the Gospel and its preachers, v. 28. full of fury and indignation, so the word signifies. The craftsmen went stark mad, when they were told that their trade and their idol were both in danger.

2. A great jealousy for the honor of their goddess; They cried out, ' Let Paul say ever so much to prove that those are no gods which are made with hands, we will abide by it that, whatever comes of other gods and goddesses, Great is Diana of the Ephesians. We must and will stand up for the religion of our country, which we have received by tradition from our fathers.' Much more should the servants of the true God do so, who can say, This God is our God for ever and ever.

3. A great disorder among themselves, v. 29. The whole city was full of confusion,—the common, and natural effect of an intemperate zeal for a false religion; it throws all into confusion, dethrones reason, and inthrones passion; and men run together, not only not knowing one another's minds, but not knowing their own.

III. The proceedings of the mob under the power of these resentments.

1. They laid hands on some of Paul's companions, and hurried them into the theatre, v. 29. Some think, with design there to make them fight with beasts, as Paul had; or perhaps they intended only to abuse them, and to make them a spectacle to the crowd. We read of both Gaius and Aristarchus elsewhere; Gaius was of Derbe, ch. 20: 4. Aristarchus is also there spoken of, and Col. 4: 10. They came with Paul from Macedonia, and their only crime was, they were Paul's companions in travel, both in services and sufferings.

2. Paul, who had escaped being seized by them, when he perceived his friends in distress for his sake, would have entered in unto the people, to [appease them, and] sacrifice himself, if there were no other remedy, rather than his friends should suffer on his account; it evidenced a generous spirit, and that he loved his neighbor as himself.

3. He was dissuaded from it by the kindness of his friends, that overruled him. They had reason to say to Paul, as David's servants did to him, when exposing himself in a piece of public service, Thou art worth ten thousand of us, 2 Sam. 18: 3. They would treat him much worse than Gaius and Aristarchus, looking on him as the ring-leader of the party; therefore, better let them bear the brunt of the storm than that he should venture into it, v. 31. They were certain of the chief of Asia, the princes of Asia. The critics tell us, they were the chief of their priests; or, as others, the chief of their players. Whether they were converts, or only well-wishers to Paul, we are not told; they were Paul's friends. Lightfoot suggests, they kept up a respect and kindness for him ever since he fought with beasts in their theatre, and were afraid he should be abused so again. It is a friendly part to take more care of the lives and comforts of good men, than they do themselves. It would be very hazardous for Paul to go into the theatre; a thousand to one it would cost him his life; therefore Paul was overruled by his friends to obey the law of self-preservation; and has taught us to keep out of the way of danger as long as we can, without going out of the way of duty. We may be called to lay down our lives, but not to throw away our lives. It would better become Paul to venture into a synagogue than into a theatre.

4. The mob was in a perfect confusion, v. 32. Some cried one thing, and some another; some, Down with the Jews; others, Down with Paul; but the assembly was confused, as not understanding one another's minds; the truth was, they did not understand their own; the greater part knew not wherefore they were come together; they knew not what began the riot, nor who; much less what business they had there; but, as on such occasions, the greatest part come only to inquire what the matter was: they follow the cry, follow the crowd, increasing like a snow-ball.

5. The Jews would have interested themselves in this tumult; for it had been strange if a persecution were carried on against the Christians, and there were not Jews at one end or the other of it; but they had not interest enough to raise the mob; yet, when it was raised, they had ill-will enough to set in with it, v. 33. They drew Alexander out of the multitude, called him out to speak on the behalf of the Jews against Paul and his companions. This they looked upon as necessary in their own defence; therefore, what he designed to say is called his apologizing to the people, not for himself in particular, but for the Jews in general, whom the worshippers of Diana looked upon to be as much their enemies as Paul; now they would have them know, that they were as much Paul's enemies as themselves were; and they who are thus careful to distinguish themselves from the servants of Christ now, and are afraid of being taken for them, shall have their doom accordingly in the

See Bloomf. Ed. 'Plut. and Soph. account all the makers of images as most audacious, and sharply rebuke them; and hold all image-worship in detestation. and danced in the orchestra, 5 feet lower.' Adam. They generally rehearsed in the porticoes. See Adam, Edinburgh ed. 1835. Theatres contained, some 40,000, and one 80,000 persons. 'With the Greeks and states of Grecian origin, the theatre [cut, Acts, end] was a place of assembly for public business of every kind, and served for senate-house, town-hall, forum, &c.; and harangues to the people were there delivered. See on 12:21. Indeed, all important political affairs were there transacted; war declared, peace proclaimed, and criminals executed.' Kuin. 'Wetst. well observes, that the very situation of the place, would, not a little, promote and increase the tumult, since, as we find from the accounts of travellers, the temple was in view of the theatre, [and it would seem any clamor, too, could be heard from one at the other.] The Gaius here was not the same with that Rom. 16:23. who was a Corinthian.' Bloomf. ED

30 And when Paul would have entered in unto the people, the disciples suffered him not.

31 And certain of the chief of Asia, which were his friends, sent unto him, desiring <sup>1</sup>him that he would not adventure himself into the theatre.

[Practical Observations.]

32 Some <sup>m</sup> therefore cried one thing, and some another; for the assembly was confused; and the more part knew not wherefore they were come together.

33 And they drew Alexander out of the multitude, the Jews putting him forward. And Alexander <sup>n</sup> beckoned with the hand, and would have made his defence unto the people.

34 But when they knew that he was a Jew, all with one voice, about the space of two hours, cried out, Great is Diana of the Ephesians!

35 And when the town-clerk had appeased the people, he said, Ye men <sup>o</sup> of Ephesus, what man is there that knoweth not how that the city of the Ephesians is <sup>p</sup>a worshipper of the great goddess Diana, and of the image which fell down from Jupiter?

great day. Alexander beckoned with the hand, desiring to be heard against Paul. Some think he had been a Christian, but had apostatized to Judaism, and therefore was drawn out as a proper person to accuse Paul; and that he was that Alexander the copper- smith that did Paul so much evil, 2 Tim. 4:14. and whom he had delivered unto Satan, 1 Tim. 1:20.

6. This occasioned the prosecutors to drop the prosecution of Paul's friends, and to turn it into acclamations in honor of their goddess, v. 34. When they knew that he was a Jew, and, as such, an enemy to the worship of Diana, (for the Jews had now an implacable hatred to idols and idolatry,) whatever he had to say for Paul or against him, they were resolved not to hear him, and therefore set the mob a shouting, 'Great is Diana of the Ephesians; whoever runs her down, be he Jew or Christian, we are resolved to cry her up; she is Diana of the Ephesians, our Diana; and it is our honor and happiness to have her temple with us; and she is great, a famous goddess, and universally adored; there are other Dianas, but Diana of the Ephesians is beyond them all, because her temple is more rich and magnificent than any of their's.' This was all the cry for two hours together; and it was thought a sufficient confutation of Paul's doctrine, that they are not gods which are made with hands. Thus the most sacred truths are often run down with nothing else but noise, and clamor, and popular fury *! They were mad upon their idols. Diana made the Ephesians great, for the town was enriched by the vast concourse of people from all parts to Diana's temple there; therefore, they are concerned by all means possible to keep up her sinking reputation with, Great is Diana of the Ephesians.

IV. The suppression and dispersion of these rioters, by the prudence and vigilance of the town-clerk; he is called, the scribe, or secretary, or recorder; 'the governor of the city,' so some; 'the registrar of their games,' the Olympic games, so some; whose business it was to preserve the names of the victors, and the prizes they won. With much ado, he, at length, stilled the noise, so as to be heard, and then made a pacific speech to them, and gave us an instance of that of Solomon, The words of wise men are heard in quiet, more than the cry of him that rules among fools, as Demetrius did, Ec. 9:17.

1. He humors them with an acknowledgment, that Diana was the celebrated goddess of the Ephesians, v. 35. They needed not to be so loud and strenuous in asserting a truth which nobody denied, or could be ignorant of; every one knows the city of the Ephesians is a worshipper of the great goddess Diana; is, neokoros; not only that the inhabitants were worshippers of this goddess, but the city, as a corporation, was, by its charter, intrusted with the worship of Diana, to take care of her temple, and to accommodate those who came thither to do her homage. Ephesus is the ædütua, (they say that is the most proper word,) or the sacrist, of the great goddess Diana. Such care did idolaters take to keep up the worship of gods made with hands, while the worship of the true and living God is neglected, and few nations or cities glory in patronizing and protecting that! The temple of Diana at Ephesus was a very rich and sumptuous structure, but, it should seem, her image in the temple, because they thought it sanctified the temple, was had in greater veneration than the temple, for they persuaded the people that it fell down from Jupiter, and therefore was none of the gods that were made with men's hands. See how easily the credulity of superstitious people is imposed on by the fraud of designing men! Because this image of Diana had been set up time out of mind, and nobody could tell who made it, they made the people believe it fell down from Jupiter.

'Now these things,' says the town-clerk, very gravely, (but whether seriously or no, and as one that did himself believe them, may be questioned,) 'cannot be spoken against; they have obtained such universal credit, that you need not fear contradiction, it can do you no prejudice.' Some take it thus; 'Seeing the image of Diana fell down from Jupiter, as we all believe, then

PRACT. OBS. V. 21—31. The enterprising spirit and unwearied diligence of conquerors, navigators, and others, are generally admired: but the same endowments, when directed by love to Christ, and to the souls of men, commonly meet with neglect, if not ridicule and contempt! [How many call the risking of life in commercial pursuits, for selfish ends, 'enterprise;' while ridiculing the missionary who puts his life in his hand for the best good of others!] The distinct principles of avarice and superstition naturally coalesce: nor would idolatry, delusion, or vice, though congenial to the human heart, meet with so firm and general a support, did they not conduce to the temporal advantage of numbers, who grow rich by them. The immense encouragement which popery has always given to painting, sculpture, music, architecture, and other ingenious arts, attaches great multitudes to its splendid forms; and greatly impedes all attempts for reformation. The devotees of mammon and superstition not only impose on others, but on themselves; and imagine that they really love their religion, while they only value the affluence, and splendor, and honor, derived from it! Their selfishness increases their bigotry; and their interested opposition to the Gospel elokes its malignity under zeal for some forms or observances: their indignation and resentment, and envy, are expressed in furious zeal for the honor of their idol; and the servants of God are hated and persecuted, because they draw men off from those sins by which lucrative trades are supported. Such persons would 'eat up the sin of the people, and set their hearts upon their iniquities;' whilst they vehemently contend 'for the vain conversation delivered by tradition from their fathers.' Ecclesiastical history continually furnishes the student with instances of these combinations: and we can scarcely look around us in the world, but we see the part of Demetrius, and the workmen, acted over and over again, even to the filling of cities with tumult and confusion. It is as safe to contend with wild beasts, as with men who are thus enraged by bigotry and disappointed avarice; or who think that all arguments are answered, when they have shown that they grow rich by those measures which the ministers of truth, and the friends of genuine reformation oppose: and whatever side in religious controversies, or whatever name this spirit assumes; it is antichristian, and should be strenuously discountenanced by all the friends of truth and piety. Sc.

(31.) Chief of Asia. Asiarchon: these Asiarchæ, who derived their appellation from the name of the province over which they presided (as Syriarchæ, Cypriarchæ, &c.) were, in proconsular Asia (of which Ephesus was the metropolis), the chief presidents of the religious rites, whose office it also was to exhibit, in honor of the gods, and the Roman emperor, every year, solemn games in the theatre, at their own expence (like the Roman ædiles); whence none but the more opulent could bear this office, though it only lasted a year. They were thus chosen:—At the beginning of every year (i. e. about the autumnal equinox), each of the cities of Asia held an assembly, in which they elected some one of their citizens to be put in nomination for this office. Then each town sent one ambassador to some certain city of importance in proconsular Asia, such as Ephesus, Smyrna, Sardis; and others to the to koinon, or common council of the nation, in order to announce publicly the name of him whom they had elected to be put in nomination, as Asiarch. Of those whom each of the cities of Asia had thus recommended, the common council created ten only as Asiarchs, and out of that number the Roman proconsul chose the president of the sacred rites, sometimes called the Archiereus. Commentators are not agreed if all ten performed this function together, or whether only one was elected Asiarch. In my opinion, one elected by the proconsuls was, by way of eminence, styled ho Asiarchēs, "the Asiarch," and the rest were his assessors, [sitters with him,] and themselves also styled Asiarchs. Strabo indeed mentions many Asiarchs; but in Euseb. Polycarp is said to have suffered martyrdom when "Philip was Asiarch, and Statius Quadratus proconsul of Asia." Moreover, the Asiarchs (as we find from the Gr. authors) did not (as some have supposed) always reside at Ephesus, but also in other cities to which the sacred rites of Asia were common; as Smyrna, Cyzicus, &c. See Spanh. At the time when Paul abode at Ephesus, the Asiarch, with his colleagues, was, it seems, then in residence, and games were probably then in exhibition; from whence, however, it does not follow that the events here narrated took place at the solemn games. The Ephesian games are not mentioned at all.—It must be observed, too, that even those who had discharged the office of Asiarch, used to have the title still bestowed on them by courtesy (as was the case among the Jews with those who had filled the office of high priest): so that the Asiarchs here mentioned, may have been either those then in office, or who had been so. KUIN.

V. 32—41. Deputies. Anthupatoi. See on 13:7. 18:12. The office of proconsul of Asia was at this time divided between two magistrates, commonly called procurators, but who might properly be called proconsuls.

(32.) Assembly. Ekklesia: the same word which we tr. church; and thus we find it signifies any assembly good or bad, lawful or unlawful; and that only the circumstances of the case can determine the precise nature of the assembly, to which this word is applied.

Dr. A. CLARKE.

(35.) Town Clerk. Grammateus: it now seems pretty well agreed, that the word signifies some chief magistrate; though it is not easy to express this more specially by any term of modern languages. This officer was president of the senate, and united the offices of Recorder, Chancellor, and Secretary of State. Among other of his duties, was that of publicly reading aloud letters and state papers. All these functions Wetst. illustrates by classical citations. So also the Syriac, primarius civitatis, i. e., head-man. From Malala, Apollonius, and the coins, it appears to have been an office of the highest dignity; so having little like the "grammateus" among the Athenians, (a not very honorable office, perhaps like our town-clerk,) except the name. His speech evinces considerable judgment; prudence, and not a little tact. Bloomf. Is a worshipper. 'Is devoted, &c. It properly signi-

36 Seeing then that these things cannot be spoken against, ye ought to be quiet, and to do nothing rashly.

37 For ye have brought hither these men, which are neither robbers of churches, nor yet blasphemers of your goddess.

38 Wherefore if Demetrius, and the craftsmen which are with him, have a matter against any man, the law is open, and there are deputies: let them implead one another.

39 But if ye inquire any thing concerning other matters, it shall be determined in a lawful assembly.

40 For we are in danger to be called in question for this day's uproar, there being no cause whereby we may give an account of this concourse.

what is said against gods made with hands, does not at all affect us.

2. He cautions them against all violent and tumultuous proceedings, which their religion did not need, nor could receive any real advantage from, v. 36. A very good rule to be observed at all times, both in private and public affairs; not to be hasty and precipitate in our motions, but to deliberate, and take time to consider; not to put ourselves or others into a heat, but to be calm and composed, and always keep reason in the throne, and passion under check. This word should be ready to us, to command the peace with, when ourselves or those about us are growing disorderly; We ought to be quiet, and to do nothing rashly; to do nothing in haste, which we may repent of at leisure.

PRACT. OBS. V. 32-41. A mob can never effect anything, but mischief and madness. Like a wild beast, it sometimes turns against and destroys those, who meant to govern its operations, or to derive advantage from them: and generally the greater part of riotous multitudes know not for what purposes they are come together. (2 Cor. 1:8-11.) It is well, when their fury evaporates in senseless clamor; for it is commonly most cruel and destructive. Yet He who 'ruleth the waves of the sea,' can also 'still the madness of the people:' and in Him we should trust ourselves, and all belonging to us, when perils alarm us.—Worldly policy and sagacity often abound, where piety is utterly wanting: and prudent worldly men, by cajoling the deluded multitudes in ties a priest, or priestess, devoted to some particular deity, whose business it is to look after the temple. . . The chancellor, with great strength and beauty of language, to express the unanimity and zeal of the whole city in the service of Diana, speaks of it as one such attendant devotee in the temple; and as neōkoros is compounded of a word which signifies to sweep, it imports the humility with which they were ready to stoop to the lowest office of service there.' Doddr. 'But this is, as usual, pressing too much on the etymological sense, for the term was by no means confined to Ephesus, but extended to many other cities of Greece and Asia Minor; nay, sometimes the same city was called neōkoros to three or four deities, see coins. The neōkoros was an officer chosen annually by the Ephesians; some medals, struck on the public shows, have inscribed that such an one was then neōkoros, i. e., guardian or warden of the temple. What was properly applied only to a person came, by common figures, to be applied to a city, and to signify devoted, consecrated to, and was used towards tutelary deities of a city.' Bloomf. Image. 'The temple was used as the sacred treasury, or bank of most of the civilized world. (Dio Chrys. and Arist.) As was the temple of Delos to Greece. (Thucyd.) Generally speaking, indeed, the temples were the banks, and only secure deposits of the ancient world. By the time of Gallienus it was despoiled and burnt. [By barbarians, see Gibbon.] From Artemid. it appears, that no woman (married woman?) was permitted to enter it. There was (Thucyd.) an annual festival there to which the Ionians generally resorted. The temple (Xen.) was close by the river Sellinus. The image (Plin.) was of eben (or as some r. vine) wood. Vitr. says, cedar. All agree it had not been changed.' Bloomf. Fell down from Jupiter. So it was fabled of several other idols: and among the first idols we read of are the black stones, which, falling from heaven (aerolites), were naturally venerated, and supposed to have inherent divinity; note, Dan. 3:5. Perhaps (so Bloomf.) some had a rude likeness to an image. In countries where such falsehoods are likely to be believed, (not, at present, in others,) parts, at least, of the Romish church show pictures of the Virgin, which they tell the people came

3. He wipes off the odium that had been cast on Paul and his associates, and tells them, they were not the men they were represented to be, v. 37. 'Ye have brought hither these men, and are ready to pull them to pieces; but have you considered what is their offence? What can you prove on them? you cannot charge them with sacrilege, nor have they given any opprobrious language to the worshippers of Diana, nor spoken scurrilously of her or her temple. Why should you prosecute them with all this violence, who, though not of your mind, yet do not inveigh with any bitterness against you? Since they are calm, why should you be hot?' It was the idol IN THE HEART they levelled all their force against, by reason and argument; if they can but get that down, the idol in the temple will fall of course. Those that preach against idolatrous churches, have truth on their side, and ought vigorously to maintain it, and press it on men's consciences; but let them not be robbers of those churches; on the prey laid they not their hand, Esth. 9:15, 16. nor blasphemers of those worships; with meekness instructing, not with passion and foul language reproaching, those that oppose themselves; for God's truth, as it needs not man's lie, so it needs not man's intemperate heat. The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God.

4. He turns them over to the regular methods of the law, which ought ALWAYS to supersede popular tumults, and in civilized, well-governed nations, will do so. A great mercy it is to live in a country where provision is made for the keeping of the peace, and the administration of public justice, and the appointing a remedy for every wrong; and herein we of this nation are as happy as any people.

(1.) If the complaint was of a private injury, let them have recourse to the judges and courts of justice, which were kept publicly at stated times. There is a proconsul and his delegate, whose business it is to hear both sides, and to determine according to equity; and in their determination all parties must acquiesce, and not be their own judges, nor appeal to the people. The law is good if a man use it lawfully, as the last remedy, both for the discovery of a right disputed, and the recovery of a right denied.

(2.) If the complaint was of a public grievance, relating to the constitution, it must be redressed, not by a confused rabble, but by a convention of the states, v. 39. If ye inquire anything concerning other matters, that are of a common concern, it shall be determined in a lawful assembly of the aldermen and common-council, called together in a regular way by those in authority. Private persons should not intermeddle in public matters, so as to anticipate the counsels of those whose business it is to take cognizance of them; we have enough to do to mind our own business.

5. He makes them sensible of the danger they were in, and of the præmunire they had run themselves into by this riot, v. 40. 'It is well if we be not called in question for this day's uproar, if we be not complained of at the emperor's court, as a factious and seditious city, and our charter taken away; for we have nothing to say in excuse of this concourse; we cannot justify ourselves in breaking the peace, by saying, that others broke it first, and we only acted defensively; we have no color for any such plea; and therefore let the matter go no further, for it has gone too far already.' Note, Most people stand more in awe of men's judgment, than of the judgment of God. How well were it, if we would thus still the tumult of our disorderly appetites and passions, and check the violence of them, with the consideration of the account we must shortly give to the Judge of heaven and earth for all these disorders! Ecel. 11:9.

6. When he had thus showed them the absurdity of their riotous meeting, and the ill consequences that might follow from it, he advised them to separate with all speed, v. 41. See here, the overruling providence of God, how it preserves the public peace, by an unaccountable power over the spirits of men! Considering what an impetuous, furious thing, what an ungovernable, unmanageable wild beast the mob is, when it is up, we shall see reason to acknowledge God's goodness, if we are not under the tyranny of it, their follies and absurdities, prevail far more with them, than the most eminent servants of God possibly could by truth and argument.—What senseless fables have they implicitly credited, who would not believe the report of the Gospel! And how ridiculous have they often been, in their religious opinions and worship, who have discovered the most consummate good sense on every other subject! For 'the god of this world blinds the minds' of unbelievers.—Let us be thankful for prudent magistrates, who can keep the peace, and afford us protection, while we quietly worship God according to our consciences, and endeavor to promote the knowledge of his great salvation. SCOTT.

(38.) Proconsuls.] As there was but one of these, Markl., Heintz., Kuini., Bloomf., &c., rightly take it for a popular use of the plural by hypallage:—as if, 'It is for laws and proconsuls to decide such matters.' Doddr. (after Biscoe) paraphrases thus:—If, &c., 'have suffered in their property, and have a charge of any private injury to offer against any one, the civil courts are held in which they may have justice done them; or if they have any crime relating to the state to allege against any, the law directs them how they should proceed, and there are the Roman proconsuls to whom they may apply, who are the proper judges of such cases: Let them then bring their action, and implead one another, and traverse their suit in a legal manner in either of these judicatories, till it is brought to a fair determination. But if the cause be not properly civil or criminal, and you are inquiring anything concerning other matters, relating to our common utility, or to religion, which may seem of a special nature, there is no room to doubt but it shall be determined to the general satisfaction, in a lawful assembly of the Asiatic States, who will inquire into it impartially, and with a diligence proportionable to its importance.' 'The regular periods of assembly (called kuria, from their regularity) in those Greek cities which exercised, under the Roman empire, a qualified self-government, were three or four times a month; though there were extraordinary ones.' Grot., Wetst., Bloomf.

(40.) Raising a riot, was capitally punished by Roman law. Ed.

(41.) It is unjustly cavilled, that Paul acquiesced in this idol-acknowledging speech, but what had Paul to do with it? He was not even present! Nor, if there, could he have then replied, (what more unprofitable and unseasonable!) after the assembly was officially dismissed, without a silly and wicked suicide. Paul's life, whole example, and sufferings, are a sufficient refutation of such often answered slurs. See Doddr. Id.

CHAP. XX. V. 1—6. Of these travels of Paul, we have here only some general hints of occurrences, which therefore ought to be the more precious.

NOTES. CHAP. XX. V. 1—6. The apostle probably concluded, it would be imprudent for him to continue at Ephesus; he therefore, not long after, set out to travel into Macedonia. He went through Troas, but not meeting Titus, whom he expected from Corinth, he was so desirous of visiting that city, that he proceeded on his journey without further delay. 2 Cor. 2:12, 13. The 2d Cor. seems to have been written when he was in Macedonia, on his progress to Achaia, which probably took up more time than he had expected.—Timothy had gone before the apostle into Macedonia; we find him here attending on him, and he was with him when he wrote 2 Cor.: 2 Cor. 1:1—7, v. 1. yet elsewhere he says he desired him to tarry at Ephesus, when he went into Macedonia. 1 Tim. 1:3, 4. It is probable, that 1 Tim. was written, when the apostle was in Macedonia, soon after he left Ephesus: so that we must conclude that Timothy returned to Ephesus before Paul came away; and that he staid there only a short time, before he, on some account, came to Paul in Macedonia. But he might return thither, and take up his stated residence there afterwards, for some time, according to the statement of ecclesiastical writers.

(2.) 'In Macedonia, after great anxiety in his mind, Paul at length met with Titus, who brought him a comfortable account of the state of affairs at Corinth, 2 Cor. 7:5—7, and in particular, what he said of their liberal disposition, gave Paul reason to glory in them, and to excite the Macedonians to imitate their generosity, in assisting the contribution he was now raising for the poor Christians in Judea, which was one great part of his business on this journey, 2 Cor. 9:2. 3:1—14. The 2 Cor. was, therefore, written from Macedonia at this time, (2 Cor. 9:2. 3:1—14.) and was sent by Titus, who, on this occasion, returned to get the collection in still greater forwardness. This tour through Philippi, Amphipolis, Apollonia, Thessalonica, and Berea, would, of course, take up several months, and no doubt many circumstances would occur at most of these places, which made Paul's presence with them for a while highly expedient. It seems probable that Paul wrote 1 Tim. from thence, expecting to return to Ephesus again, and then designing that Timothy should continue there till he came (1 Tim. 3:14, 15. 4:13.), though Providence ordered the matter otherwise.' Greece.] 'Thence he probably wrote Rom.; for it plainly appears, that epistle was written before his imprisonment at Rome, and in it he speaks of a collection made by the churches of Macedonia and Achaia, Rom. 15:25—27. a circumstance which fixes it to this time.'

(4, 5.) 'The several persons mentioned in v. 4. are thought [and so

I. His departure from Ephesus; he had tarried there longer than at any one place since he was ordained; and now it was time to think of removing, for he must preach in other cities also; but after this, to the end of the scripture-history of his life, which is all we can depend upon, we never find him breaking up fresh ground again, nor preaching the Gospel where Christ had not been named, as hitherto he had done, Rom. 15:20. for in the close of the next ch. we find him made a prisoner, and so continued, and so left, at the end of this book. He did not leave them abruptly, and in a fright, but solemnly; He called unto him the principal persons of the congregation, and embraced them, took leave of them, saith the Syriae, with the kiss of love, according to the usage of the primitive church. Loving friends know not how well they love one another till they come to part.

II. His visitation of the Greek churches, which he had planted, and more than once watched, and which appear to have laid very near his heart. He enforced his exhortation with a great variety of motives and arguments. He stayed three months in Greece, v. 2, 3. i. e. in Achaia, as some think, for thither also he purposed to go, to Corinth, and thereabout, ch. 19:21.

III. The altering of his measures. 1. Paul was about to sail into Syria, to Antioch, whence he was first sent out into the service of the Gentiles, and which, therefore, in his journeys, he generally contrived to take in his way; but he changed his mind, and resolved to return through Macedonia, the same way he came. 2. The reason was, the Jews, expecting he would steer that course, as usual, had way-laid him, designing his death; some think, it was to rob him of the money he was carrying to Jerusalem for the relief of the poor saints there; but considering how very spiteful the Jews were against him, I suppose they thirsted for his blood, more than for his money.

IV. His companions into Asia are here named, v. 4. some ministers, whether all or no, is not certain; Sopater of Berea, it is likely, is the same with Sosipater, Rom. 16:21. Timothy is reckoned among them, for though Paul, when he departed from Ephesus, v. 1. left Timothy there, and afterward wrote his first epistle to him thither, to direct him as an evangelist how to settle the church there, and in what hands to leave it, 1 Tim. 1:3. 3:14, 15. yet he soon followed him, and accompanied him, with others here named.

One would think, this was no good husbandry, to have all these worthy men accompanying Paul, for there was more need of them where Paul was not, than where he was; but, 1. They might assist him in instructing such as by his preaching were awakened and startled; wherever Paul came, the waters were stirred, and then there was need of many hands to help the cripples in. It was time to strike when the iron was hot. 2. They might be trained up by him, and fitted for future service; might fully know his doctrine, and manner of life, 2 Tim. 3:10. Paul's bodily presence was weak and despicable, and, therefore, these friends of his accompanied him, to put a reputation on him, and to intimate to strangers, who would be apt to judge by the sight of the eye, that he had a great deal in him truly valuable, which was not discovered on the outward appearance.

V. His coming to Troas, where he had appointed a general rendezvous of his friends. They went before, and stayed for him at Troas, v. 5. designing to go along with him to Jerusalem, as Trophimus particularly did, ch. 21:29. it should seem Luke was now in company with him; for he says, We sailed from Philippi, v. 6. and the first time we find him in his company, was here, at Troas, ch. 16:11. The days of unleavened bread are mentioned only to describe the time, not to intimate that Paul kept the passover after the manner of the Jews; for just about this time he had written in his first epistle to the church of Corinth, and taught, that Christ is our Passover, and a Christian life our feast of unleavened bread, 1 Cor. 5:7, 8. and when the substance was come, the shadow was done away. He came to them to Troas, by sea, in five days, and when he was there stayed but seven days. A great deal of time will unavoidably be lost, in travelling to and fro, by those who go about doing good, yet it shall not be put on the score of lost time. Paul thought it worth while to bestow five days in going to Troas, though but for an opportunity of seven days' stay there; but he knew, and so should we, how to redeem even journeying time, and make it turn to some good account.

V. 7—12. We have here what passed at Troas the last of the 7 days Paul stayed there.

Scott] to have been joined with Paul, as messengers of the churches, in carrying their contributions to the poor brethren at Jerusalem, comp. 1 Cor. 16:3, 4. 2 Cor. 8:19—23. We know but few particulars of most of them.—Sopater, in some ancient MSS. called son of Pyrrhus, is generally thought to be Sosipater, Paul's kinsman, Rom. 16:21.—Aristarchus of Thessalonica, is mentioned before as a Macedonian, Acts 19:29. he attended Paul in his voyage to Rome, Acts 28:2. and was his fellow-laborer, Phil. 24. and fellow-prisoner, Col. 4:10, 11.—Secundus is not elsewhere mentioned.—Gaius of Derbe, if not another of the same name, is elsewhere mentioned as of Macedonia, Acts 19:29. of which, as some suppose, he was a native, but descended of a Derbe family: he was baptized by Paul, at Corinth, 1 Cor. 1:14. and entertained him as his host while he abode there, Rom. 16:23. and, afterwards, John directs his 3d Ep. to him.—Timothy was a native of Lystra, Acts 16:1. whom Paul particularly honored with his friendship, and distinguished by 2 Eps. to him, as well as by joining his name with his own in the title of several other Eps.: 2 Cor., Philip., Col., 1 and 2 Thess., Philemon. He frequently attended Paul in his travels, and labored with him in the service of the Gospel, in which he was so diligent and zealous, that it is no wonder he was imprisoned for it, Heb. 13:23.—Tychicus was often sent on messages by Paul, 2 Tim. 4:12. Tit. 3:12. and more than once was recommended by him to the churches as a beloved brother, and faithful minister, and fellow-servant in the Lord, whom he employed not only to acquaint them with his own affairs, but also to know their state, and comfort their hearts, Eph. 6:21, 22. Col. 4:7, 8.—Trophimus, who was of Ephesus, appears to have been a Gentile convert, whom we find afterwards with Paul at Jerusalem, Acts 21:29. and attending him in other journeys till he left him at Miletum, sick, 2 Tim. 4:20. Those two last are called Asiatics, and being here distinguished from Gaius and Timothy, who were of Derbe and Lystra, both in Asia Minor, it is plain they are so called as natives of proconsular Asia.—It seems, from the construction of the original, that only Tychicus and Trophimus went before to Troas.

(6.) 'The argument which some zealous papists have drawn from this text, for denying the cup in the sacrament to the laity, was so solemnly given up in the council of Trent, that it is astonishing, any who profess to believe the divine authority of that council, should ever have presumed to plead it again.'

V. 7—12. It is not said, that the disciples were called together, as on a special occasion; but that they came together, as it seems, accord-the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow; and continued his speech until midnight.

8 And there were many lights in the upper chamber, where they were gathered together.

9 And there sat in a window a certain young man named Eutychus, being fallen into a deep sleep: and as Paul was long preaching, he sunk down with sleep, and fell down from the third loft, and was taken up dead.

10 And Paul went down, and fell on him, and embracing him, said, Trouble not yourselves; for his life is in him.

11 When he therefore was come up again, and had broken bread, and eaten, and talked a long while, even till break of day, so he departed.

12 And they brought the young man alive, and were not a little comforted.

I. There was a solemn religious assembly of the Christians there, according to their constant custom, and the custom of all the churches, v. 7. Though they read, and meditated, and prayed, and sung psalms, apart, yet they must come together to worship God in concert. There ought to be stated times for the disciples of Christ to come together, though they all cannot, yet as many as can.

It was on the first day of the week, called the Lord's day, Rev. 1:10. the Christian Sabbath, celebrated to the honor of Christ and the Holy Spirit, in remembrance of the resurrection of Christ, and the pouring out of the Spirit, both on the first day of the week. This is here said to be the day when the disciples came together, i. e. when it was their practice to come together in all the churches. Note, The first day of the week is to be religiously observed by all the disciples of PRACT. OBS. V. 1-12. Tumults and opposition may constrain a Christian or minister to remove from his station, or to alter his purpose: but his employment and pleasure will be the same wherever he goes.—It shows a carnal state of mind, when people are soon wearied in the worship of God, and are in haste to close it, for the sake of animal recreation, or vain conversation. Doubtless it is inexpedient, on ordinary occasions, to lengthen out religious ordinances much beyond the usual time: yet surely Paul would be displeased, surprised, or grieved, to hear the professors of his doctrine complain of an instructive sermon, because it was an hour long; or of the length of the service, when it scarcely exceeded two hours!—If we cannot wholly excuse Eutychus, ing to their general practice. Hence it is evident, that Christians were accustomed to assemble for religious worship, 'on the first day of the week;' but the change from the seventh to the first, appears to have been gradually and silently introduced, by example rather than by express precept. John 20:19-23.—'Breaking of bread,' or commemorating the death of Christ in the eucharist, was one chief end of their assembling. It may be gathered from the narrative, that the apostle staid on purpose to spend one Lord's day with them.—As the room was, most likely, very much crowded, the windows seem to have been open to admit the air.—It is probable that Eutychus had been dead: but the apostle was assured of his restoration to life, which perhaps took place at the moment when he spoke; and he afterwards gradually recovered health and strength. Accordingly, the company returned to their sacred services: and, after the Lord's supper had been celebrated, and the company had taken some refreshment; the apostle, instead of apologizing for the length of his discourse, resumed the subject, and continued to converse with them till the day dawned, and it was time for him and his friends to set out on their journey.—We may easily conceive how many things would be said at Troas, about a night spent altogether in preaching, religious conversation, and devotion: and had Eutychus lost his life, it would have given the enemies of the Gospel some plausible ground for exclaiming against unseasonable hours, long sermons, and enthusiastical irregularities. SCOTT. People who would make as long sermons, &c., as Paul here, to the general benefit of a promiscuous congregation, on occasions similar to this unique case of Paul's, must be such preachers as Paul was, and come as well prepared. In a Christian community, the cases where such a protracted meeting is necessary will be very few.

Christ; and it is a sign between Christ and them, for by this is known that they are his disciples.

They had no temple or synagogue to meet in, no capacious, stately chapel, but met in a private house, v. 8. As they were few, and did not need, so they were poor, and could not build, a large meeting-place; yet they came together in [a third loft] an inconvenient place. It will be no excuse for absenting ourselves from religious assemblies, that the place of them is not so decent or so commodious as we would have it.

Breaking bread here is to be understood of the Lord's supper; that one instituted sign of breaking the bread, being put for all the rest, 1 Cor. 10:16. In this, not only the breaking of Christ's body for us, to be a sacrifice for our sins, is commemorated, but the breaking of Christ's body to us, to be food and a feast for our souls, is signified. In the primitive times, it was the custom of many churches to receive the Lord's supper every Lord's day,* celebrating the memorial of Christ's death in the former; with that of his resurrection in the latter; and both in concert, in a solemn assembly, to testify their joint concurrence in the same faith and worship.

II. In this assembly Paul gave them a sermon, a long, a farewell sermon, v. 7. The preaching of the Gospel ought to accompany the sacraments. What does the seal signify without a writing? He had a great deal to say, and knew not he should ever have another opportunity of preaching to them. We know some that would have reproached Paul for this, as a long-winded preacher, that tired his hearers; but they were willing to hear, he saw them so, and therefore continued his speech, even till midnight; perhaps they met in the evening, for privacy, or in conformity to the example of the disciples, who came together on the first Christian Sabbath in the evening. It is probable he had preached to them in the morning, and yet thus lengthened out his evening sermon, even till midnight; we wish we had the heads of this long sermon, but we may suppose it was for substance the same with his epistles. The meeting being continued till midnight, there were candles set up, many lights, v. 8. that the hearers might turn to the Scriptures Paul quoted, and see whether these things were so; and that this might prevent the reproach of their enemies, who said they met in the night for works of darkness.

III. A young man in the congregation, that slept at sermon, was killed by a fall out of the window, but raised to life again; his name signifies one that had good fortune, Eutychus; and he answered his name. The peculiar notice taken of his sleeping, makes us willing to hope none of the rest slept, though it was sleeping time, and after supper; but this youth fell fast asleep, he was carried away with it; so the word is; which intimates, that he strove against it, but was overpowered by it, and at last sunk down with sleep. We must look upon it as an evil thing, be afraid of it, do what we can to prevent our being sleepy, not compose ourselves to sleep, but get our hearts affected with the word we hear, to such a degree as may drive sleep far enough; let us watch and pray, that we enter not into this temptation, and by it into worse.† The miraculous mercy showed him in his recovery to life again, v. 10. gave a present distraction, and interruption, but proved an occasion of a great confirmation to his preaching, and helped to make it effectual.

(1.) Paul, so far from saying, 'He was well enough served for minding so little what I said,' fell on the dead body and embraced it, thereby expressing a great compassion to, and an affectionate concern for, this young man. Such tender spirits are much affected with sad accidents of this kind, and are far from judging and cursing those that fall under them, as if those on whom the tower of Siloam fell, were sinners above all that dwell at Jerusalem; I tell you, nay. But this was not all; his falling on him, and embracing him, were in imitation of Elijah, 1 K. 17:21. and Elisha, 2 K. 4:34. in order to the raising of him to life again; not that this could, as a mean, contribute anything to it, but, as a sign, it represented the descent of that divine power on the dead body, for the putting of life into it again, which at the same time he inwardly, earnestly, and in faith, prayed for.

(2.) He assured them he was returned to † Muscles laboriously exercised for six days, assert, by God's physiological law, dominion over the mind, when the laboring man sits down quietly awhile; especially when, as in the once breathed air of afternoon meetings, the invigorating oxygen of the air to be breathed, is partly consumed. for yielding to sleep at midnight, during the apostle's copious exhortations; how inexcusable are they, who, in the middle of the day, and during a service of a moderate length, make a practice of sleeping, as if best pleased when most composed to rest! Infirmary or weariness, indeed, requires tenderness: but such an indulgent habit of contempt should be treated with decided severity. They who thus offend have cause to tremble, lest some sudden judgment should cut them off in their sin, and leave them to perish without remedy: and such as desire to get the better of this temptation should join earnest prayers with all other methods of keeping themselves awake; for when this is neglected, they need not wonder that they are unsuccessful. SCOTT.

(8.) Lights.] These, as classic relics show, were of forms, beautifully and splendidly diversified; the cut shows one of the common lamps. 'The wick was merely a few twisted threads, drawn through a hole in the upper part of the oil-vessel,' and there was no glass to give steadiness to the flame: such are still in use around the Mediterranean. Ed.

(8, 9.) The child's or youth's punishment (by falling) was simply for disobedience to God's natural laws: compare, Lu. 13:4. Bloomf. remarks, that the words 'there were many lights,' is a circumstance thrown in, like John 6:10. 'Such are the remarks of eyewitnesses.' Id.

(9.) Window.] These were made, probably, as now in the E., extended down to the floor. Perhaps it was a square projection, latticed on three sides, with a cushioned floor some feet higher than the floor of the room; such are still seen in the E. Ed. 'The Gr. plainly signifies an open window, which had a sort of wooden casement, or little door, [hence is derived window, provincial window, i. e. wind-door. 13 ¶ And we went before to ship, and sailed unto Assos, there intending to take in Paul: for so had he appointed, minding himself to go afoot.

14 And when he met with us at Assos, we took him in, and came to Mitylene.

15 And we sailed thence, and came the next day over against Chios; and the next day we arrived at Samos, and tarried at Trogyllium; and the next day we came to Miletus.

16 For Paul had determined to sail by Ephesus, because he would not spend the time in Asia; for he hastened, if it were possible for him, to be at Jerusalem the day of Pentecost.

17 ¶ And from Miletus he sent to Ephesus, and called the elders of the church.

18 And when they were come to him, he said unto them, Ye know, from the first day that I came into Asia, after what manner I have been with you at all seasons, life, and it would appear presently. Various speculations, we may suppose, this ill accident had occasioned in the congregation, but Paul puts an end to them; 'Trouble not yourselves, be not in any disorder about it, let it not put you into any hurry, for his life is in him; he is not dead, but sleepeth; lay him a while on a bed, and he will come to himself, for he is now alive.' Thus, when Christ raised Lazarus, he said, Father, I thank Thee that Thou hast heard Me.

(3.) He returned to his work immediately after this interruption, v. 11. and they talked a long while, even till break of day. Paul did not now go on in a continued discourse, as before, but he and his friends fell into a free conversation, the subject of which, no doubt, was good, and to the use of edifying. As it was about the time of the Pentecost, and we may suppose about the beginning of May, as Troas was about forty degrees of north latitude, the sun set there at 7 P. M., and rose at 5 A. M., so that the night was about eight hours long; and taking all the interruptions together, and they could not have amounted to more than two hours; and taking no account of the preceding day's work, Paul must have preached a sermon not less than six hours long. But it is likely good part of this time was employed in hearing and asking questions, for so the original words may be understood to imply.' Dr. A. C.

V. 15—16. Assos, Trogyllium, and Miletus were cities of Asia, on the sea-coast: Mitylene was a city in the Isle of Lesbos, which, with Chios and Samos, was situated near the Coast of Asia, in what is now called the Archipelago. Miletus, a city about thirty miles further to the south from Ephesus.—The apostle seems to have had the direction of the vessel, which he could not have had, if merely a passenger: it is therefore probable that it belonged to some of his friends.—The historian continues to speak in language which shows that he was one of the company.

V. 17. The same persons are in this chapter called 'elders' or presbyters, and 'overseers' or bishops; (episcopoi, 29.) it must therefore be allowed, that these were not distinct orders of ministers in the church at that time. Probably, when the apostles founded a church they appointed pastors over it; according to the numbers to be superintended, or the field of usefulness which was opened in the neighborhood: these were at first called either 'elders,' or 'overseers,' i. e. presbyters, or bishops, indifferently; and no one had any direct authority over the rest. By degrees the number of converts would increase, other churches would be planted in the neighborhood, and more pastors chosen. In the mean time the senior ministers, and such as were most eminent for wisdom, ability, piety, or usefulness, would acquire a measure of influence and authority: and their juniors, both in their own church, and in others which had been planted from it, would naturally look up to them.

of promoting holiness, comfort, and Christian love.

(4.) Before they parted, they brought in the young man alive, every one congratulating him, and they were not a little comforted, v. 12. not only the relations of the young man, but the whole society, [from sympathy, and] as it not only prevented the reproach that would otherwise have been cast on them, but contributed very much to the credit of the Gospel.

V. 13—16. Paul is hastening towards Jerusalem, no doubt endeavoring to make every place he came to the better for him, as every good man should do.

I. He sent his companions by sea to Assos, but he himself was minded to go afoot, v. 13. and if the land-way was the shorter, yet the ancients notice it as a rough way; (Homer, Iliad, 6. and Eustathius upon him, say, it was enough to kill one to go on foot to Assos, Lorin. in locum;) yet that way Paul would take; 1. That he might call on his friends by the way, and do good among them, either converting sinners or edifying saints; Or, 2. That he might inure himself to hardship, and not seem to indulge his ease; that he might make his sufferings for Christ, when called out to them, the more easy, 2 Tim. 2:3. We should use ourselves to self-denial.

II. At Assos he went on board with his friends, and made the best of his way to Jerusalem; passed by Chios, v. 15. touched at Samos; places of note among the Greek writers, both poets and historians; tarried a while at Trogyllium, the sea-port next to Samos; and the next day came to Miletus, the sea-port that lay next to Ephesus; for v. 16. he had determined not to go to Ephesus at this time, because he was resolved not to stay, and would not put himself into a temptation to stay. He had been at Jerusalem, about four or five years ago, ch. 18: 21, 22. and now would again pay his continued respects to that church, that he might not be thought alienated by his commission to preach among the Gentiles. The feast of pentecost was a time of concourse, which would give him an opportunity of propagating the Gospel among the Jews and proselytes, who came from all parts to worship at the feast: and that feast had been particularly made famous among the Christians, by the pouring out of the Spirit. Men of business must fit themselves, and it will contribute to the expediting of it, to set time, with submission to Providence, and strive to keep it; contriving to do that first which we judge to be most needful, and not suffering ourselves to be diverted from it. It is a pleasure to us to be with our friends, it diverts us, nothing more; but we must not be diverted by it from our work. This is not the world we are to be together in; we hope to be so in the other.

V. 17—35. These elders, or presbyters [here], some think, were those twelve who received the Holy Ghost by Paul's hands, ch. 19: 6. But beside those, probably Timothy had ordained other elders there for the service of that church, and the country about; these Paul sent for, that he might instruct and encourage them to go on in the work to which they had laid their hands, a very pathetic and practical discourse, which has in it much of the excellent spirit of this good man.

I. He appeals to them concerning both his life and doctrine, all the time he had been in and about Ephesus, v. 18. He mentions this, (1.) As a confirmation of his commission, and consequently of the doctrine he had preached among them; and that he was no designing, self-seeking man. The temper of his mind, and the tenor both of his preaching and conversation, plainly spoke that God was with him of a truth, and that he was actuated and animated by a better spirit than his own. (2.) As an instruction to them in whose hands the work was now left, to follow his example; 'Ye know after what manner I have been with you, how I have conducted myself as a minister; in like manner be you with those that are committed to your charge when I am gone,' Phil. 4:9.

1. His spirit and conversation were excellent and exemplary; they knew after what manner he had been among them, and how he had had his conversation toward them, in simplicity, and godly sincerity, 2 Cor. 1:12. How holily, justly, and unblamably he behaved himself, and how gentle he was toward them, 1 Thess. 2: 7, 10. (1.) He had conducted himself well, all along, from the very first day he came into Asia; at all seasons; his entering in among them was such as nobody could find fault with. He was a man that was consistent with himself, and all of a piece, uniform, like a die, which, throw

Thus they would be expected to take the lead in every business: especially in the ordination of ministers, in directing their labors, and in animadverting on such as turned aside to heretical doctrines, or immoral practices. Hence the name of 'Bishop,' or Overseer, or Inspector, seems gradually to have been appropriated to one principal minister, to whom a measure of authority and distinction was insensibly annexed; and the title and rank of 'Presbyters' were continued to the rest. 11:27—30. It is evident that episcopacy prevailed, generally and early, in the primitive church; and it seems to have been gradually introduced. There were many elders in the church at Ephesus at this time; yet Christ afterwards addressed his epistle 'to the angel of the church at Ephesus;' which seems to mean the superintending pastor, who was an inspector over the elders. Rev. 2:1. It appears, to me at least, that neither episcopacy, nor any other species of church-government, can be proved from Scripture, to be exclusively of divine authority. But a moderate episcopacy has many and great advantages to recommend it: and the high claims and excessive authority, which soon began to be advanced and exercised by bishops and lordly prelates, of different titles; and all the abuses of antichristian tyranny, supply the best arguments to those, who would entirely exclude that order from the church. In this, however, as well as in other things, very much remains to be remedied and rectified, among every description of Christians, before matters can be reduced to the scriptural standard.—Every impartial man must allow, that if Timothy had been at this time bishop of Ephesus, in that sense for which some contend; the apostle would have given these elders some exhortation, to pay a proper deference to his episcopal authority.—To assert, as some have done, (Hann. especially,) that these elders of Ephesus were indeed the diocesan bishops of all the Asiatic churches, only exposes the ease which it is meant to support: for, besides the inexcusable liberty taken with the words of Scripture; how could these bishops have been got together, at so short a notice? Unless it be supposed, that they all resided at Ephesus, and left the charge of their dioceses to others, according to the too common custom of later times! The statement would also show, that there were no presbyters; and consequently, a parity of ministers, in the primitive church, directly contrary to the sentiments of those who make it. Phil. 1:1. 1 Tim. 3: 1. 5:19, 20. SCOTT. See note, end of ch. and 1 Pet. 5:1,2. Ed.

V. 18. Ye know, &c.] 'From these words (comp. v. 12.) and those of v. 25. it is quite evident, that besides the presbyters of Ephesus, others also of Asia, (i. e. Ionia,) were present (Kuin.); few of whom would have more than a day's journey to travel.' Bloomf., whom see.

it which way you will, lights on a square side. (2.) He had made it his business to serve the Lord; to promote the interest of Christ and his kingdom among them; he never served himself, nor was a time-server. In his ministry, in his whole conversation, he proved himself what he wrote himself, Paul a servant of Jesus Christ, Rom. 1: 1. (3.) He had done his work with all humility of mind, i. e. in all works of condescension, modesty, and self-abasement. Though one that God had put great honor on, and done great good by, yet he never took state on him, nor kept people at a distance, but conversed freely and familiarly with all for their good. Those that would in any office serve the Lord, acceptably to Him and profitably to others, must do it with all humility of mind, Matt. 20: 26, 27. (4.) He had always been very tender, affectionate, and compassionate among them; he was herein like his Master, often in tears; in his praying, he wept and made supplication, Hos. 12: 4. In his preaching, what he had told them before, he told them again, even weeping, Phil. 3: 18. In his concern for them, though his acquaintance with them was but of a late standing, yet so near did they lie to his heart, that he wept with them that wept, and mingled his tears with their's on every occasion, which was very endearing. (5.) He had struggled with many difficulties among them; he went on with his work in the face of much opposition, many temptations, trials of his patience and courage, such discouragements as perhaps were sometimes temptations to him (as to Jeremiah in a like case) to say, I will not speak any more in the name of the Lord, Jer. 20: 8, 9. These befell him by the lying in wait of the Jews, who still were plotting some mischief or other against him. Note, Those are the faithful servants of the Lord, that continue to serve Him in the midst of troubles and perils; that care not what enemies they make, so that they can but approve themselves to their Master, and make Him their Friend. Paul's tears were owing to his temptations; his afflictions helped to excite his good affections.

2. His preaching was likewise such as it should be, v. 20, 21. (1.) Plain; he delivered his message so as to be understood; this is intimated in two words, I have showed you, and have taught you; he did not amuse them with nice speculations, nor lead them into, and then lose them in, the clouds of lofty notions and expressions; but he showed them the plain truths of the Gospel, which were of greatest consequence and importance, and taught them as children are taught.

(2.) Powerful; intimated in his testifying to them; he preached as one on oath, that was himself fully assured of the truth of what he preached, and desirous to convince them of it, and to influence and govern them by it. He preached the Gospel, not as a hawker proclaims news in the street, (it is all one to him whether it be true or false,) but as a conscientious witness gives in his evidence at the bar, with the utmost seriousness and concern.

(3.) Profitable; in all his preaching he aimed, not at pleasing, but at doing good to those he preached to; he studied what had a tendency to make them wise and good, wiser and better; to inform their judgments, and reform their hearts and lives. Those teach for God, that teach people to profit, Is. 48: 17.

(4.) Pains-taking; he was very industrious and indefatigable in his work; he preached publicly, and from house to house; and did not think that the one manner would excuse him from the other. Ministers should in their private visits, and as they go from house to house, discourse of those things which they have taught publicly, repeat them, inculcate them, and explain them, if it be needful, asking, Have you understood all these things? And especially, they should help persons to apply it to themselves and their own ease.

(5.) Faithful; he not only preached what was profitable, but everything he thought might be profitable, he kept back nothing; he declined not preaching whatever he thought might be profitable, though not fashionable, nor to some acceptable. He did not keep back reproofs when necessary, for fear of offending; nor keep back the preaching of the cross, though he knew it was to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks, foolishness, as the Roman missionaries in China lately did.

(6.) Catholic; he testified both to the Jews, and also to the Greeks. Though born and bred a Jew, yet he did not therefore confine himself to the Jews, and avoid the Gentiles; but preached as readily to them as to the Jews. And, on the other hand, though called to be the apostle of the Gentiles, and the Jews had an implacable enmity against him on that score, yet he did not therefore abandon them as reprobates, but continued to deal with them for their good. Ministers must preach the Gospel with impartiality; for they are ministers of Christ for the universal church.

Finally, he was a truly Christian, evangelical preacher, he did not preach philosophical notions, or matters of doubtful dispute, nor [party] politics, but faith and repentance, the two great gospel-graces, the nature and necessity of them; these he urged on all occasions. He preached repentance as God's great command, ch. 17: 30. which we must obey,—that men should repent, and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance, so he explains it, ch. 26: 20. and he preached it as Christ's gift, in order to the remission of sins, ch. 5: 31. and directed people to look up to Him for it.

He preached faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ, as our Way to God. Sin must by repentance be abandoned and forsaken, and then Christ must by faith be relied on for the pardon of sin. Our repentance toward God is not sufficient, we must have a true faith in Christ as our Redeemer and Savior, consenting to Him as our Lord and our God. For there is no coming to God, as penitent prodigals to a Father, but in the strength and righteousness of Jesus Christ as Mediator. Such a preacher, they all knew Paul had been; and if they will carry on the same work, they must walk in the same spirit, in the same steps.

II. He declares his expectation of sufferings and afflictions in his present journey to Jerusalem, v. 22—24.; therefore let them not think he quitted Asia now, for fear of persecution. Now behold, I go bound in the Spirit to Jerusalem; which may be understood either, of the certain foresight he had of trouble before him; or of the strong impulse he was under from the Spirit of God working on his spirit to go this journey.

1. He does not know particularly the things that shall befall him at Jerusalem; it is good for us to be kept in the dark concerning future events, that we may be always waiting on God, and waiting for Him. When we go abroad, it should be with this thought, we know not the things that shall befall us, nor what a day, or a night, or an hour, may bring forth; and therefore must refer ourselves to God, let Him do with us as seemeth good in his eyes, and STUDY TO STAND COMPLETE IN HIS WHOLE WILL.

2. Yet he does know, in general, that there is a storm before him; for the prophets in every city he passed through, told him, by the Holy Ghost, that bonds and afflictions did abide him. Beside the common notice given to all Christians and ministers to expect and prepare for sufferings, [and his own past experience,] Paul had particular intimations of an extraordinary trouble, greater and longer than any he had yet met with, that was now before him.

3. He fixes a brave and heroic resolution to go on with his work, notwithstanding. He was flesh and blood, as well as other men; and yet, by the grace of God, he was enabled to go on with his work, and to look with a gracious and generous contempt on all the difficulties and discouragements he met with in it. Let us take it from his own mouth here, v. 24. where he speaks not with obstinacy or ostentation, but with a holy, humble resolution; 'None of these things move me, all my care is to proceed and to persevere in the way of my duty, and to finish well.' Paul is here an example, (1.) Of holy courage and resolution in our work, notwithstanding difficulties and oppositions; he saw them before him, but says, I make no account of them. He did not lay these things to heart, Christ and heaven lay there. None of these things drove him off from his work, nor deprived him of his comfort, nor made him drive on heavily in his work; in the midst of troubles he was as one unconcerned. Those that have their conversation in heaven, can look down, not only on the common troubles of this earth, but on the threatening rage and malice of hell itself, and say, that none of these things move them, as knowing that none of these things can hurt them. (2.)

V. 21. This repentance and faith, when considered in connexion with man's need of them, the source from which they spring, and the invariable effects of them, on the heart and life of him who continually exercises them; may be considered as the substance of Christianity, the religion of a sinner under a dispensation of mercy and grace. SCOTT.

V. 22. Bound in the Spirit.] Perhaps the bonds and imprisonment, which the Holy Spirit, by the prophets, constantly predicted, as awaiting the apostle, were intended by this expression. (23. Note, 19: 21, 22.)—'This resembles the expression used in ch. 18: 5. and in both I understand to pneuma, not of the Holy Spirit, but of the spirit and mind of Paul.' Bp. Middleton. See on 18: 5.

(22.) Bound, &c.] 'Either the strong influence of the Divine Spirit on his mind, or the strong propensity in his own will, wish, and desire to visit Jerusalem.'

25 And now, behold, I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more.

26 Wherefore I take you to record this day, that I am <sup>h</sup> pure from the blood of all men.

27 For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel <sup>i</sup> of God.

28 Take heed <sup>j</sup> therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you <sup>k</sup> overseers, to feed <sup>l</sup> the church of God, which he hath purchased <sup>m</sup> with his own blood.

Of a holy contempt of life, and the continuance and comforts of it; Neither count I my life dear to myself. Life is sweet, and naturally dear to us, all that a man has will he give for his life; but all that a man has, and life too, will he give, who understands himself aright and his own interest, rather than lose the favor of God, and hazard eternal life. This explains Luke 14:26, where we are required to hate our own lives, not in a hasty passion, as Job and Jeremiah, but in a holy submission to the will of God, and a resolution to die for Christ, rather than to deny Him. (3.) Of a holy concern to go through with the work of life, which should be much more our care, than to secure either the outward comforts or the continuance of it. Blessed Paul counts not his life dear, in comparison with this, and resolves in the strength of Christ, that he never will, to save his life, lose the ends of living. Two things if this great and good man gain, it is no matter to him what comes of life:

[1.] That he may be found faithful to the trust reposed in him; make full proof of his ministry; go through the business of it, and others reap the advantage of it, to the utmost that was designed. Observe, The apostleship was a ministry both to Christ and to the souls of men; and they that were called to it, considered more the ministry [i. e. serv- ing] than the dignity or dominion of it; and if the apostles did so, much more ought the pastors and teachers to do so, and to be in the church as those that serve. This ministry was received from the Lord Jesus; for Him they do their work, in his name, in his strength, and to Him they must give up their account. The work of this ministry was, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God, to publish it to the world, to prove it, and to recommend it; and being the Gospel of the grace of God, it has enough in it to recommend itself; it is a proof of God's good-will to us, and a mean of his good work in us. Paul made it the business of his life to testify this, and desired not to live a day longer than he might be instrumental to spread the knowledge, and savor, and power of this Gospel.

[2.] That he may finish well; he cares not when the period of his life comes, nor how, be it ever so soon, ever so sudden, ever so sad, as to outward circumstances, so that he may but finish his course, his race, so the word is, with joy, Heb. 12:1. This intimates, that we have our labors appointed us, for we were not sent into the world to be idle; and our limits appointed us, for we were not sent into the world to be here always; but to pass through the world, nay, to run through it; and it is soon run through. He speaks of the finishing of his course, as sure and near, and that upon which he had his thoughts continually. The business of our life is, to provide for a joyful death.

III. Counting on it, that this was the last time they should see him, he appeals to their consciences concerning his integrity, and demands of them a testimony to it.

1. When any of us part with our friends, we may say, and should say, 'We know not we shall ever see one another again, in this world.' But Paul here speaks it with assurance, by the Spirit of prophecy; and we cannot think he who spake so doubtfully of that which he was not sure of, v. 22. would speak this with so much confidence, unless he had had a special warrant from the Spirit to say it; to whom I think they do wrong, who suppose that, notwithstanding this, Paul did afterward come to Ephesus, and see them again. We ought often to think of it, that those who now are preaching to us the kingdom of God, will shortly be removed, and we shall see their faces no more; it concerns us therefore to improve their ministry while we have it, that when we shall see their faces no more on earth, yet we may hope to look them in the face with comfort in the great day.

2. He challenges them to prove him unfaithful, or to have said or done anything by which he had made himself accessory to the ruin of any precious soul; I am pure from the blood of all men, the blood of souls. This plainly refers to that of the prophet, Ez. 33:6. If a minister has approved himself faithful, he may have this rejoicing in himself. He therefore leaves the blood of them that perish, on their own heads, because they had fair warning given them, but they would not take it. He charges these ministers to look to it, that they took care and pains, as he had done; I am pure from the blood of all men, see that you keep yourselves so too. I take you to record this day; I call this day to witness to you, so Streso. As sometimes the heavens and earth are appealed to, so here this day shall be a witness; this parting day.

3. He proves his own fidelity with this, v. 27. He had preached to them nothing but the counsel of God, and not added any inventions of his own. He had preached to them the whole counsel of God; gone over a body of divinity among them, that, having the truths of the Gospel opened to them methodically, from first to last, in order, they might the better understand them, by seeing them in their several connexions with, and dependences on, one another. He had not shunned to do it, to save his own pains, nor credit; he had not shunned preaching those doctrines, which he knew would be provoking to the watchful enemies of Christianity, or displeasing to the careless professors of it, but faithfully took his work before him, whether they would hear or forbear. And thus it was that he kept himself pure from the blood of all men.

IV. He charges them, as ministers, to be diligent and faithful in their work.

1. He commits the care of the church at Ephesus, i. e. the Christians there and thereabouts, Eph. 1:1. to them; who, though doubtless so numerous they could not all meet in one place, but worshipped God in several congregations, under the conduct of several ministers, are yet called here one flock, because they not only agreed in one faith, as they did with all Christian churches, but in many instances they kept up communion one with another. To these elders or presbyters the apostle here, on the actual foresight of his own final leaving them, commits the government of this church, and tells them that not he, but the Holy Ghost, had made them overseers, bishops of the flock. They took not this honor to themselves, but the Holy Ghost in them qualified them for, and enriched them to, this great undertaking, the Holy Ghost fell upon them, ch. 19:6.

2. He commanded them to mind the work they were called to; dignity calls for duty; (1.) They must take heed to themselves in the first place, must have a very jealous eye on all the motions of their own souls, and on all they said and did. Those are not likely to be skilful or faithful keepers of the vineyards of others, that do not keep their own. (2.) Take heed to the flock, to all the flock, see that no part be neglected. Ministers must have a constant regard to the souls of their charge, as shepherds to their sheep, that they receive no damage. (3.) They must feed the church of God, do all the parts of the shepherd's office; heal the distempered, feed them with wholesome doctrine, with a tender, evangelical discipline, and see that nothing is wanting that is necessary to their being nourished up to eternal life. There is need of pastors, not only to gather the church of God, by the bringing in of those that are without, but to feed it by building up those that are within. (4.) They must watch, v. 31. as shepherds keep watch over their flocks by night; must be awake and watchful; must not give way to spiritual sloth and slumber, but must stir up themselves to their business, and closely attend it. Watch thou in all things, 2 Tim. 4:5. watch against everything hurtful, and to everything that will be advantageous to the flock; improve every opportunity of doing it a kindness.

3. He gives them several good reasons for this. Let them consider,

(1.) The interest of their Master, and his concern for the flock, committed to their charge, v. 28. 'It is the church which He has purchased with his own blood. And if it be the church of God, He expects you would show

V. 25—27. An immediate revelation seems to have been, about this time, made to the apostle, that he should no more revisit Ephesus, or see any of these elders, or those in that neighborhood to whom he had preached, any more on earth.—It is probable, that the apostle went, after this, into the neighborhood of Ephesus: 2 Tim. 4:9—13, v. 12. Philem. 22—25. and, on this ground, some learned men think, that in saying, 'I know that ye all... shall see my face no more; he only meant to draw this conclusion from the predictions, which were given of the sufferings that awaited him. The elders, however, understood him, as speaking with certainty of what he knew by revelation: nor did he attempt to undeceive them, though he saw them overwhelmed with grief. 36—38. Pref. to 1 Tim. [He may have had, says Dr. A. Clarke, 'a divine intimation, that the persons now present should not be alive when he came again that way. Or, it may refer only to Ephesus and Miletus... which, probably, he did not revisit,' though it seems he was again in their neighborhood; see, in add. to the texts above, 'Phil. 1:25—27. 2:24. Heb. 13:19, 23.' Ep.] (27) Shunned.] See on 20. 'A military word from soldiers who recoil, and leave their standing.' Leigh. (25.) BL. complains of the expedients, to reconcile this v. with Paul's actual return to Asia and Ephesus, as 'far-fetched, evidently made for the nonce, and only meriting contempt;' and finds 'the true key at v. 22; the words of which, as I have proved,' says he, 'were spoken with an avowed ignorance of the future, so were not divinely prophetic, but only those of one under the influence of his human spirit,—not knowing (as in Acts 19:28. Rom. 15:24. 2 Cor. 1:15). For the phrase ego oïd' hoti, [I know that,] is a formula, frequently used in the most elegant writers, but denotes something far less than certain knowledge (even with the addition of eu [well] before oida [know]), namely, opinion only and present persuasion. V. 28. The most able critics have shown, that the present is the genuine reading of the v.; though a few copies have 'the church of the Lord,' a phrase not used in the N. T. The passage is a most decisive testimony to the Deity of Christ. The atonement and ransom of our souls is the blood of Jesus, who is as truly God, as man: and thus in his mysterious Person, as God and man, He 'purchased the church with his own blood.' This gave the infinite value to his sacrifice; and it suggests to his ministers the most powerful motives to faithfulness, diligence, patience, and fortitude in their work.—The personality and Deity, and sovereignty likewise, of the Holy Spirit, are clearly shown, in the words, 'Over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers.' SCOTT.

29 For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock.

30 Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them.

31 Therefore watch, and remember, that by the space of three years I ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears.

32 And now, brethren, I commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified.

your love to Him, by feeding his sheep and lambs. He has purchased it; therefore it ought to be dear to us, for it was dear to Him, because it cost Him dear, and we cannot better show it, than by feeding his sheep and his lambs. He purchased it; not as Israel, of old, when He gave men for them, and people for their life, Is. 43:3, 4. but with his own blood. This proves, that Christ is God, for He is called so here, where yet He is said to purchase the church with his own blood; the blood was his as Man, here called the blood of God, for it was the blood of Him who is God, and his being so, put such dignity and worth into it, as made it both a valuable ransom of us from all evil, and a valuable purchase for us of all good, nay, a purchase of us to Christ, to be to Him a peculiar people; Thine they were, and Thou gavest them Me; in consideration of this, therefore, feed the church of God, because it is purchased at so dear a rate.

(2.) The danger the flock was in of being made a prey to its adversaries, v. 29, 30. Some understand grievous wolves of persecutors, that will inform against the Christians, and incense the magistrates against them, and will have no compassion on the flock. Ministers must take a more than ordinary care of the flock, in times of persecution. But it is rather to be understood of seducers and false teachers; probably, he has an eye to those of the circumcision, that preached up the ceremonial law, and did all they could to blemish and defame those that adhered to the pure Gospel of Christ, Gal. 5:15. Phil. 3:2. While Paul was at Ephesus, they kept away, for they durst not face him; but when he was gone, then they entered in among them, and sowed their tares where he had sown the good seed. Take heed also, v. 30. of your own selves, among the members, nay, perhaps, among the ministers of your own church, among you that I am now speaking to, shall men arise speaking perverse things, things contrary to the right rule of the Gospel, and destructive of the great intentions of it. Nay, they will pervert some sayings of the Gospel, and wrest them to make them patronize their errors, 2 Pet. 3:16. it is to draw away disciples after them, to make a party for themselves, that shall admire them, and be led by them. Some read it, to draw away the disciples after them; those that are already disciples of Christ, draw them from Him to follow them. This was there fulfilled in Phygellus and Hermogenes, who turned away from Paul and the doctrine he had preached, 2 Tim. 1:15. and in Hymeneus and Philetus, who concerning the truth erred, and overthrew the faith of some, 2 Tim. 2:18. which explains this here. But though there were some such seducers in the church of Ephesus, yet it should seem by Paul's Epistle to that church, that that church was not so much infested with false teachers, or at least with their false doctrine, as some other churches were; but its peace and purity were preserved, by the blessing of God on the pains and vigilance of these presbyters, to whom the apostle, in the actual foresight and consideration of the rise of heresies and schisms, as well as of his own death, committed the government of this church.

(3.) The great pains Paul had taken in planting this church, v. 31. Paul, like a faithful watchman, had warned them, and by his warnings of the danger of continuing in judaism and heathenism, he prevailed with men to embrace Christianity. He warned every one; beside the public warnings he gave in his preaching, he applied himself to particular persons, according as he saw their case called for it, which he had something to say peculiar to. He was constant in giving warning; night and day, his time was filled up with his work; in the night, when he should have been reposing himself, he was dealing with those he could not get to speak with in the day about their souls. He was indefatigable in it, he ceased not to warn; though they were ever so obstinate, yet he did not cease, not knowing but at length they might, by the grace of God, be overcome; though they were ever so pliable, yet he did not think that a sufficient excuse for him to desist, but still he warned them that were righteous, not to turn from their righteousness, as he had warned them when they were wicked, to turn from their wickedness, Ez. 3:18-21. He spake to them about their souls with great affection and concern, with tears. As he had served the Lord, so he had served them, with many tears, v. 19. He had begun the good work at Ephesus, thus free had he been of his pains; why then should they be sparing of their pains in carrying it on?

V. He recommends them to a divine conduct and influence, v. 32. They were in care what would become of them, how they should go on in their work, break through their difficulties, and what provision would be made for them and their families. In answer to all these perplexities, Paul directs them to look up to God with an eye of faith, and beseeches God to look down on them with an eye of favor.

1. He commends them, (1.) To God, i. e. to his providence, and to its protection and care. It is enough, that, whomsoever we are separated from, still we have God nigh unto us, 1 Pet. 4:19. (2.) To the Word of his grace, by which some understand Christ, John 1:1. 1 John 1:1. He puts them into his hand, as being his servants, whom He would in a particular manner take care of. It comes much to one, if, by the Word of his grace, we understand the Gospel of Christ, for it is Christ in the Word that is nigh unto us for our support and encouragement, and his Word is spirit and life. He commends them to the Word of God's grace, not only as the foundation of their hope, and the fountain of their joy, but as the rule of their walking; observe the precepts of this Word, and then live upon its promises.

2. He commends them to the Word of God's grace, not so much for a protection from their enemies, or a provision for their families, as for the spiritual blessings they most needed, and ought most to value. (1.) For their edification; It is able (the Spirit with it and by it) to build you up: there is that in it which you need to be better acquainted with, and more affected with. Ministers, in preaching the Word of grace, must aim at their own edification, as well as at the edification of others. The most advanced Christians, while in this world, are capable of growing, and will find the Word of grace to have still more and more in it to contribute to their growth. (2.) For their glorification; It is able to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified. The Word of God's grace gives it, not only as it gives the knowledge of it, but as it gives the promise of it; and by the Word, as the ordinary vehicle, the Spirit of grace is given, ch. 10:44. thus it is the Word of God's grace that gives us the inheritance. Those that would make out a title to heaven, must make it sure they are among the sanctified, incorporated with them, and partake of the same image and nature.

VI. He recommends himself to them as an example of indifference to this world, and to everything in it; which, if they would walk in the same Spirit, and in the same steps, they would find to contribute greatly to their easy and comfortable passage through it. He here tells them,

1. That he never aimed at worldly wealth, v. 33. There were many in Ephesus, and many of those that had embraced the Christian faith, who were rich, had a great deal of money, and plate, and rich furniture, and wore very good clothes, and made a very good appearance. Now, (1.)

Paul was not ambitious to live like them; we may take it in that sense. The false apostles desired to make a fair show in the flesh, Gal. 6:12, to make a figure in the world; but Paul did not; he knew how to want, and how to be abased. (2.) He was not greedy to receive from them either silver, or gold, or apparel; so far from being always craving, that he was not so much as coveting, nor desired them to allow him so and so for his pains among them, but was content with such things as he had; he never made a gain of them, 2 Cor. 12:14. He could not only say with Moses, Num. 16:15, and with Samuel, 1 S. 12:3, 5. Whose ox have I taken? Or whom have I defrauded? But, 'Whose kindness have I coveted, or asked? Or to whom have I been burdensome?' He protests against desiring a gift, Phil. 4:17.

2. That he had worked for his living, and taken a deal of pains to get bread, v. 34. Observe, (1.) Paul was sometimes reduced to necessities, and the want of the common supports of life, though so great a favorite of heaven, and so great a blessing to this earth. What an unthinking, unkind, and ungrateful world is this, that could let such a man as Paul be poor in it! (2.) He desired no more than to have his necessities supplied; he did not work at his calling to enrich himself, but to maintain himself with food and raiment. (3.) When he was to earn his bread, he did it by a manual occupation. Paul had a head and tongue that he might have got money by, but they were these hands, saith he, that ministered to my necessities. Paul puts these presbyters (and others in them) in mind of this, that they may not think it strange if they be thus neglected, and yet to go on in their work, and make the best shift they can to live; the less encouragement they have from men, the more they shall have from God. (4.) He worked not only for himself, but for the support of them also that were with him; that was hard indeed! It had better become them to have worked for him, to maintain him as their tutor; but so it is; those that are willing to take the laboring oar, will find those about them willing they should have it.

3. That even then when he worked for the supply of his own necessities, yet he spared something out of what he got, for the relief of others; for this he here obliges them to do, v. 35. Some understand it of their supporting the faith of weak believers, by removing the prejudices which some conceived against Christianity, as if the preachers of it made a gainful trade of their preaching, and the Gospel was only a trick to get money by, and pick people's pockets; but I rather understand it, of their helping to support the sick and the poor, and those that could not labor, because it agrees with Paul's exhortation, Eph. 4:28. We must labor in an honest employment, not only that we may be able to live, but that we may be able to give.

This might seem a hard saying, and, therefore, Paul backs it with a saying of our Master's, which he would have them always to remember; words which our Lord, it should seem, often used to his disciples, Mat. 10:8, 9, which, though nowhere recorded by the evangelists, yet Paul had, by word of mouth from Peter, or some other of the disciples; and an excellent saying it is, and has something of a paradox in it; It is more blessed to give than to receive. 'It is,' (saith Dr. Tillotson,) 'a particular endearment of this admirable saying of our Savior's to us, that, being omitted by the evangelists, and in danger of being lost and forgotten, it was thus happily retrieved by Paul, and recorded by Luke.' The sentiment of the children of this world is contrary; they are afraid of giving; 'This giving,' they say, 'undoes us all;' but they are in hope of getting, every one for his gain from his quarter, Is. 56:11. Clear gain is with them the most blessed thing that can be; but Christ tells us, It is more blessed, more excellent in itself, an evidence of a more excellent disposition of mind, and the way to a better blessedness at last, to give, than to receive. It makes us more like to God, who gives to all, and receives from none; and to the Lord Jesus, who went about doing good. It is more blessed to give our pains than to receive pay for it, and what we should delight to do. It is more pleasant to do good to the grateful, but it is more honorable to do good to the ungrateful,* for [God commands it, and] then we have God to be our paymaster.

V. 36-38. After Paul's parting sermon to the elders of Ephesus, which was very affecting, we have here the parting prayer and tears, yet more so; we can scarcely read the account, and meditate on them, with dry eyes.

I. They parted with prayer, v. 36. A joint prayer; he not only prayed for them, but with them, with them all. It is good for friends, when they part, to part with prayer; that by praying together, just at parting, they may be enabled to pray the more feelingly one for another when parted, which is one part of our Christian duty, and an improvement of the communion of saints. The Lord watch between us, and watch over us both, when we are absent one from the other, is a good parting prayer, Gen. 31:49, as also that our next meeting may be either nearer heaven, or in heaven. Paul here followed the example of Christ, John 17:1.

II. They parted with tears, abundance of tears, and most affectionate embraces, v. 37, 38. Those that are most loving, are commonly best beloved. Paul, who was a most affectionate friend himself, had very affectionate friends. These tears at parting with Paul were a grateful return for all he had shed in preaching to, and praying with them. He that watereth, shall be watered also himself.

What cut them to the heart thus, was, that word Paul spake, that they should see his face no more: it makes the farewell just like a funeral. There were other things for which they sorrowed,—that they should want the benefit of his public performances, his personal counsels and comforts; but this gave the most sensible accent to their grief. If our friends died in Christ, and we live to Him, though we shall see their faces no more in this world, we hope to see them again in PRACT. OBS. V. 13-38. No Christian can be comfortable or prosperous without retirement. Popular ministers may preach, converse, or pray in company, to the edifying of others: and yet decline in their own souls, for want of self-examination, humiliation, and secret prayer, suited immediately to their own case: their friends should consider this, and not too much intrude on the regular and needful hours for retirement of those persons in whose company they most delight.—All who are employed in the sacred pastoral service, whether favored with living monitors, in some degree resembling Paul, or not, should consider this charge of the apostle as addressed to them, even as really as to the Ephesian elders; and as thus setting before them the proper conduct, spirit, and principles of a true minister of Christ. Except we are ourselves deeply affected with the subjects on which we treat, how can we expect to affect others? and how can we convince them, that we indeed mean anything by our exhortations, unless we persevere in our labors amidst temptations and opposition?—Alas! few who claim the honor of being 'the successors of the apostles,' in office and authority, are disposed to affect an equality with them in self-denial, and a willingness to labor night and day without emolument, and in circumstances of comparative poverty! It is indeed probable, that their authority, as successors to the apostles, would be far less questioned, if this were their conduct and spirit. The zealous and prudent minister of Christ, however, who is 'wise to win souls,' will not tenaciously demand even his due maintenance, when it would interfere with his usefulness; but will 'suffer all things, rather than hinder the Gospel of Christ.' Should peculiar circumstances require or admit of it, his own hands would minister to his necessities, and those of his family or friends: that he might show the people all his principles reduced to practice; and teach even the poor of the flock thus to labor, that they might be able to assist in supporting the weak; and that every one might learn to inquire, not what gain he shall make, but what good he can do; according to the words of our gracious Lord, who has taught us, that 'It is more blessed to give than to receive;' a sentence, that should be written on every heart, especially on that of every minister of the Gospel. 'This miad was in Christ Jesus;' may it be in us also. Amen, and Amen. SCOTT.

(34.) 'I question whether in the whole range of ancient oratory, there is to be found a sentence of more deinotes, and in which energy and pathos are more happily combined.' Bloomf. Weak. 'The needy and infirm, who are not able to maintain themselves.' DODDR.

(35.) All things. Rather, completely. Bloomf. It is more blessed, &c. 'This is a true and precious monument of apostolical tradition.' Doddr. Were the whole world to feel and practice upon this sentiment, the work of religion would be more than half done; for selfishness is the great antagonist principle of the Gospel. See Wayland's Elts. Mor. Sci. Ed. Where or on what occasion our Lord spake these words, we do not know; but the sentiment is worthy of Christ. A truly generous mind, in affluence, rejoices in opportunities to do good; and feels happy in having such opportunities. A man of an independent spirit, when reduced to poverty, finds it a severe trial to be obliged to live on the bounty of another; and feels pain in receiving what the other feels a happiness in communicating. Let, therefore, the man who is able to give, feel himself the obliged person: and think how much pain the feeling heart of the supplicant must endure, in being obliged to forego its native independence, in soliciting and receiving the bounty of another. I am not speaking of common beggars; these have got their minds already depraved, and their native independence reduced, by sin and idleness, to servility.' DR. A. CLARKE.

V. 36-38. 'This, which is Luke's own explication, leaves no room for ambiguity, which might be imagined in the expression used before. (25.) Doddr.—It does not appear that there was a church at Miletus; for none are spoken of, but the elders of Ephesus and Paul's companions. It is probable, that Timothy went to Ephesus with these elders, and resided there for some time; as we do not find that he accompanied the apostle to Jerusalem, or was with him before he arrived at Rome. Concluding Note. Overseers, v. 28.] 'Eπισκοπος [corrupted in bishop] is a name generally applied to those who preside over anything, or to whose care its administration is committed. So the Hebrews used pyd for ruler, tr. at Num. 31:14. Judg.

CHAP. XXI.

1 Paul will not by any means be dissuaded from going to Jerusalem. 9 Philip's daughters prophetesses. 17 Paul cometh to Jerusalem: 27 where he is apprehended, and in great danger, 31 but by the chief captain is rescued, and permitted to speak to the people.

AND it came to pass, that after we were gotten from them, and had launched, we came with a straight course unto Coos, and the day following unto Rhodes, and from thence unto Patara:

2 And finding a ship sailing over unto Phenicia, we went aboard, and set forth.

3 Now when we had discovered Cyprus, we left it on the left hand, and sailed into Syria, and landed at Tyre: for there the ship was to unlade her burden.

4 And finding disciples, we tarried there seven days: who said to Paul through the Spirit, that he should not go up to Jerusalem.

a better, and to be there together for ever, and with the Lord.

Lastly, They accompanied him unto the ship; partly to show respect, they would bring him on his way as far as they could; and partly to have a little more of his company and conversation; if it must be the last interview, they will have as much from him as they can: loath to part bids oft farewell. But this was a comfort to both sides, and soon turned this tide of passion, that the presence of Christ both went with him, and stayed with them.

CHAP. XXI. We have, with a great deal of pleasure, attended the apostle in his travels throughout the Gentile nations to preach the Gospel, and have seen a great harvest of souls gathered in to Christ; there we have seen likewise what persecutions he endured; yet still out of them all the Lord presently delivered him, 2 Tim. 3: 11. But now we are to attend him to Jerusalem, and there into lasting bonds; the days of his service now seem to be over, and nothing to remain but days of suffering, days of darkness, for they are many. It seems a thousand pities such a workman should be laid aside; yet we must not only acquiesce, as his friends then did, saying, The will of the Lord be done; but we must believe, and shall find reason to do so, that Paul in the prison, and at the bar, is as truly glorifying God, and serving Christ's interest, as Paul in the pulpit was.

V. 1—7. We may observe here,

I. How much ado Paul had to get clear from [Miletus], intimated in the first words of the ch. after we were gotten from them, i. e. were drawn from them as by violence. It was a force put on both sides.

II. Their prosperous voyage thence; without any difficulty, they came, by direct sailing, to Coos, a famous Grecian island; the next day to Rhodes, talked of for the Colossus there; thence to Patara, a famous port, the metropolis of Lycia, v. 1. there they very happily found a ship sailing over unto Phenicia, the very course they were steering, v. 2. Providence must be acknowledged when things happen thus opportunely, and we are favored by some little circumstances that contribute to the expediting of our affairs; and we must say, It is God that maketh our way perfect. This ship that was bound for Phenicia, i. e. Tyre, they took the convenience of, went on board, and set sail for Tyre. In that voyage they discovered Cyprus, the island Barnabas was of, and which he took care of, and therefore Paul did not visit it, but we left it on the left hand, v. 3. sailed on the coasts of Syria, and at length landed at Tyre, that celebrated mart of the nations, [Ez. 27: end,] so it had been, but was now reduced; yet something of a trade it had still, for there the ship was to unlade her burden, and did so.

III. Paul's halt at Tyre; finding he could compass the remainder of his journey within the time he had fixed.

1. At Tyre he found disciples, some that had embraced the Gospel, and professed the Christian faith. Observe, Wherever Paul came, he inquired what disciples were there, found them out, and associated with them; for we know what is the usage of birds of a feather. When Christ was upon earth, though He went sometimes into the coasts of Tyre, yet He never went thither to preach the Gospel there; nor did He think fit to afford to Tyre and Sidon the advantages which Chorazin and Bethsaida had, though He knew that if they had had them, they would have made a better improvement of them, Luke 10: 13, 14. But, after the enlarging of the gospel-commission, Christ was preached at Tyre, and had disciples there; and to this, some think, that prophecy concerning Tyre had reference, Is. 23: 18. That her merchandise, and hire, should be holiness to the Lord.

2. Paul finding these, tarried 7 days, they urging him to stay as long as he could. He stayed as at Troas, ch. 20: 6. that he might be sure to spend one Lord's day with them, and so have an opportunity of preaching publicly; good men desire to do good wherever they come; and where we find disciples we may either benefit them, or be benefited by them.

3. The disciples at Tyre were endowed with such gifts, that they could by the Spirit foretell the troubles Paul would meet with at Jerusalem, ch. 20: 23. It being a thing that would be so much talked of when it came to pass, God saw fit to have it much prophesied of before, that people's faith, instead of being offended, might be confirmed. And withal they were endowed with such graces, that, foreseeing his troubles, out of love to him, and concern for the church, especially the churches of the Gentiles, that could ill spare him, they begged of him that he would not go up to Jerusalem, for they hoped the decree was conditional; If he go up, he will come into trouble there; as the prediction to David, that the men of Keilah will deliver him up; i. e. if he venture himself with them; therefore they said to him, by the Spirit, that he should not go up, because they concluded it would be most for the glory of God, that he should continue at liberty; and it was not at all their fault to think so; and consequently to dissuade him; but it was their mistake; for his trial would be for the glory of God, and the furtherance of the Gospel, and he knew it; and the importunity used with him, to dissuade him from it, renders his pious and truly heroic resolution the more illustrious.

9:23. episcopos, [in the Sept.] Hence the term was applied to those ecclesiastical rulers, whose duty it was to take care for each individual member, and provide for the welfare of the whole body. They are also called poimenes in Eph. 4:11, a term figuratively denoting a care-taker, and one who provides for the safety of others; which involves an idea of governing, ruling. Thus poimainein also denotes to rule. See on Mat. 2:6. Jn. 10:12. 1 Pet. 5:2. Those, moreover, who, in the N. T., are called episcopoi and poimenes, are also called presbuteroi. Some indeed have fancied a distinction between episcopoi and presbuteroi in the primitive church; but the distinction is utterly unfounded. For those whom Paul here addresses as episcopoi, are just before, (v. 17.) called presbuteroi. See Ti. 1:5, 7. Passages, also, in the N. T., mention Bishops and Deacons only, to the omission of Presbyters, who, nevertheless, could not have been passed by, if the office of Bishops had then differed from that of Presbyters. See Phil. 1:1, 1 Tim. 3:1—10. Indeed, there is not found in the N. T. any vestige of that material difference which, in a later age, subsisted between Bishops and Presbyters. The Christians in the age of the apostles followed the model of the Jewish church in the sacred rites, and thus the episcopoi, or presbuteroi, corresponded to the Archienagogi [synagogue rulers] of the Jews, who were also in like manner termed zqnym, presbuteroi, and whom Philo 1, 399, styles hierophantas. These zqnym, or presbuteroi, of the Jews, were also termed prusym, i. e. prefects, praepositi (see Vitruv.,) so that they had the care, superintendance, and governance of whatever belonged to public worship.

These were persons skilled in the Mosaic Law. See Vitruv. and Seld. Thus also the Christian Bishops or Presbyters, who succeeded to the place of these Archienagogi and zqnym, were set over each Christian society, in order to overlook and superintend the purity of morals, and rectitude of doctrine, of those committed to their charge, so as to prevent any injury arising to Christianity from failure in the one, or error in the other. Now this is plain from abundance of passages in the N. T. For those who in v. 17. are called presbuteroi, are at v. 23. exhorted poimainein ten ekklesian, prosechein to poiminoi. And in 1 Tim. 5:11. mention is made of prostotes, presbuteroi, and episcopoi. Paul, in 1 Tim. 5:11. directs Timothy, epimeleisthai tes ekklesias tou Theou. See also 1 Pet. 5:1, 2. At Hebr. 13:7. and 7:24. they are said to be hegoumenoi.

Now it has been a question, whether or no the Presbyters, or Bishops, were appointed to teach the precepts of the Christian religion? Many have maintained, that the whole of the episcopal office consisted in the regulation of the sacred worship of the Christians, by taking care that all things in the church were done rightly and suitably to common usage; and admonishing, reproving, and subjecting to ecclesiastical censures, those who acted contrary; and that these Presbyters or Bishops taught, if they were able and willing, but were not chosen and appointed for the purpose of teaching the truths of Christianity. So Dodwell, &c.; and Vitruv., who thinks that, owing to the lowly condition of the primitive church, and contrary to the intentions of the apostles, not all the persons elected as Presbyters by the Christian congregations were qualified to teach. Thus Boehmer maintains; also Mich. and Farberger. The contrary, namely, that Presbyters, in the age of the apostles, were appointed to teach the people, as well as to govern the church, and were, from the very institutes of the apostles, with reference to the nature of the office, confined to teaching, has, after Danov., recently found a learned and zealous defender in Gabler. Indeed, it may, from various passages of the N. T., be proved, that Presbyters were also appointed to teach; for in Tim. and Ti., Paul especially urges this, that those only should be chosen Presbyters in the churches, who, besides the other virtues there mentioned, were not deficient in the faculty of teaching those committed to their care, in refuting adversaries; thus Ti. 1:9. 1 Tim. 3:2. Moreover, in 1 Cor. 12:25, 29. where there are enumerated the ecclesiastical offices, the episcopoi or presbuteroi are omitted, (though the apostle could not mean to do so,) and in their place are mentioned didaskaloi [teachers]. Therefore (as Gabler, rightly) the Bishops or Presbyters were the ordinary teachers of the primitive church, just as the apostles and prophets, mentioned before them, held the rank of extraordinary teachers. Also, in Eph. 4:11. mention is made of poimenes (i. e. Presbyters or Bishops) kai didaskaloi, i. e. Presbyters, who were also teachers. That by the poimenes and didaskaloi the same are meant, is plain from the particle kai [and]. For surely, if the poimenes had been persons different from the didaskaloi, the apostle would have written, tous de poimenas, tous de didaskalous: since, by this mode of constructing the sentences, he has distinguished the rest of the ministers of doctrine and of the church. In 1 Thess. 5:12. are conjoined proistamenoi, (praefecti, Bishops,) and nouthetountes, exhortors, teachers; and they are pronounced to be the same. The terms, too, proistamenoi and nouthetountes are meant to explain the general one, kopiontes, [tr. those who labor,] (see Koppe.) And so Heb. 13:7. where the "hegoumenoi [tr. those who have rule] who have spoken," &c. are the proistamenoi in 1 Thess. 5:12. At Jerusalem, also, as appears from Acts 11:30. and at 15:2. there were Presbyters. But (as Gabler well remarks) the presence of the apostles, inasmuch as they were not confined to the church at Jerusalem, could not supersede the necessity of Presbyters filling the office of ordinary teachers and rulers of the church. For to the Christian congregations at Jerusalem, the instruction of the apostles would surely not be sufficient, since they travelled up and down, and were occupied with innumerable other labors and avocations. . . Finally, at 1 Tim. 5:17. we read, that whosoever rightly discharges the office of Presbyter, to them is due a liberal stipend or reward, especially if they not merely teach, but perform the office zealously and laboriously, i. e. be kopiontes en logn kai didaskalia. For proistasthai [to rule] pertains to all the parts of the office, even to the being didaktikos [apt to teach]. Comp. 1 Tim. 3:2. and see Gabler. Therefore, when poimainein is used of the governors of the churches, it is to be referred both to the doctrine and discipline of the church. Comp. 1 Tim. 3:2. and Acts 20:30, 31.

NOTES. * CHAP. XXI. V. 1—6. Torn from them, &c.] So the first clause may be lit. r.: and the language was evidently intended to convey the idea of that powerful reciprocal affection, which cemented together the hearts of these Christian friends, and rendered their final separation at the call of duty exceedingly painful, and the effect of a very violent effort. Perhaps the ship, in which Paul and his friends had sailed thus far, was bound to Patara. Should a company of believers, in this Christian country, and in the environs of one of our great commercial cities, imitate this example (5); they would doubtless be derided, as a fanatical or hypocritical set of people.—It is most evident, from this circumstance, that kneeling was the general posture for public and social prayer, in the primitive church; otherwise this company would scarcely have used it in so inconvenient a situation. SCOTT. It is but just, however, to recollect, that the fervent genius of the E. displays itself in manners quite different from ours: and this scene was probably not at all strange there. A son of the Ed. saw a mussulman praying at noon on the sands, amid a crowd of Christian Sunday travellers; and it is well known devotions in the E. are very public. They are not so much ashamed to own God, as some of a colder clime. 'Grot. has proved, that the Jews offered up prayer everywhere, even on the seashore.' (4.) 'It is plain Paul understood them popularly, (as warning him not to go if he valued his life, &c.,) for if he had regarded himself as forbidden by the Spirit, we may be sure he would not have gone up.' See Bloomf. Ed.

5 And when we had accomplished those days, we departed and went our way: and they all brought us on our way with wives and children, till we were out of the city: and we kneeled<sup>b</sup> down on the shore, and prayed.

6 And when we had taken our leave one of another, we took ship; and they returned home again.

7 And when we had finished our course from Tyre, we came to Ptolemais, and saluted the brethren, and abode with them one day.

8 And the next day, we that were of Paul's company departed, and came unto Cesarea: and we entered into the house of Philip<sup>c</sup> the evangelist,<sup>d</sup> which was one of the<sup>e</sup> seven; and abode with him.

9 And the same man had four daughters, virgins, which<sup>f</sup> did prophesy.

10 ¶ And as we tarried<sup>g</sup> there many days, there came down from Judea a certain prophet, named<sup>h</sup> Agabus.

11 And when he was come unto us, he took Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands and feet, and said, Thus saith the Holy Ghost, So<sup>b</sup> shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles.

4. The disciples at Tyre, through none of Paul's converts, yet showed a very great respect to Paul, whose usefulness in the church they had heard so much of; when he departed from Tyre, though they had had but seven days' acquaintance with him, yet, as if he had been some great man, they all came together, with their wives and children, solemnly to take leave of him, to beg his blessing, and to bring him as far on his way as the sea would permit them. Note, We should pay respect, not only to our own ministers that are over us in the Lord, but, in a particular manner, honor those whom God hath singularly honored, by making them eminently useful in their generation. It is good to train up children in a respect to good people and good ministers. This was particularly remarkable at Tyre, which we have not met with anywhere else, that they brought their wives and children to attend Paul, to do him the more honor, and to receive benefit by his instructions and prayers; and, as angry notice was taken of the children of the idolaters of Bethel, that mocked a prophet, so, no doubt, gracious notice was taken of the children of the disciples, at Tyre, that honored an apostle, as Christ accepted the hosannas of the little children. We should make the utmost we can of our opportunities for the good of our souls. They brought Paul on his way, that they might have so much the more of his company, and his prayers. Some refer us to Ps. 45:12. as a prediction of this. The daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift; for, it is probable that they made some presents to Paul at parting, as usual to our friends that are going to sea, ch. 28:10.

5. They parted with prayer, as Paul and the Ephesian elders had done, ch. 20:36. Thus Paul has taught us, by example, as well as rule, to pray always, to pray without ceasing, and everywhere. Their last farewell on the shore was sanctified and sweetened with prayer. Those that are going to sea should, when they quit the shore, commit themselves to God by prayer, and put themselves under his protection, as those that hope, even when they leave the terra firma, to find firm footing for their faith in the providence and protection of God.

6. They parted at last, v. 6. When we had taken our leave one of another, with the most affectionate embraces, and expressions of love and grief, we took ship to be gone, and they returned home again, each complaining that this is a parting world. Observe how they disposed of themselves; we, that had a journey before us, took ship, thankful that we had a ship to carry us; and they, that had no occasion to call them abroad, returned home again, thankful that they had a home to go to. Rejoice Zebulon, in thy going out, and Issachar in thy tents.

IV. Their arrival at Ptolemais, not far from Tyre, v. 7. some think it the same with Accho, in the tribe of Asher, Judg. 1:31. Paul begged leave to go ashore there, to salute the brethren, to inquire of their state, and testify his good-will; though he could not stay long with them, yet he would not pass without paying his respects, and he abode with them one day, perhaps a Lord's day; better a short stay than no visit.

V. 8—14. I. Paul and his company arrive at length at Cesarea, where he designed to make some stay, it being a place where the Gospel was first preached to the Gentiles, and the Holy Ghost fell on them, ch. 10:1, 44. Paul seldom had occasion to go to a public house, but, wherever he came, some friend or other took him in, and bid him welcome. I. They were entertained by Philip the evangelist, whom we left at Cesarea many years ago, after he had baptized the eunuch, ch. 8:40. and there we now find him again. He was originally a deacon, (one of the seven, chosen to serve tables, ch. 6:5.) but was now, and had been long, an evangelist, one that went about to plant and water churches, as the apostles did, and gave himself, as they did, to the Word and prayer; thus, having used the office of a deacon well, he purchased to himself a good degree; and having been faithful in a few, was made ruler over many things. It thus becomes Christians and ministers, according as their ability is, to use hospitality one to another without grudging, 1 Pet. 4:9. 2. This Philip had four maiden daughters, which did prophesy, v. 9. i. e. of Paul's troubles at Jerusalem, as others; or, perhaps, for his comfort and encouragement, in reference to the difficulties before him. Here was a further accomplishment of Joel 2:28.

II. A plain and full prediction of Paul's sufferings, by a noted prophet, v. 10, 11.

1. Paul and his company tarried many days; What cause he saw to tarry so long there, and to make so little haste at the latter end of his journey to Jerusalem, when he seemed so much in haste at the beginning of it, we cannot tell; but we are sure he did not stay, either there, or anywhere else, to be idle; he measured his time by days, and numbered them.

2. Agabus is he that came from Jerusalem to Antioch, to foretell a general famine, ch. 11:27, 28. See how God dispenseth his gifts variously! To Paul was given the word of wisdom and knowledge, as an apostle, by the Spirit, and the gifts of healing; to Agabus, and to Philip's daughters, were given prophesy, by the same Spirit,—the foretelling of things to come, which came to pass according to the prediction, See 1 Cor. 12:8, 10. So that that which was the most eminent gift of the Spirit under the O. T., the foretelling of things to come, was under the N. T. quite outshone by other gifts, and bestowed on those of less note, in the church. It should seem as if Agabus came on purpose to Cesarea, to meet Paul with this prophetic intelligence.

3. He foretold Paul's bonds at Jerusalem, (1.) By a sign, as the prophets of old did, Is. 20:3. Jer. 13:1. 17:2. Eze. 4:1. 12:3. and many others. Agabus' taking Paul's girdle, was designed both to confirm the prophesy, and to affect those about him with it, because that which we see usually makes a greater impression on us than that which we only hear of. (2.) By an explication of the sign; Thus saith the Holy Ghost, the Spirit of prophecy, So shall the Jews, &c. Paul had this express warning given him of his troubles, that he might prepare for them, and, when they came, they might be no surprise or terror to him; the general notice given us, that through much tribulation we must enter into the kingdom of God, should be of the same use to us.

III. The great importunity his friends used with him, to dissuade him from going forward to Jerusalem, v. 12. Not only they of that place, but we that were of Paul's company, and among the rest Luke himself, who had heard this often before, and seen Paul's resolution notwithstanding, besought him, with tears, that he would not go up to Jerusalem. Now, 1. Here appeared a commendable affection to Paul, and a value for him, on the account of his great usefulness in the church. Good men that are very active, sometimes need to be dissuaded from overworking themselves; and good men that are very bold, need to be dissuaded from exposing themselves too far. The Lord is for the body, and so must we be. 2. Yet there was a mixture of infirmity, especially in those of Paul's company, who knew he undertook this journey by divine direction, and had seen with what resolution he had before broken through the like opposition; but the infirmity is incident to us all; when we see trouble at a distance, and have only a general notice of it, we can make light of it; but when it comes near, we begin to shrink, and draw back. Now that it toucheth thee, thou art troubled, Job 4:5.

IV. The holy bravery and intrepidity with which Paul persisted in his resolution, v. 13.

1. He reproves them for dissuading him; here is a quarrel of love on both sides, and very sincere and strong affections clashing with each other; they love him dearly, and therefore oppose his resolution; he loves

V. 7—14. Ptolemais.] A city on the sea-coast of Galilee, so called, because rebuilt by Ptolemy, k. of Egypt. Agabus came down from Judea, properly so called; for Cesarea lay in that part of the land which belonged to the kings of Israel, not in that belonging to the kings of Judah. Paul considered himself bound in duty, to accomplish the service with which he had been entrusted, of conveying the oblations of the Gentile converts to the church at Jerusalem; and, on this and other accounts, he was steadfastly purposed to proceed, whatever persecutions might await him. (8.) Evangelist.] This word occurs only thrice in the New Testament. Acts 21:8. secondly in Eph., where evangelists are mentioned after apostles and prophets, as one of the offices which our Lord, after his ascension, had appointed for the conversion of infidels, and the establishment of order in his church; Eph. 4:11. and lastly, 2 Tim. 4:5. . . . This word has also obtained another signification, which, though not scriptural, is very ancient.' Campbell. Scott. (7.) And when, &c.] 'I. e. thus finishing the sailing part of our journey.'

(8.) 'These Evangelists in the age of the apostles were not settled pastors of any one Christian congregation, or resident at any stated place, but were itinerant Presbyters, sent by the apostles to various cities, to inculcate the elements of the Christian religion, and following up the instruction of the apostles, thus building on their foundation. See Euseb. Hist. Eccl., Acts 8:5. and Koppe, on Eph. 4:11.'

(10—12.) 'Neither in 20:22. nor in v. 4. are we told that the Holy Ghost had given any command to Paul about his going, or not going, to Jerusalem. If he had, Paul would no doubt have said so here, v. 13. Comp. v. 14. where his friends evidently knew not what God's will was in the case.'

12 And when we heard these things, both we, and they of that place, besought him not to go up to Jerusalem.

13 Then Paul answered, What mean ye to weep and to break mine heart? for I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem, for the name of the Lord Jesus.

14 And when he would not be persuaded, we ceased, saying, The will of the Lord be done.

15 And after those days we took up our carriages, and went up to Jerusalem.

16 There went with us also certain of the disciples of Cesarea, and brought with them one Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple, with whom we should lodge.

17 ¶ And when we were come to Jerusalem, the brethren received us gladly.

18 And the day following Paul went in with us unto James; and all the elders were present.

19 And when he had saluted them, he declared particularly what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry.

them dearly, and therefore chides them for opposing it; What mean ye to weep and to break [break down, weaken] my heart? It was a temptation to him, it shocked him, it began to weaken and slacken his resolution, and made him to entertain thoughts of tacking about; What do you mean, to do thus? Has not our Master bid us take up our cross? And would you have me to avoid mine? It was a trouble to him; Paul was of a very tender spirit; and now it breaks his heart, when he is under the necessity of denying the request of his weeping friends. When our friends are called out to sufferings, we shall show our love, rather by comforting them than by sorrowing for them. But observe, When Paul was made a prisoner at Jerusalem, he was presently sent to Cesarea, the very place where he now was, ch. 23:33, and there he continued at least two years, ch. 24:27, a prisoner at large, as appears ch. 24:23, so that the church at Cesarea had much more of Paul's company and help when he was imprisoned, than they could have had if he had been at liberty. That which we oppose, as thinking it to make much against us, may be overruled, by the providence of God, to work for us, which is a reason why we should follow Providence, and not fear it.

2. He repeats his resolution to go forward, notwithstanding; What mean ye to weep thus? I am ready to suffer whatever is appointed me. I expect trouble, I count upon it, it will be no surprise to me. I was told at first what great things I must suffer, ch. 9:16. 'I am prepared for it, by a clear conscience, a firm confidence in God, a holy contempt of the world and the body, a lively faith in Christ, and a joyful hope of eternal life. I can bid it welcome, as we do a friend that we look for, and have made preparation for. I can, through grace, not only bear it, but rejoice in it.' All that a man has will he give for his life; but life itself will Paul give for the service and honor of the name of Christ.

V. Their patient acquiescence, v. 14.

1. They submitted to the wisdom of a good man; they had carried the matter as far as they could with decency; but when he would not be persuaded, we ceased our importunity. Paul knows best his own mind, and what he has to do; and it becomes us to leave it to himself, and not to censure him for what he does, or to say he is rash, and wilful, and humorsome, and has a spirit of contradiction, as some people are apt to judge of those that will not do just as they would have them. No doubt, Paul has a good reason for his resolution, though he sees cause to keep it to himself, and God has gracious ends to serve in confirming him in it. It is good manners, not to over-press those in their own affairs, that will not be persuaded.

2. They submitted to the will of a good God. They did not resolve his resolution into his stubbornness, but into his willingness to suffer, and God's will that he should. In the turning of the hearts of our friends, or ministers, this way or that way, we should eye the hand of God, and submit to that; when we see trouble coming, and particularly that of our ministers, being silenced, or removed from us, it becomes us to say, The will of the Lord be done. God is wise, and knows how to make all work for good, and therefore welcome his holy will. When a trouble is come, this must allay our griefs, that the will of the Lord is done; when we see it coming, this must silence our fears, that the will of the Lord shall be done, to which we must say, Amen, let it be done.

V. 15—26. In these vs. we have,

I. Paul's journey to Jerusalem from Cesarea, and the company that went along with him,

1. They took [or packed] up their carriages, [i. e. things they carried, bundles,] their bag and baggage; it should seem, like poor travellers or soldiers, they were their own porters; so little had they of change of raiment. Some think they had with them the money they collected in the churches of Macedonia and Achaia, for the poor saints at Jerusalem. Their resolution to cleave to Paul, was like that of Thomas, in a like case, to Christ, John 11:16, or of Itai to David, 2 S. 15:21. Thus Paul's boldness imboldened them.

2. Certain of the disciples of Cesarea went along with them; whether of previous design, therefore, or on purpose to do Paul service, and if possible prevent his trouble, or at least minister to him in it, does not appear. Elisha kept close to Elijah, when he knew the time was at hand that he should be taken up.

3. They brought with them an honest old gentleman, that had a house of his own at Jerusalem, in which he would gladly entertain Paul and his company, one Mnason of Cyprus, v. 16. Such a great concourse of people there was to the feast, that it was a hard matter to get lodgings, and those that had private houses must freely accommodate strangers. Every one then would choose his friends to be his guests, and Mnason took Paul and his company to be his lodgers; though he had heard what trouble Paul was likely to come into, which might bring those that entertained him into trouble too, yet he shall be welcome to him, whatever comes of it. This Mnason is called an old disciple;

a disciple from the beginning; some think, one of the 70, or one of the first converts after the pouring out of the Spirit, or one of the first converted by the preaching of the Gospel in Cyprus, ch. 13:4. However, it is an honorable thing to be an old disciple of Jesus Christ, to have been enabled by the grace of God to continue long in a course of duty, steadfast in the faith, and growing more and more prudent and experienced, to a good old age. And with these old disciples one would choose to lodge; for the multitude of their years shall teach wisdom.

II. Paul's welcome at Jerusalem.

1. Many of the brethren there received him gladly, v. 17. Streso observes, the word here used of the welcome they gave the apostles, is used of the welcome of the apostles' doctrine, ch. 2:41. They gladly received his word. We think, if we had Paul among us, we would gladly receive him; but it is a question whether we would or no, if, having his doctrine, we do not gladly receive that.

2. They made a visit to James and the elders of the church, at a church-meeting, v. 18. The day following, Paul went in unto James, and took us with him, that were his companions, to introduce us into acquaintance with the church at Jerusalem. It should seem, James was now the only apostle resident at Jerusalem; the rest had dispersed, to preach the Gospel in other places. But still they forecasted to have an apostle at Jerusalem, perhaps sometimes one, and sometimes another, because there was a great resort thither from all parts. James was now on the spot, and all the elders or presbyters, the ordinary pastors of the church, were present. Paul saluted them all, paid his respects to them, inquired of their welfare, and gave them the right hand of fellowship. The proper signification of salutation, is, wishing salvation to you; salve, like peace be unto you. And such mutual salutations, or good wishes, very well become Christians, in token of their love to each other, and joint regard to God.

III. The account they had from him of his ministry among the Gentiles, and their satisfaction in it. Paul ascribed it all to God, v. 19, and to God they gave the praise of it, v. 20. The conversion of sinners ought to be the matter of our joy and praise, as it is of the angels. And they could not do more to encourage Paul to go on cheerfully in his work, than to glorify God for his success in it; for, if God be praised, Paul is pleased.

IV. The request of James and the elders of the church at Jerusalem to Paul, or their advice rather, that he would gratify the believing Jews, by showing some compliance with the ceremonial law, and appearing publicly in the temple to offer sacrifice; which was not a thing in itself sinful; for the ceremonial law, though by no means to be imposed on the Gentile converts, yet was not become unlawful as yet to those that had been bred up in its observance, but were far from expecting justification by it. And being not sinful, they thought it prudence in Paul to conform thus far. Observe,

1. They desired him to notice the great numbers there of Jewish converts. They call him brother, for though they were of the circumcision, and he the apostle of the Gentiles, though they were conformists, and he a non-conformist; yet they were brethren, and owned the relation. Thou hast been in some of our assemblies, and seest how numerous they are; myriads. The word signifies not thousands, but ten thousands. And this account of the success of the Gospel among the Jews, no doubt, was as grateful to Paul

V. 16. 'Grot., Knatchbull, Homberg, Pearee, Dodd., Ros., Heinr., Kuin. understand, "Leading us to a certain Mnason, with whom we should put up." See Bl. Ed.

V. 18—21. That thou teachest, &c. In this they had been misinformed: for, though the apostle had shown, that none were bound to observe the ceremonial law, and that they must by no means place any dependence on such obedience for justification; he had never forbidden the Jewish converts to observe it, as a matter of expediency, when their communion with their Gentile brethren would admit of it.—(18.) Elders. All the bishops of Judea, saith Dr. Hammond, without one word to prove it. Whitby, in Scott. That learned writer's zeal for episcopacy, leads him frequently to express himself in a manner, which seems to imply that there were no presbyters in the primitive church: perhaps he was not aware, that this supposition would reduce all min-

20 And when they heard it, they glorified the Lord; and said unto him, Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe; and they are all zealous of the law:

21 And they are informed of thee, that thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise <sup>r</sup> their children, neither to walk after the customs.

22 What is it therefore? The multitude must needs come together: for they will hear that thou art come.

23 Do therefore this that we say to thee: We have four men which have a vow on them;

24 Them take, and purify thyself with them, and be at charges with them, that they may shave <sup>t</sup> their heads: and all may know, that those things, whereof they were informed concerning thee, are nothing, but that thou thyself also walkest orderly, and keepest the law.

as the account he gave them of the conversion of the Gentiles was to them; for his heart's desire and prayer to God for the Jews, was, that they might be saved.

2. They inform him of a prevailing infirmity these believing Jews labored under, which they could not yet be cured of; They are all zealous of the law. They believe in Christ as the true Messiah, rest on his righteousness, and submit to his government; but they know the law of Moses was of God, they have found spiritual benefit in their attendance on the institutions of it, and therefore they can by no means think of parting with it, no, nor of growing cold to it; and perhaps, they urged Christ's being made under the law, and observing it, as a reason for their continuance under it. This was a great weakness and mistake, to be so fond of the isters, above deacons, to an entire parity of order, as effectually as either the Presbyterian or the Independent plan could do. (20) How many thousands.] Or, 'How many tens of thousands.' Gr. This can hardly mean less than forty or fifty thousand: and, though a considerable part of this large number might come from other places to keep the feast; yet it can scarcely be doubted, but that there were so many Christians, stately residing at Jerusalem, as to form several distinct congregations; yet the whole is spoken of as one church.

(20.) Thousands.] 'The word may only in general denote a great number; but it is certain the greater part were not stated inhabitants of Jerusalem, but only visited it on occasion of this great festival; so that no certain argument can be hence deduced as to the plurality of congregations supposed to have been now under the care of the bishop of Jerusalem, if there were indeed any Christian officer who had that title so early, and it does not appear from Scripture that there was.' Doddr. Zealous of the law.] 'Nor was it to be wondered at: for the decree of the apostles had respect only to those called from among the Gentiles, and not to those who were native Jews. Neither had Paul there begun to teach converts from among the Jews anything on that subject, though he did a little later: out of Judea indeed.' Ros. 'It is not to be wondered at, that men who had imbibed such opinions of their laws from infancy, [those laws which lifted them in pride above other nations,] that they derived them from God, and knew no revelation made by Him, that they were to cease after the death of their Messiah, should be still zealous for them; or that they who thought they could not be removed, or that any better laws could be given, should think them fit to be observed; or that they who feared such dreadful evils if they forsook them, and expected so great blessings from being faithful to them to the death, should be averse from any doctrine which taught them to apostatize from, or to forsake the Law of Moses; and yet it pleased God, as yet, not to convince them of this error by any revelation, or any affatus of that spirit which many of them had received; partly because He saw that this might have obstructed the faith even of the little remnant which belonged to the Election of Grace; partly because He knew the time would shortly come, when the destruction of their temple, and the exclusion from their own land, would render it impossible for them to observe this Law, and the severity of divine judgments on them would convince them, as it did some, that God had utterly cast off the nation from being any more his people.' BL.

V. 22—26. (24.) All may know that thou thyself, &c.] This conclusion seems to have been rather stronger than the real case would admit of.

shadows when the substance was come; to keep their necks under a yoke of bondage, when Christ was come to make them free. But see the power of education and long usage, and especially of a ceremonial law; and the charitable allowance that must be made in consideration of these. These Jews that believed, were not therefore disowned and rejected, as no Christians, because they were for the law, while it was only in their own practice, and they did not impose it on others. Their being zealous of the law, was capable of a good construction, which charity would put upon it; and of a good excuse, considering what they were brought up in, and whom they lived among.

3. They gave him to understand that these Jews, who were so zealous of the law, were ill-affected to him, v. 21. Now, (1.) It was true, Paul preached the abrogation of the law of Moses, and that it was impossible to be justified by it, and therefore we are not bound any longer to observe it. But, (2.) It was false, that he taught them to forsake Moses; for the religion he preached tended not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it. He preached Christ, the End of the law for righteousness, and repentance and faith, in the exercise of which we are to make great use of the law. The Jews among the Gentiles, whom Paul taught, were so far from forsaking Moses, that they never understood him better, nor ever embraced him so heartily, as now when they were taught to make use of him as a schoolmaster to bring them to Christ. But even the believing Jews, having got this notion of Paul, that he was an enemy to Moses, and perhaps giving too much regard to the unbelieving Jews, too, were much exasperated against him. Their ministers, the elders here present, loved and honored him, and approved of what he did, and called him brother, but the people could hardly be got to entertain a favorable thought of him; for it is certain, THE LEAST JUDICIOUS ARE THE MOST CENSORIOUS; THE WEAK-HEADED ARE THE HOT-HEADED.

4. They therefore desire Paul would, by some public act, now that he was come to Jerusalem, make it to appear that the charge against him was false. (1.) They conclude something of this kind must be done,—For Paul's sake, that his reputation may be cleared, and that so good a man may not lie under any blemish, nor so useful a man labor under any disadvantage, which may obstruct his usefulness,—for the people's sake, that they may not continue prejudiced against so good a man, nor lose the benefit of his ministry by those prejudices,—for their own sake, that since they knew it was their duty to own Paul, their doing it might not be turned to their reproach, among those that were under their charge. (2.) They produce a fair opportunity which Paul might take to clear himself; We have four men, Jews, which believe, of our own churches, and they have a vow on them, a vow of Nazariteship for a certain time; their time is now expired, v. 23. and they are to offer their offering according to the law, when they shave the head of their separation, a he-lamb for a burnt-offering, an ewe-lamb for a sin-offering, and a ram for a peace-offering, with other offerings, appurtenant to them, Num. 6:13—20. Many used to do this together, when their vow expired about the same time, either for the greater expedition, or for the greater solemnity. Now Paul having so far of late complied with the law, as to take on him the vow of a Nazarite, and to signify the expiration of it, by shaving his head at Cenchrea, ch. 18:18. according to the custom of those who lived at a distance from the temple, they desire him but to go a little further, and to join with these four, in offering the sacrifices of a Nazarite; 'Purify thyself with them according to the law; and be willing not only to take that trouble, but to be at charges with them, in buying sacrifices for this solemn occasion, and to join with them in the sacrifice.' This, they think, will effectually stop the mouth of calumny, and every one will be convinced that the report was false, that Paul was not the man he was represented to be, did not teach the Jews to forsake Moses, but, that he himself, being originally a Jew, walked orderly, and kept the law; and then all would be well.

5. They enter a protestation, that this shall be no infringement at all of the decree lately made in favor of the Gentile converts, nor do they intend by this, in the least, to derogate from the liberty allowed them, v. 25. for they knew how jealous Paul was for preserving the liberty of the converted Gentiles.

V. Paul's compliance. He was willing to gratify them in this matter. Though he

The apostle had before performed a vow of a similar nature; and he doubtless paid some regard to the Mosaic law, as a matter of expediency: but he does not appear to have habitually observed it, as it may be inferred from his own words, 1 Cor. 9:19—23. Gal. 2:11—16. 4:12—16. They probably meant, that he attended to the legal ceremonies, as far as his intimate communion with uncircumcised persons would permit him; but it may be questioned, whether this, if it had been fully explained, would have satisfied the persons concerned. It should be remembered, that, though the apostles were infallibly preserved from mistaking, corrupting, or mutilating the doctrine, which they were entrusted to communicate to the church; yet they were not rendered infallible in their personal conduct: in many things, they acknowledged, and it is evident, they all offended, and were to be blamed. Gal. 2:6—10. Perhaps it would be found very difficult wholly to defend the apostle from the charge of temporizing, accommodating, or refining too much in this matter. His deference to the judgment of his brethren, his desire of 'becoming all things to all men,' and his willingness to conciliate the Jewish believers, seem to have carried him rather too far: and he was led to hold out a greater degree of regard to the Mosaic law, than he showed in his general conduct. The concession, however, by no means answered the intended purpose; on the contrary, it was the immediate occasion of his predicted sufferings.—'To be "at charges" with Nazarites was both a common and a very popular thing among the Jews. . . . Maimonides. . . asserts, that a person who was not himself a Nazarite, might bind himself by a vow to take part with one in his sacrifice.' Doddr.—This, however, not being mentioned in the law, was rather complying with custom and tradition, than showing a regard for the ceremonies of Moses.—'James and the brethren thought it was most regular and convenient, that the Jewish ritual should still be observed, by those of the circumcision who believed in Christ. And, considering what tribulation the church at Jerusalem must otherwise have been exposed to by the Sanhedrim, who no doubt would have prosecuted them to the utmost, as apostates; and also how soon Providence intended to render the practice of it impossible; . . . it was certainly the most orderly and prudent conduct to conform to it; though it were looked upon by those, that understood the matter fully, (which it was not necessary that all should,) as antiquated and ready to vanish away.' Ibid.—The Jewish Christians at Jerusalem, and in Judea, might comply with the law far more easily and exactly, than their brethren could in other countries, who were joined in the same churches with the Gentile converts.—Does not the epistle to the Hebrews, probably written by the 25 As touching the Gentiles which believe, we have written and concluded, that they observe no such thing, save only that they keep themselves from things offered to idols, and from blood, and from strangled, and from fornication.

26 Then Paul took the men; and the next day purifying himself with them, entered into the temple, to signify the accomplishment of the days of purification, until that an offering should be offered for every one of them.

27 ¶ And when the seven days were almost ended, the Jews which were of Asia, when they saw him in the temple, stirred up all the people, and laid hands on him,

28 Crying out, Men of Israel, help: this is the man that teacheth all men everywhere against the people, and the law, and this place; and further, brought Greeks also into the temple, and hath polluted this holy place.

29 (For they had seen before with him, in the city, Trophimus an Ephesian, whom they supposed that Paul had brought into the temple.)

30 And all the city was moved, and the people ran together: and they took Paul, and drew him out of the temple: and forthwith the doors were shut.

31 And as they went about to kill him, tidings came unto the chief captain of the band, that all Jerusalem was in an uproar:

would not be persuaded not to go to Jerusalem, yet, when he was there, he was persuaded to do as they there did, v. 26. Then Paul took the men, as they advised, and the very next day, purifying himself with them, and not with multitude or tumult, as he himself pleads, ch. 24: 18. he entered into the temple, as other devout Jews that came on such errands did, to signify the accomplishment of the days of purification to the priests; desiring the priest would appoint a time when the offering should be offered for every one of them, one for each. Paul contributed what he vowed to the offerings of these Nazarites; and, some think, bound himself to the law of the Nazariteship, and to an attendance at the temple, with fastings and prayers for seven days, not designing that the offering should be offered till then; which was that he signified to the priest.

Now it has been questioned, whether James and the elders did well to give Paul this advice, and whether he did well to take it.

1. Some have blamed this occasional conformity of Paul's, as indulging the Jews too much in their adherence to the ceremonial law, and a discouragement of those who stood fast in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free.

2. Others think the advice was prudent and good, and Paul's following it was justifiable enough, as the case stood. It was Paul's avowed principle, To the Jews became I as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews, 1 Cor. 9:20. He had circumcised Timothy, to please the Jews; though he would not constantly observe the ceremonial law, yet, to gain an opportunity of doing good, and to show how far he could comply, he would occasionally go to the temple and join in the sacrifices there. Those that are weak in the faith are to be borne with, when those that undermine the faith must be opposed. It is true, this compliance of Paul's sped ill to him; for this very thing, by which he hoped to pacify the Jews, did but provoke them, and bring him into trouble, yet that is not a sufficient ground to go on in condemning it; Paul might do well, and yet suffer for it, but perhaps the wise God overruled both their advice and Paul's compliance with it, to serve a better purpose than was intended; for we have reason to think, that when the believing Jews, who had endeavored by their zeal for the law to recommend themselves to the good opinion of those who believed not, saw how barbarously they used Paul, (who endeavored to oblige them,) they were by this more alienated from the ceremonial law, than they could have been by the most argumentative or affecting discourses. They saw it was in vain to think of pleasing men that would be pleased with nothing else but the rooting out of Christianity. Integrity and uprightness will be more likely to preserve us, than sneaking compliances. And when we consider what a great trouble it must needs be to James and the presbyters in the reflection upon it, that they had by their advice brought Paul into trouble, it should be a warning to us, not to press men to oblige us by doing anything contrary to their own mind.

V. 27—40. We have here Paul brought into a captivity, which we are not likely to see the end of: for, after this, he is either hurried from one bar to another, or lies neglected, first in one prison, and then in another, and can neither be tried nor bailed. When we see the beginning of a trouble, we know not either how long it will last, or how it will issue.

I. Paul seized,

1. He was seized in the temple; it was not till the seven days were almost ended, that he was noticed by those that had an evil eye toward him, so great a stranger was he there. But, in the temple, where he should have been protected as in a sanctuary, he was most violently set upon by those who did what they could to have mingled his blood with his sacrifices; in the temple, where he should have been welcomed as one of the greatest ornaments it ever had, since the Lord of the temple left it. The temple which they themselves pretended such a mighty zeal for, yet did they themselves thus profane. Thus is the church polluted by none more than by popish persecutors, under the color of the church's name and interest.

2. The informers against him were Jews of Asia, not of Jerusalem, Jews of the dispersion, who knew him best, and were most exasperated against him. Those who seldom came up to Jerusalem themselves, but contentedly lived at a distance, in pursuit of their private advantages, yet appeared most zealous for the temple, as if thereby they would atone for their habitual neglect of it.

3. The method they took, was, to raise the mob, and to incense them against him. They did not go to the high priest, or the magistrates of the city, with their charge, but they stirred up all the people, who were at this time more than ever disposed to anything tumultuous and seditious. Those are fittest to be employed against Christ and Christianity, that are governed least by reason, and most by passion; therefore Paul described the Jewish persecutors to be not only wicked, but absurd, unreasonable men.

4. The arguments wherewith they exasperated the people against him were popular, but very false and unjust. Men of Israel, help. If ye are true-born Jews, that have a concern for your church and your country, now is your time to show it, by helping to seize an enemy to both. The enemies of Christianity, since they could never prove it to be an ill thing, have been always very industrious, right or wrong, to put it into an ill name, and so run it down by outrage and outcry. This was like, Stop thief, Job 30:5. or Athaliah's cry, Treason, treason; what is wanting in right, is made up in noise.

5. They charge on him both ill doctrine and ill practice, and both against the Mosaic ritual. (1.) Ill doctrine; not only that he holds corrupt opinions himself, but that he vents and publishes them, though not here at Jerusalem, yet in other places, nay, in all places, he teaches all men, everywhere; so artfully is the crime aggravated, as if, because he was an itinerant, he was an ubiquitous. [1.] Against the people of the Jews. He had taught that Jews and Gentiles stand on the same level before God, and neither circumcision avails anything, nor uncircumcision; nay, he had taught against the unbelieving Jews, that they were rejected, and this is interpreted to be speaking against the whole nation, as if no doubt but they were the people, and wisdom must die with them, Job 12:2. whereas God, though He had cast them off, yet had not cast away his people, Rom. 11:1. Those commonly seem most jealous for the church's name, that belong to it in name only. [2.] Against the law. His teaching men to believe the Gospel as the end of the law, and the perfection of it, was interpreted his preaching against the law; whereas it was so far from making void the law that it established it, Rom. 3:31. [3.] Against this place, the temple. Because he taught men to pray everywhere, he was reproached as an enemy to the temple, and perhaps because he sometimes mentioned the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, and of the Jewish nation, which his Master had foretold.

(2.) Ill practices. To confirm their charge against him, as teaching people against this holy place, they charge it on him, that he had himself polluted it, and by an overt act showed his contempt of it, and a design to make it common. He has brought Gentiles also into the temple; into the inner court, into which none uncircumcised were admitted, under any pretence; there was written on the wall that inclosed this inner court, in Greek and Latin, It is a capital crime for strangers to apostle when a prisoner at Rome, show, that he thought it of great importance, even to the Christians in Judea, to understand that the Mosaic law had no longer any validity; and that he considered their attachment to it, as exceedingly unfavorable to their proficiency in true religion? Pref. to Heb.

(24.) Purify. 'Abstain from wine, and other things forbidden to Nazarites.'

(26.) 'Paul, it seems, so fixed the period (Num. 6:5.) of his vow, that it should cease at the same time with that of these 4 men.' Bl. See Grot. and Kuin. on this v. 'On the following day, Paul began to observe the religious rites which they did who were bound to a vow, giving notice to the priests at the temple, that he takes upon himself an obligation to abstinence, prayer, &c. for 7 days.' So Bl., whom see. Ed.

V. 27—30. As the apostle could not enter on his purification, till the 3d day after his arrival at Jerusalem, 17, 18, 26. and as he made his defence before Felix, (which seems to have been 7 or 8 days after he was apprehended in the temple,) only 12 days after he came to Jerusalem; (Note, 24:10—21.) the first clause should certainly be rendered, 'when the 7 days were about to be accomplished;' i. e. the 7 days which had been fixed on, and mentioned to the priests, as the term at the end of which the sacrifices would be offered, and the vow performed. Scott.

(28.) Against. The Jews conceived themselves injured, because others were admitted to the benefits of Messiah's kingdom. How much of this satirical envy is still seen in nations and in individuals! Ed.

(29.) Supposed, &c. 'This should seem to have been merely the fancy of the vulgar. The more intelligent would (I think) understand the reproach in a figurative sense.'

V. 31—36. It has been asserted, that the Jews claimed the liberty of 32 Who immediately took soldiers and centurions, and ran down unto them: and when they saw the chief captain and the soldiers, they left beating of Paul.

33 Then the chief captain came near, and took him, and commanded him to be bound with two chains; and demanded who he was, and what he had done.

34 And some cried one thing, some another, among the multitude: and when he could not know the certainty for the tumult, he commanded him to be carried into the castle.

35 And when he came upon the stairs, so it was, that he was borne of the soldiers, for the violence of the people.

36 For the multitude of the people followed after, crying, Away with him!

37 ¶ And as Paul was to be led into the castle, he said unto the chief captain, May I speak unto thee? Who said, Canst thou speak Greek?

38 Art not thou that Egyptian, which before these days madest an uproar, and leddest out into the wilderness four thousand men that were murderers?

vnter, Jos. Antiq. lib. 15. cap. 14. Paul was himself a Jew, and had a right to enter; and they, seeing some with him there, concluded Trophimus an Ephesian, who was a Gentile, was one. Why? Did they see him there? Truly no; but they had seen him with Paul in the streets of the city, therefore they affirm he was with him in the inner court of the temple. See here, Innocency is no fence against calumny and false accusation. Evil men dig up mischief, and go far to seek proofs of their false accusations, as they did here, who, because they saw a Gentile with Paul in the city, will thence infer, that he was with him in the temple! It is common for malicious people to improve that against those that are wise and good, with which they thought to have obliged them, and ingratiated themselves with them. Paul thought to recommend himself to their good opinion by going into the temple, and thence they take occasion to accuse him. If he had kept further off them, he had not been so maligned by them. This is the genius of ill-nature; for my love, they are my adversaries, Ps. 109:4. 69:10.

II. Paul in danger of being pulled in pieces by the rabble. They will not be at the pains to have him before the high priest, or the Sanhedrim; that is a round-about way, the execution shall be of a piece with the prosecution, all unjust and irregular. They have not patience to proceed against him by a due course of law, though they were ever so sure to gain their point; therefore, as those who neither feared God nor regarded man, they resolved to knock him on the head immediately.

1. All the city was in an uproar, v. 30. Just such a zeal the Jews here show for God's temple, as the Ephesians did for Diana's, when Paul was informed against as an enemy to that, ch. 19:29. But God does not reckon Himself at all honored by those whose zeal for Him transports them to such irregularities, and who, while they pretend to act for Him, act in such a brutish, barbarous manner.

2. They drew Paul out of the temple, and shut the doors between the outer and inner court, or, perhaps, of the outer court. See how absurd these were; they condemned Paul for drawing people from the temple, and yet when he himself was very devoutly worshipping in the temple, they drew him out of it. They that made no conscience of doing so ill a thing, as the murdering of a good man for well doing, yet would be thought to scruple doing it in a holy place, or at a holy time; not in the temple, as, not on the feast day.

3. They went about to kill him, v. 31. for they fell a beating him, v. 32. resolving to beat him to death: a punishment which the Jewish doctors allowed of in some cases,* (not at all to the credit of their nation,) and called, the beating of the rebels.

III. Paul rescued from his Jewish enemies by a Roman enemy.

1. Tidings were brought of the tumult, and mob, to the chief captain of the band, the governor of the castle, or, whoever he was, the now commander-in-chief of the Roman forces, quartered in Jerusalem; and he is the man that must be instrumental to save Paul's life, when never a friend he had was capable of doing him any service.

2. The tribune, or chief captain, got his forces together with all possible expedition, and went to suppress the mob. Now at the feast, as at other such solemn times, the guards were up, and the militia more within call than at other times, and so he had them near at hand, and he ran down unto the multitude; for at such times, delays are dangerous. Sedition must be crushed at first, lest it grow headstrong.

3. The very sight of the Roman general frightened them from beating Paul; they were deterred from that by the power of the Romans, from which they ought to have been restrained by the justice of God and the dread of his wrath. Note, God often makes (Rev. 12:16.) those to be a protection to his people, who yet have no affection for them; they have only a compassion for sufferers, and are zealous for the public peace.

4. The governor takes him into custody; he rescued him, not out of a concern for him, but because he knew how dangerous the consequence to the Roman government, if such tumultuous proceedings were not timely suppressed; nor what such an outrageous people might do, if once they knew their own strength; he therefore takes Paul out of the hands of the mob, into the hands of the law, v. 33. This violent taking of him out of the hands of the multitude, though there were all the reason in the world for it, yet they laid to the charge of the chief captain as his crime, ch. 24:7. which refers to this rescue, as appears by comparing ch. 23:27, 28. where the chief captain gives an account of it to Felix.

IV. The provision the chief captain made, with much ado, to bring Paul to speak for himself; one had almost as good enter into a struggle with the winds and the waves, as with such a mob as was here got together; yet Paul made a shift to get liberty of speech among them.

1. There was no knowing the sense of the people; for when the chief captain inquired concerning Paul, having perhaps never heard of his name before, some cried one thing, and some another, so that it was impossible for the chief captain to know their mind, when really they knew not either one another's mind or their own, when every one pretended to give the sense of the whole body. Those that will hearken to the clamors of the multitude, will know nothing for a certainty.

2. There was no quelling their rage and fury; for when the chief captain commanded that Paul should be carried into the castle, the tower of Antonia, where the Roman soldiers kept garrison, near the temple, the soldiers themselves had much ado to get him safe thither out of the noise; the people were so violent, v. 35. the soldiers were forced to take him up in their arms, and carry him, to keep him from the people, who would have pulled him limb from limb, if they could. When they could not reach him with their cruel hands, they followed him with their sharp arrows, even bitter words; they followed, crying, Away with him, v. 36. See how the most excellent persons and things are often run down by a popular clamor! Christ Himself was so, with, Crucify Him, Crucify Him; though they could not say what evil He had done.

3. Paul at length begged leave of the chief captain to speak to him, v. 37. With great calmness, composedness, mildness, and deference, he said unto the chief captain, 'May I putting to death, without any legal process, such uncircumcised persons as entered the inner courts of the temple: yet even this could not be applicable to Paul.

(34.) Castle.] 'Parembolôn: lit. pitching place, hence generally it means a camp; and many, as Schl., understand the soldiers' barracks (Jos. speaks of) in the castle of Antonia, commanded by the tribune. But Beza, De Dien, &c., Heum., Kuin. take it for the castle itself: which, says Jos. "had 4 towers, one of which overlooked the whole temple, and was joined to its porticoes, and had a double pair of stairs from it, by which the soldiers of the garrison in the castle were used to come down with their arms on the festival days, and keep the people in quiet. As the temple was a guard to the city, so was this castle to the temple." But as the principal entrance, (which, as the tower was 40 cubits high, would also have steps,) would not be through the temple, and as the priests and Levites probably would not have permitted this violence in any part of the temple, the steps of that principal entrance seem meant. The S. E. angle of the citadel joined the N. W. angle of the temple, just so as to allow 2 approaches to the court of the Gentiles, from the citadel, by 2 flights of steps, one leading to the N. E. portico of the temple, the other to the S. W. one. The whole citadel occupied not much less space than the temple.

V. 37—40. (33) Four thousand, &c.] Josephus mentions 30,000 men, whom this Egyptian, (whose name is not known,) had collected together: but it is probable, that he 'led forth' only 4000, and that the rest came to him in the wilderness; or only 4000 of the company were murderers. [The captain's assertion, as to their number and character, is to be understood popularly, not exactly. Ed.] (40) In the Hebrew tongue.] 22:2. See on 2:6.—It is decidedly agreed among the learned, that the Syr. or Chal. dialect is meant. No doubt many Chal. words and phrases came into use among the Jews, who returned from the Babylonish captivity. Yet those parts of the O. T. which were written after that event, are in Heb., except a few passages in Ezra, which are Chal., for special reasons. This creates a difficulty, as to the current opinion, taken in its full extent. Nor does the language of the N. T. favor it: and several of the arguments used in support of it, are inconclusive. 'Sikariôn: cut-throats; the word was derived from sika [comp. sikeen, Gaelic, and Arabic], a short falchion, or cutlass, (as I suspect of Oriental origin, and like the kriesh of the Burmans, Siamese, Chinese, and Japanese,) which was convenient for being concealed hupo malês, under the thigh, the sheath of the weapon closely bound against the flesh, and inflicted a much more severe wound than a sword or dagger. These sicarii were at first private assassins (and not very different from those from whom the name is derived); afterwards they, by impunity, rose to such a pitch [of insolence] as to insult the government, and band together in large companies: so that at length the name was applied

4. The chief captain tells him what notion he had of him; Canst thou speak Greek? I am surprised to hear thee speak a learned language; for, Art not thou that Egyptian which madest an uproar? Probably some of the Jews whispered this in the ear of the chief captain. See what false, mistaken notions of good people, and good ministers, many run away with, and will not be at the pains to have the mistake rectified!

It seems, there had lately been an insurrection somewhere in that country, headed by an Egyptian, who took on him to be a prophet; Jos. mentions this story: 'That an Egyptian raised a seditious party, promised to show them the fall of the walls of Jerusalem from the mount of Olives, and that they should enter the city upon the ruins.' The captain here says, that he led out into the wilderness 4,000 murderers, desperadoes, banditti, raparees, cut-throats. What a degeneracy in the Jewish nation, when so many of such a character, were found, and could be drawn into such an attempt on the public peace! But Jos. says, 'That Felix, the Roman president, went out against them, killed 400, and took 200 prisoners, and the rest were dispersed.' Antiq. 20: 6. De Bell. Jud. 2: 12. And Eusebius speaks of it, Hist. 2: 20. It happened in the 13th year of Claudius, a little before those days, about 3 years. The ringleader of this rebellion, it seems, had made his escape, and the chief captain concluded, that one who lay under so great an odium, as Paul seemed to lie under, and against whom there was so great an outcry, could not be a criminal of less figure than this Egyptian. See how good men are exposed to ill-will by mistake!

5. Paul rectifies his mistake concerning him, by informing him particularly what he was; not such a vagabond, scoundrel, rake, as that Egyptian, who could give no good account of himself, v. 39.

6. He humbly desired permission from the chief captain, whose prisoner he now was, to speak to the people. The chief captain rescued him with no other design than to give him a fair hearing; now, to show that his cause needs no art to give it a plausible color, he desires he may have leave immediately to defend himself; for it needed no more than to be set in a true light; nor did he depend only on the goodness of his cause, but on the goodness and fidelity of his Patron, and his promise to all his advocates, that it should be given them in that same hour what to speak. Lastly, This license being obtained, the people were attentive; Paul stood on the stairs, which gave a little man some advantage; he made signs to them to be quiet, and to have a little patience, for he had something to say to them; and so far he gained his point, every one cried hush to his neighbor; probably the chief captain also charged all to keep silence; if the people were not required to give audience, it was to no purpose Paul was allowed to speak. When the cause of Christ and his Gospel is to be pleaded, there ought to be a great silence, that we may give the more earnest heed; and all little enough. Paul spake in Hebrew, i. e. in the language of their country, to which he hereby owned not only an abiding relation, but an abiding respect.

PRACT. OBS. Wherever zealous Christians travel, they will inquire after their brethren in the Lord, and get acquainted with them: fervent social prayer, abates the poignancy of our sorrow, when constrained to separate from those whom we love; and this is peculiarly reasonable, when sharp afflictions or important services lie before us. Our children too should be admitted to such scenes of affection and devotion: that their tender minds may be early impressed with a sense of the excellence and importance of religion. Thus we may hope, that when they grow up, they will be evidently partakers of the blessing, and endued with spiritual gifts, for the edification of others also; which should be considered as the greatest favor God can bestow on us, with respect to our offspring.—The path of duty will eventually be that of safety: yet it often leads into many apparent, or temporary dangers and difficulties. It is, however, an extraordinary attainment, for the same man to be so firm and inflexible, in following the dictates of his own conscience, as to be habitually ready to endure bonds, or face death for the Lord's sake; and yet so full of tenderness and sympathy, as to be more affected by the sorrows of his friends, than by the prospect of his own perils and sufferings. What a striking proof is it of the weakness and depravity of human nature, that so large a proportion of the disciples of Christ, even in the days of the apostles, were exceedingly disaffected to the most eminent minister, probably, who ever lived!... because he would not render that respect to the antiquated Mosaic ceremonial, with which they had been used to regard it! How wretched should we be against prejudices of every kind; and against those misrepresentations of men's principles and conduct, from which prejudices commonly originate! And how patient should we be, if called to have fellowship with the great apostle of us Gentiles in this affliction; and to endure the suspicious, and coldness, of those whom we most esteem and love! We ought indeed to use all proper methods of rectifying the judgments and conciliating the affections of our brethren, as far as their misapprehension can interfere with our usefulness; yet we should watch against the temptation of conniving at those errors or evils, which are the general source of prejudices, and which cannot consistently be countenanced. When accommodation is allowed to infringe on our 'simplicity and godly sincerity,' it will seldom produce any good effect. Our brethren will not be satisfied, unless we go the full length of their sentiments; others will begin to suspect our integrity, and to hesitate concerning us; and it is in vain to attempt conciliating the favor of graceless bigots, and furious zealots of any party, from whom we shall commonly do well to keep at a distance. But much wisdom, integrity, and humility are requisite, to guide us in the middle way, between an uncomplimentary inflexibility in things of small consequence, and a temporizing spirit in respect of important truth. Professed attachments to this or the other party or church, among Christians, will readily give energy to the clamor, 'Men of Israel, help, &c.' The church is in danger! Our religious liberties are in danger! And the groundless outcry may affect even the lives or characters, even of the most prudent, benevolent, and pious servants of our God!

CHAP. XXII. In the close of the foregoing ch. we had Paul bound, according to Agabus' prophecy, yet he had his tongue set at liberty, by the chief captain's permission: and so intent he is on using that liberty, to the honor of Christ and the service of his interest, that he forgets the bonds he is in, not mentioning them, but speaks of the great things Christ had done for him, with as much ease and cheerfulness as if nothing had happened to ruffle him.

V. 1, 2. Never was poor man set upon in a more tumultuous manner, nor with more rage and fury; yet,

1. There appears no fright, but his mind is sedate, and admirably composed! Thus he makes his own words good, None of these things move me; and David's, Ps. 3: 6.

2. There appears no passion, no angry expressions; though the suggestions against him were all frivolous and unjust, though it would have vexed any man alive, to be charged with profaning the temple, just then when he was contriving and designing to show his respect to it, yet he is led as a lamb to the slaughter.

3. What respectful titles he gives even to those who thus abused him, and how humbly he craves their attention, v. 1. Thus he lets them know he was one of them, and had not renounced his relation to the Jewish nation, but still had a kindness and concern for it. Though we must not give flattering titles to any, yet we ought to give their titles of due respect to all; and those we would do good to, we should endeavor not to provoke. Observe, he does not recriminate, but makes a just and reasonable request; for no man has justice done him if his answer to an accusation be not patiently and impartially heard.

4. He spake in Heb., i. e. the vulgar language of the Jews, at this time, not the pure O. T. Heb., but the Syriac, a dialect of the Heb., or rather a corruption of it, as the Italian of the Latin: though he had conversed so much with the Gentiles, yet he still retained the Jews' language, and could talk it with ease; by this it appears he is a Jew. Besides, that was the language every body spake, and to speak in it was indeed to appeal to the people, by which he might have somewhat to insinuate into their affections; then they kept the more silence.

V. 3—21. Paul here gives them to understand, and therefore not likely to derogate from the national honor.

2. He was born in a creditable, reputable place, in Tarsus, a city of Cilicia; and not in servitude, as some of the Jews of the dispersion, it is likely, were; but a freeman, a gentleman, and perhaps could produce his certificate of his freedom in that ancient and honorable city: a small matter indeed to boast of, yet needful to be mentioned at this time to those who insolently trampled on him, as if he were to be ranked with the children of fools, yea, of base men, Job 30:8.

3. That he had a learned and liberal education; was not only a Jew, and a gentleman, but a scholar; brought up in Jerusalem, the principal seat of the Jewish learning, and at the feet of Gamaliel, whom they all knew to be an eminent doctor of the Jewish law, of which Paul was designed to be himself a teacher; therefore, he could not be ignorant of their law, nor be thought to slight it because he did not know it; his parents had brought him very young to this city, designing him for a Pharisee; and some think his being brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, intimates, not only that he was one of his pupils, but that he was, above any other, diligent and constant in attending his lectures, observant of him, and obseand evidently to be taken figuratively, however.' Bloomf. So in the E. it is said, 'He had his holiness at the feet of the gooroo, or his learning at the feet of the philosopher.' It is only used of great saints or teachers. So Rob. At first, disciples seem to have sat on the ground before their teachers, who were in a seat or chair. Afterwards, the eldest sat on pulpits, or arm-chairs, the next in dignity on chairs or stools, the novitiates or youngest on mats upon the ground. Vitr. says, disciples stood before their teachers. See Wetst. Ed.

V. 6-13. It is evident, the apostle considered his extraordinary conquious to him, in all he said, as Mary, that sat at Jesus feet, and heard his word.

4. That he was, in his early days, a very forward and eminent professor of the Jews' religion, his studies and learning were all directed that way. So far was he from being principled in his youth with any disaffection to the religious usages of the Jews, there was not a young man among them had a greater or more entire veneration for them than he had, was more strict in observing them himself, nor more hot in enforcing them on others. What departures he had made from the law, were not owing to any confused or mistaken notions of it, for he understood it to a nicety,—according to the most accurate and exact method; and, to make it more strict than it was, added to it the traditions of the elders, the law of the fathers, the law given to them, and so handed down to us. Paul had as great a value for antiquity and tradition, as any of them had. And he was as much a zealot as any Rabbim; he was zealous against everything the law prohibited, and for everything the law enjoined; and this was zeal toward God, because he thought it was for the honor of God, and the service of his interests; and here he compliments his hearers with a candid and charitable opinion of them, that they all were this day zealous toward God; he bears them record, Rom. 10:2.

II. What a fiery, furious persecutor he had been of the Christian religion, in the beginning of his time, v. 4, 5. He mentions this, to make it the more plainly and evidently to appear, that the change wrought on him, when he was converted, was purely the effect of a divine power; for he was so far from having any previous inclinations to it, or favorable opinions of it, that immediately before that sudden change in him, he had the utmost antipathy imaginable to Christianity, and was filled with rage against it, to the last degree! Perhaps he mentions it, to justify God in his present trouble, who permitted it, for time was when he was a persecutor; and he may have a further view in it, to invite and encourage those people to repent, for he himself yet obtained mercy.

Let us view Paul's picture of himself when a persecutor. 1. He hated Christianity with a mortal enmity; I persecuted this way unto the death, those that walked in this way, 9:1. 26:10. nay, the way itself, Christianity, which was branded as a by-way, a sect: he persecuted it to the death, i. e. he could have been willing himself to die in his opposition to Christianity, so some; he would contentedly have lost his life, thinking it well laid out, in defence of the laws and traditions of the fathers. 2. He did all he could to frighten people from this way, and out of it, by binding and delivering them into prisons; now he himself was bound, he lays a particular stress on this part of his charge against himself; he likewise reflects, with a special regret, that he had imprisoned, not only the men, but the weaker sex, who ought to be treated with particular tenderness and compassion. 3. He was employed by the great Sanhedrim, the high priest, and all the estate of the elders, as an agent for them, in suppressing this new sect; so much had he already signalized himself for his zeal against it! v. 5. 'Such an one,' says Paul, 'I was at first, just such as you now are. I know the heart of a persecutor, and therefore pity you, and pray that you may know the heart of a convert, as God soon made me to do.'

III. The manner of his conversion; it was not from any natural or external causes; nor from discontent in the Jewish church, much less from covetousness, or ambition, or any hope of mending his fortune, for it was to expose himself to all manner of disgrace and trouble; nor had he any conversation with the apostles or any other Christians, by whose subtlety and sophistry he might be thought to have been wheedled into this change; no, it was the Lord's doing, and the circumstances of the doing of it were enough to justify him in the change, to all those who believe there is a supernatural power; and none can condemn him for it, without reflecting on that divine energy by which he was herein overruled. More particularly, version, as a most complete demonstration of the truth of Christianity: and when all the particulars of his case are properly considered; it must convince every candid and impartial person, that no rational account can be given of this change, except that which he himself assigns; and if that be true, Christianity is divine. Scott.

1. He was as fully bent on persecuting the Christians just before Christ arrested him, as ever, v. 6. and had no other thought than to execute the cruel design he was sent upon. 2. A light from heaven first startled him. Had it shone in upon him into some private room, there might have been a cheat in it, but it shone upon him in the open road, at high noon, and so strongly, that it struck him to the ground, v. 7. and all that were with him, ch. 26:14. They could not deny but that surely the Lord was in this light. 3. A voice from heaven first began in him awful thoughts of Jesus Christ, whom before he had had nothing but hateful, spiteful thoughts of. By which it appeared, that this Jesus of Nazareth, whom they also were now persecuting, was one that spake from heaven, and they knew it was dangerous resisting one that did so, Heb. 12:25. 4. Lest it should be objected, 'How came this light and voice to work such a change on him, and not on those that journeyed with him?' He observes, that his fellow-travellers saw indeed the light, and were afraid that they should be consumed with fire from heaven, but did not distinctly hear the words; now faith comes by hearing, and therefore that change was now presently wrought on him that heard the words, and heard them directed to himself, which was not wrought on them who only saw the light; and yet it might afterward be wrought on them too. 5. He assures them, that when thus startled, he referred himself entirely to a divine guidance; 'What shall I do, Lord? Let the same voice from heaven, that has stopped me in the wrong way, guide me into the right,' v. 10. And immediately he had directions to go to Damascus, and there he should hear further from Him that spake to him; 'No more needs to be said from heaven, there it shall be told thee, by a man like thyself, in the name of Him that now speaks to thee, all things which are appointed for thee to do.' The extraordinary ways of divine revelation, by visions, and voices, and the appearance of angels, were designed, both in the O. T. and in the New, only to introduce and establish the ordinary method by the Scriptures, and a standing ministry, and therefore were generally superseded when those were settled. See the story of Cornelius. 6. As a demonstration of the greatness of that light which fastened on him, he tells them of the immediate effect it had on his eyesight, v. 11. Those that were with Paul, had not the light so directly darted into their faces, as Paul had into his, therefore were not blinded, as he. Now Paul was thus struck with bodily blindness, to make him sensible of his spiritual blindness, and his mistake concerning himself, when he was alive without the law, Rom. 7:9.

(12.) Ananias. 'A pious man, according to the law, whose acceptance of the Gospel had by no means destroyed his regard to the Mosaeic institutions, and who on that account had an honorable character among all the Jews who dwelt at Damascus.' Dodd.

13 Came unto me, and stood, and said unto me, Brother Saul, receive thy sight. And the same hour I looked up upon him.

16 And now, why tarriest thou? arise, and be baptized, and wash <sup>s</sup> away thy sins, calling <sup>t</sup> on the name of the Lord.

17 And it came to pass, that when I was come again to Jerusalem, even while I prayed in the temple, I was in a <sup>u</sup> trance;

18 And saw <sup>v</sup> him saying unto me, Make haste, and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem: for they will not receive thy testimony concerning me.

IV. How he was confirmed, and further directed. Observe,

1. The character here given of Ananias; he was not prejudiced against the Jewish nation or religion, but if not a Jew by birth, yet had been proselyted to the Jewish religion, therefore is called devout, and thence advanced further to the faith of Christ; he conducted himself so well, that he had a good report of all the Jews at Damascus; this was the first Christian Paul had any friendly communication with, and it was not likely he should instil into him any such notions as they suspected him to have espoused, injurious to the law, or to this holy place.

2. The cure immediately wrought by him on Paul's eyes; which miracle was to confirm Ananias' mission to Paul, and to ratify all that he should afterwards say to him, v. 13. and to assure him that he came to him from Christ.

3. The declaration Ananias makes to him of the peculiar favor the Lord Jesus designed him above any other. (1.) In the present manifestation of Himself to him, v. 14. Ananias' saying, the God of our fathers, intimates, he was himself a Jew by birth, and why he said Brother Saul. Know his will, the will of his precept to be done by thee, the will of his providence to be done concerning thee. He hath chosen thee immediately by the revelation of Christ, Gal. 1:1, 12. Those whom God hath chosen, He hath chosen to know his will, and to do it. That thou shouldest see that Just One, and shouldest hear the voice of his mouth, and so shouldest know his will immediately from Himself, in a particular manner, above others; Christ is here called that Just One; for He is Jesus Christ the righteous, and suffered wrongfully.

(2.) In the after manifestation of Himself by him to others, v. 15. Thou shalt be his witness, not only a monument of his grace, as a pillar may be, but a witness by word of mouth; thou shalt publish his Gospel, as that which thou hast experienced the power of, and been delivered into the mould of; thou shalt be his witness unto all men, Gentiles as well as Jews, of what thou hast seen and heard, now at the very first. And finding Paul so particularly relating the manner of his conversion in his apologies for himself, here, and ch. 26. we have reason to think he frequently made the same narrative in his preaching for the conversion of others; he told them what God had done for his soul, to encourage them to hope that He would do something for theirs.

4. The counsel and encouragement he gave him to join himself to the Lord Jesus by baptism, v. 16. He had in his circumcision been given up to God, but he must now by baptism be given up to God in Christ; must embrace the Christian religion and the privileges of it, in submission to the precepts of it. This must now be done immediately on his conversion, and so was added to his circumcision; but to the seed of the faithful it comes in the room of it; for it is, as that was to Abraham and his believing seed, a seal of the righteousness which is by faith. The great gospel-privilege, which by baptism we have sealed to us, is the remission of sins; and the great gospel-duty we are bound to by it, is, to call on the name of the Lord, the Lord Jesus; to acknowledge Him to be our Lord and our God, and to apply ourselves to Him accordingly. To call on the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, is the periphrasis of a Christian, 1 Cor. 1:2. We must wash away our sins, calling on the name of the Lord; i. e. we must seek for the pardon of our sins in Christ's name, and in dependence on Him and his righteousness. We must do this quickly. Why tarriest thou? The case is so plain, it is needless to deliberate; the hazard so great, it is folly to delay.

V. How he was commissioned to go and preach the Gospel to the Gentiles. This was the great thing they were so angry at him for, therefore it was requisite he should for this, in a special manner, produce a divine warrant; and here he does it. This commission he did not receive presently on his conversion, for this was at Jerusalem, whither he did not go till three years after, or more, Gal. 1:18. and whether it was then, or afterward, that he had this vision here spoken of, we are not certain. But, to reconcile them, if possible, to his preaching the Gospel among the Gentiles, he tells them,

1. That he received his orders to do it when at prayer, and (a circumstance that would have some weight with those he was now speaking to) at prayer in the temple, which was an evidence, contrary to their malicious suggestion, that he had a veneration for the temple, though he did not make an idol of it, as they did; as also that the sending him to the Gentiles would be no prejudice to the temple, unless the Jews by their infidelity made it so.

2. He received it in a vision, he fell into a trance, v. 17. his external senses, for the present, locked up. In this trance he saw Jesus Christ, not with the eyes of his body, as at his conversion, but represented to the eyes of his mind, v. 18. Our eye must be on Christ, when receiving the law from his mouth; and we must not only hear Him speaking, but see Him speaking to us.

3. Before Christ gave him a commission to go to the Gentiles, He told him, it was to no purpose for him to think of doing any good at Jerusalem. As God knows before who will receive the Gospel, so He knows who will reject it.

4. Paul, notwithstanding this, renews his petition that he might be employed at Jerusalem, because they knew, better than any did, what he had been before his conversion, and therefore must ascribe so great a change in him to the power of almighty grace, and, consequently, give the greater regard to his testimony; thus he reasoned, both with himself, and with the Lord, and thought he reasoned right, v. 19, 20. for they will not impute my preaching Christ to education, or any prepossession in his favor, but will the more readily regard what I say, because they know I have myself been one of them: particularly in Stephen's case. 'No,' says Christ to him, 'they will not; but will be more exasperated against thee as a deserter from, than against others whom they look upon only as strangers to, their constitution.'

5. Paul's petition is overruled, and he has peremptory orders to go among the Gentiles, v. 21. God often gives gracious answers to the prayers of his people, not in the thing itself that they pray for, but in something better. Abraham prays, Oh that Ishmael may live before thee; and God hears him for Isaac. It is God that appoints his laborers both their day and their place, and it is fit they should acquiesce in his appointment; though it may cross their own inclinations. So often does Providence contrive better for us than we for ourselves; to the guidance of that we must therefore refer ourselves. And it might be a mitigation of the offence of this to the Jews, that he did not set up a Gentile church in the neighboring nations; but was sent a vast way off.

Now if they would lay all this together, surely they would see they had no reason to be angry with Paul for preaching among the Gentiles, or construe it an act of ill-will to

V. 14—16. 'Calling on the name of the Lord,' even the Lord Jesus, as the expression generally means, seems to have been one principal part of the required profession of faith in his name. 2:14—21. Joel 2:23—32. 1 Cor. 1:1, 2.—'The inference of Chrysostom from this place (16) is this, that by these words, he shows that Christ was God; because it is not lawful to invoke any but God.' Whitby. The invocation of saints and angels had not, it seems, at that time, (near the end of the fourth century,) received the sanction of the most eminent Christian ministers.—'Washing away thy sins,' is rather connected with 'having called on the name, &c.' than with 'be baptized.' Rom. 10:12—17, v. 12—14. See on 9:14.

(16.) 'Do thy part to be baptized, (by applying for baptism,) and, as much as in thee lies, wash away thy sins.' 'Calling on the name of the Lord,' seems a form of solemn engagement, by which the applicant for baptism invoked the name of the Lord to bear witness to his engagements to forsake sin, and have faith. 'Baptism in the adult, excepting our Lord's peculiar case, was a token of confession and humiliation for sin, (hence called of repentance, Mat. 3:11. Mark 1:4. Luke 3:3. Acts 13:24. 19:4.) and of a desire to be cleansed from it, as the body was by water cleansed from its pollution; and being administered to such professed penitents, by divine appointment, as a token of favorable regard to them, it was a seal of pardon: nor did God ordinarily give any particular person any public and visible token of pardon till he had submitted to baptism; and this may explain in what sense baptism may be said to wash away sins, and elsewhere to save. Comp. 1 Pet. 3:21. See Acts 2:38. and note.' Doddr. See an admirable passage on this subject in Calvin's Inst. L. IV. xv. § 14.

V. 17—21. Doubtless many who heard the apostle, on this occasion, could well remember the facts to which he referred, and attest them to others. He therefore hoped to convince the multitude, that his labors among the Gentiles were not the result of his own choice, as he earnestly desired to have been useful to his countrymen; but at the same time this mission intimated the approaching rejection of the Jewish nation, as well as the calling of the Gentiles into the church.—[Death.] See on 8:1. 'Murder.' 'Rightly; for Stephen was slain, without any precedent sentence of law, by manifest violence, as by robbers; when it was not allowed to the Jews capitally to condemn any one, even according to the laws.' Beza.

SCOTT.

22 ¶ And they gave him audience unto this word, and then lifted up their voices, and said, Away with such a fellow from the earth: for <sup>a</sup>it is not fit that he should live.

23 And as they cried out, and cast off their clothes, and threw dust into the air, 24 The chief captain commanded him to be brought into the castle, and bade that he should be examined by scourging; that he might know wherefore they cried so against him.

25 ¶ And as they bound him with thongs, Paul said unto the centurion that stood by, Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a <sup>b</sup>Roman, and uncondemned?

26 When the centurion heard that, he went and told the chief captain, saying, Take heed what thou doest: for this man is a Roman.

27 Then the chief captain came, and said unto him, Tell me, art thou a Roman? He said, Yea.

28 And the chief captain answered, With a great sum obtained I this freedom. And Paul said, But I was free born.

29 Then straightway they departed from him which should have <sup>c</sup>examined him: and the chief captain also was afraid, after he knew that he was a Roman, and because he had bound him.

his own nation, for he was compelled to it, contrary to his own mind, by an overruling command from heaven.

V. 22—30. Paul was going on, we may suppose, to show how he was afterward, by a special direction of the Holy Ghost at Antioch, separated to this service, how tender he was of the Jews, how respectful to them, and how careful to give them the precedency in all places whither he came, and to unite Jews and Gentiles in one body; and then to show how wonderfully God had owned him, and what good service had been done to the interest of God's kingdom among men in general, without damage to any of the true interests of the Jewish church in particular. But when he speaks of being sent to the Gentiles, they cannot bear it, not so much as to hear the Gentiles named, such an enmity had they to them, and such a jealousy of them.

1. They interrupted him, by lifting up their voice, to put him into confusion, and that nobody might hear a word he said. Galled consciences kick at the least touch; and those who are resolved not to be ruled by reason, commonly resolve not to hear it, if they can help it. And the spirit of enmity against the Gospel of Christ commonly shows itself in silencing the ministers of Christ, as the Jews did Paul here. See Is. 30:10. 2 Chr. 25:16.

2. They clamored against him as one unworthy of life, much more of liberty; 'Away with such a fellow as this from the earth, who pretends to have a commission to preach to the Gentiles; why, it is not fit that he should live.' Thus the men that have been the greatest blessings of their age, have been represented not only as the burdens of the earth, but the plague of their generation. See what different sentiments God and men have of good men, and yet they both agree in this, that they are not likely to live long in this world. Heb. 11:38. Rev. 11:10.

3. They went stark mad against Paul, and against the chief captain for not killing him immediately, at their request, v. 23. they cried out like roaring lions or raging bears, howled like the evening wolves; they cast off their clothes with fury and violence, as much as to say, that thus they would tear him if they could but come at him. Or rather, they thus showed how ready they were to stone him; they that stoned Stephen, threw off their clothes, v. 20. Or, they rent their clothes, as if he had spoken blasphemy; and threw dust into the air, in detestation of it. What they intended, was, to make the chief captain sensible how much they were enraged and exasperated at Paul, so that he could not do anything to gratify them more than to let them have their will against him.

4. The chief captain took care for his safety, by ordering him to be brought into the castle, v. 24. A prison sometimes has been a protection to good men from popular rage.* God raised up one that took care of Paul, when none of his friends durst appear on his behalf. Grant not, O Lord, the desire of the wicked.

5. He ordered him the torture, bade that he should be examined by scourging, (as now [to their disgrace] in some countries, by the rack,) that he might know wherefore they cried so against him. Herein he did not proceed fairly; he should have singled out some of the clamorous, tumultuous complainants, and have examined them, [never however by torture, which takes the prisoner's crime for granted,] what they had to lay to the charge of a man that could give so good an account of himself, and did not appear to have done anything worthy of death or of bonds. It was proper to ask them, but not at all proper to ask Paul, wherefore they cried so against him. No man is [in law] bound to accuse himself, though guilty, much less, when innocent. Surely the chief captain did not know the Jewish nation, when he concluded, he must needs have done something very ill, whom they cried out against. Had they not just thus cried against our Lord Jesus, Crucify Him, crucify Him, when they had not one word to say in answer to the judge's question, Why, what evil has He done? Is this a fair or just occasion to scourge Paul, that a rude tumultuous mob cry out against him, but cannot tell why or wherefore, and therefore he must be forced to tell?

6. Paul pleaded his privilege as a Roman citizen, by which he was exempted from all trials and punishments of this nature, v. 25. As they bound him with thongs, or leather bands, to the whipping-post, he made no outcry against the injustice of their proceedings, but very mildly let them understand the illegality of them against him as a citizen of Rome; he had done this once before at Philippi, after he had been scourged, ch. 16:37. but here he makes use of it for prevention. The manner of his speaking, plainly speaks what a holy security and serenity of mind this good man enjoyed, not disturbed with anger or fear in the midst of all the indignities done him, and the danger he was in. The Romans had a law, lex Sempronia, that if any magistrate did chastise or condemn a freeman of Rome, without hearing him speak for himself, and deliberating on the whole of his case, he should be liable to the sentence of the people, who were very jealous of their liberties. It is indeed the privilege of every man not to have wrong done him, except it be proved he has done wrong; as it is of every Englishman, by Magna Charta, not to be dispossessed of his life or freehold, but by a verdict of 12 men of his peers.

7. The chief captain was surprised at this, and put into a fright; he had taken Paul to be a vagabond Egyptian, and wondered he could speak Greek, ch. 21:37. but is much more surprised, now he finds he is as good a gentleman as himself. How many men of great worth and merit are despised because they are not known! It is a crime, says Cic., to bind a Roman citizen, but an unpardonable one to beat him. Now, (1.) The chief captain would be satisfied of the truth of this from his own mouth, v. 27. perhaps he produced some instrument which proved it; otherwise, they would scarcely have taken his word; [but the pretending it was a capital crime by Roman law, and so not likely to happen.] (2.) The chief captain very freely compares notes with him on this matter, and it appears, that the privilege Paul had as a Roman citizen, was of the two more honorable than the colonel's [tribune's]; for the colonel owns his was purchased; while 'I,' says Paul, 'was free-born.' Some think he became entitled to this freedom by the place of his birth; others rather, by his father or grandfather, for some signal piece of service in the war between Cesar and Antony, rewarded with a freedom of the city; and so Paul came to be free-born. (3.) This put an immediate stop to Paul's trouble, v. 29. Many are restrained from evil practices by the fear of man, who would not be by the fear of God. See here the benefit of human laws and magistracy, and what reason we have to be thankful to God for them; therefore this service we owe to all in authority,—to pray for them, because this benefit we have reason to expect from them, whether we have it or no, as long as we are quiet and peaceable,—to live quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty, 1 Tim. 2:1, 2. (4.) The governor, the next day, brought Paul before the Sanhedrim, v. 30. for he found it to be a matter of religion, and therefore looked upon them to be the most proper judges of it. What he is here said to aim at, is, the gratifying of his own curiosity. He would have known

V. 22. 'They thought, if the Gentiles were ever admitted to the benefits of the Messiah's kingdom, it would only be by previously becoming Jews.'

V. 23. So in Persia aggrieved peasants carry their complaints to their governors (in companies of several hundreds or a thousand) to their prince's gate, where they set themselves to make the most horrid cries, tearing their garments, and throwing dust in the air, [intimating, perhaps, that the obnoxious person ought to be prostrated and buried?] at the same time demanding justice. See Bush's Ill.

V. 24. 'The tribune,' says Bloomf., 'ignorant of Hebrew, and therefore not acquainted with the purport of Paul's speech, thinks, by the rabid fury of the multitude, that he had committed some heinous offence.'

V. 25. He had before mentioned his being a citizen of Tarsus, yet the tribune had not thence inferred, that he was entitled to the privilege of a Roman citizen: so that it is probable, all the citizens of the Roman colonies had not this privilege; or that Tarsus was not a colony. SCOTT.

(25.) That stood by. 'This alludes to the custom of the Romans, to appoint a centurion to superintend the execution of any punishment.'

V. 28. Free born. Doddr. thinks Lardner's arguments unanswerable against Tarsus having been a colony, or what the Romans called a municipium, i. e. a place where all the natives were free by birth; and that, therefore, 'it is much more probable,' that Paul was born free by virtue of his father's, or some of his ancestors' having been rewarded with the honor of Roman citizenship, for some military service: and Ros. hence infers, that Paul 'was of a wealthy family.' Note, 16:37. See Bloomfield.

V. 29. Was afraid. Bloomf. (whom see) thinks Paul's right of Roman citizenship was not of the first class, but the Jus Latii or Jus Coloniae, for he is put in bonds or irons, v. 30. is constantly spoken of as the bound [tr. prisoner], and at 27:42. the centurion, it appears, had the power of death over him: all which are inconsistent with the highest order of Roman citizenship. The centurion, he supposes, was afraid because he had strapped Paul to the whipping-post, v. 25.

- 30 ¶ On the morrow, because he would have known the certainty wherefore he was accused of the Jews, he loosed him from his bands, and commanded the chief priests and all their council to appear, and brought Paul down, and set him before them.

the certainty whereof he was accused of the Jews. Had he sent for Paul to his own chamber, and talked freely with him, he might soon have learned that, and more; but it is too common for great men to affect to set that at a distance from them, which might awaken their consciences, and to desire to have no more of the knowledge of God's ways than may serve them to talk of.

PRACT. OBS. The honor of the Gospel requires its advocates to speak with temper, benevolence, and respect to their superiors; as well as with boldness and constancy, in the midst of all the ill usage, to which they may be exposed.—A simple narration of the Lord's dealings with us, in bringing us from opposing, to profess and promote his Gospel, when it is delivered with modesty and caution, will generally make more impression on the minds of men, than labored arguments or rhetorical declamations.—Natural abilities, the advantages of education, proficiency in learning, exactness in a system, and a fervent, religious zeal according to that system, may be either valuable or mischievous; as they are directed, under the influence of divine grace, in support of the truth, or as employed by men's selfish passions in defence of error. Zeal, especially, is an ambiguous attainment; it may be a violent, cruel, and dreadful flame, kindled from beneath, and destroying all around it with fatal vehemence; or it may be a gentle, active, kind, and heavenly principle, powerfully influencing the possessor to everything excellent and beneficial, in the persevering use of the most unexceptionable means of obtaining the most important ends. Jam. 3:13—16.—Many, who for a time have devoted their talents to the service of delusion and error, have afterwards been induced to consecrate them to the cause of Christ. When a man is thus admitted among the servants of Christ, he is often employed in such services, as disconcert all his own plans and purposes. Not being wholly weaned from 'leaning to his own understanding,' he is sometimes reluctant to renounce his favorite plan, even after he has been

NOTES. CHAP. XXIII. V. 1—5. When the apostle was placed before the Sanhedrim, he steadfastly viewed it, to observe of what persons it now consisted.—The council would have given him credit for that [the first] part of his life: his object therefore, evidently was, to show that he had acted conscientiously, and on good grounds, in those things which they deemed deserving of death. 'Ananias carried it very plausibly towards the citizens, and stood high in their favor: yet he impudently and cruelly defrauded the inferior priests of their legal subsistence, so that some of them even perished for want. And God did remarkably smite him: for after his own house had been reduced to ashes, in a tumult begun by his own son, he was besieged and taken in the royal palace; where, having in vain attempted to hide himself in an old aqueduct, he was dragged out and slain.' Doddridge.—But though the answer of Paul contained a just rebuke, and an evident prediction; yet he seems to have been too much carried away by indignation at the base usage he had experienced: . . . and it seems probable, that the apostle meant to allow, that, in the warmth of his spirit, he had not adverted to the person who had given the orders, or was not aware that he was the high priest. Perhaps the high priest in the Sanhedrim was not always to be known by his seat, or his garments; and Ananias did not fill that office, when Paul had been more intimately conversant with that assembly. But it is not very clear, whether the apostle intended by this concession to waive the question concerning his speaking by 'the Spirit of prophecy,' as not choosing to insist on it; or whether he allowed that he had spoken too sharply, and could not justify the whole of his answer, or propose it to the imitation of others. SCOTT.

(1.) 'Paul intimates, that as he left not the religion of the Jews out of any hardship which it required, or any prejudice against its precepts, he became and continued a Christian, also, out of a full conviction that he was bound in conscience so to be, and to act, and that he still served God from a pure conscience.' Whitby, in Bloomf., who 'cannot consent to [Doddridge's] limitation, which seems abhorrent from simplicity, and (in truth) has something jesuitical about it.' I have lived, &c. 'Paul could not intend, by this, to intimate, that he thought himself free from guilt while persecuting the Christians, since he so expressly declares had removed his cause from the mob; and if his enemies act there against him with less noise, yet it is with more subtlety. Perhaps Paul, when brought before heathen magistrates, thought, if he were before the Sanhedrim, he should be able to deal with them to some good purpose, yet we do not find that he works at all upon them. Here we have,

I. Paul's protestation of his own integrity; he appeared here,

1. With a good courage; when Stephen was brought before them, they thought to have faced him down, ch. 6:15. but could not, such was his holy confidence; and now that Paul was brought before them, he thought to have faced them down, but could not, such was their wicked impudence. However, now was fulfilled in him what God promised to Ezekiel, ch. 3:8, 9.

2. With a good conscience, and that gave him a good courage. Be this thy brazen bulwark of defence. He had always been a man inclined to religion; never lived at large, but, even in his unregenerate state, was, as touching the righteousness in the law, blameless. Even when he persecuted the church of God, he thought he ought to do it, and that he did God service in it. Though his conscience was misinformed, yet he acted according to its dictates. See ch. 26:9. But he seems rather to speak of the time since his conversion; he does not say, 'From my beginning until this day; but, 'All the time in which you have looked upon me as a deserter, an apostate, and an enemy to your church, even to this day, I have lived in all good conscience before God; whatever you may think,' Heb. 13:18. In all he had done toward the setting up of the kingdom of Christ, and the setting of it up among the Gentiles, he had acted conscientiously. See here the character of an honest man; He sets God before him, he makes conscience of what he says and does, and though he may be under some mistakes, yet, according to the best of his knowledge, he abstains from that which is evil, and cleaves to that which is good. He is universally conscientious; and they that are not so, are not at all truly conscientious: whatever changes pass over him, he is still the same, strictly conscientious. And those who thus live in all good conscience before God, may, like Paul here, lift up their face without spot; and if their hearts condemn them not, may have confidence both toward God and man, as Job had when he still held fast his integrity, and Paul himself, whose rejoicing was this, the testimony of his conscience.

II. The outrage Ananias the high priest was guilty of; he commanded the beadle that attended the court, v. 2. to give him a dash on the teeth, with a hand, or with a rod. Our Lord Jesus was thus despitefully used in this court, by one of the servants, John 18:22. as was foretold, Mic. 5:1. 1. The high priest was highly offended at Paul; some think, because he looked so boldly and earnestly at the council, as if he would face them down; others, because he did not address himself particularly to him as president, with some title of honor and respect, but spake freely and familiarly to them all, as men and brethren. His protestation of his integrity was provocation enough to one who was resolved to run him down, and make him odious. When he could charge him with no crime, he thought it crime enough that he asserted his own innopraying for direction respecting the will of God! A person in these circumstances often imagines, that the opposition of unbelievers to religion arises mainly from misinformation; and that if the truth were fairly set before them, they could not resist the evidence of it. Thus he may practically forget, that nothing can reconcile the heart of fallen man to the Gospel, except the special grace of God; and that 'a prophet is not without honor save in his own country;' and that a servant of Christ may expect a more favorable hearing from entire strangers, than from prejudiced neighbors, relatives, and acquaintance; who commonly treat his attempts to convince them, as a usurpation of authority to which he is not entitled.—Bigotry and spiritual pride are commonly connected with furious wrath and intolerant malice; and it is well for mankind, that the power of persecutors is often inadequate to their rage; otherwise they would drive all the servants of Christ out of the earth, as unfit to live upon it. But the Lord mercifully restrains their madness, by subjecting them to more moderate men. For, though many iniquities have been practised by magistrates, not professing any great regard to religion, even in civilized nations; yet their severity is commonly tender mercy, compared with the cruelty of enraged bigots, when advanced to authority; and their haste in punishing is deliberation and caution, compared with the fury of a licentious mob, when excited by frantic persecutors. But how great a privilege is it to be governed according to a written law!

SCOTT.

the contrary elsewhere. See 1 Cor. 15:9. Ga. 1:13. 1 Tim. 1:13. He was only examined with respect to his conduct as a Christian: therefore it would not have been pertinent to have referred to his conduct while a persecuting Jew, though it were indeed true, that he did not then act against his conscience. . . . The plain sense of the passage is, that his conscience, when examined as in the sight of God with respect to what they alleged against him, did not charge him with any known and deliberate contradictions to its dictates.' Doddr. But in the texts cited above, Paul does not accuse himself of criminal intention, (which gives character to act,) nay, he expressly says he acted ignorantly, indeed, conscientiously. The phrase here seems certainly to speak of his whole life as entirely conscientious.

(2.) Ananias. 'Undoubtedly, Ananias son of Nebidæus, [and so Doddr.] (see Jos. Ant. 20, 5, 3.) who had discharged the pontifical office under the procuratorship of Quadratus, predecessor of Felix. By Quadratus he was sent a prisoner to Rome, together with Ananus, prefect of the temple, to give an account of his high priesthood to Claudius Cesar. (Ant. 20, 6, 2) [Of his behavior in the quarrel between the Jews and Samaritans, during Cumanus' gov. of Judea. Doddr.] But, by the intercession of Agrippa, Junior, they were acquitted, and returned to Jerusalem. Ananias, however, was not reinstated in the pontifical office. For, during the procuratorship of Felix, it was discharged by Jonathan, who (Ant. 20, 10.) was successor to Ananias. This Jonathan was, afterwards, by the connivance, at least, of Felix, assassinated in the temple, by some sicarii: Ant. 20, 8, 5. and note, Acts 22:4. The office then remained unoccupied, until K. Agrippa filled it by appointing Ishmael, son of Phabeus. (Ant. 20, 8, 8.) Therefore what is now related happened while it was vacant. So that Ananias did not, at that time, hold the office of high priest, but was usurping the dignity. Kuin. from Krebs, who has treated the question with no little learning and research. See also Benson, and Biscoe. Bloomf. Snite, &c. Comp. on Mic. 5:1. Is. 50:6. Thus the k. of Persia, wishing to extort money, commanded his ferashes to 'heat these rogues till they die;' and, on the victims attempting to say anything in their own defence, they smote them on the mouth with a shoe, the heel of which was shod with iron. (Moricr.)

3 Then said Paul unto him, God shall smite thee, thou whited wall: for sittest thou to judge me after the law, and commandest me to be smitten <sup>e</sup> contrary to the law?

4 And they that stood by said, Revilest thou God's high priest?

5 Then said Paul, I wist not, brethren, that he was the high priest: for it is <sup>d</sup> written, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people.

6 ¶ But when Paul perceived that the one part were Sadducees, and the other Pharisees, he cried out in the council, Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee: of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question.

gency. 2. In his rage he ordered him to be smitten, so to disgrace him, and to be smitten on the mouth, as having offended with his lips, and in token of enjoining him silence. Thus Zedekiah smote Micaiah, 1 K. 22:24. and Pasbur, Jeremiah, Jer. 20: 2. when they spake in the name of the Lord; if, therefore, we see such indignities done to good men; nay, if they be done to us for well doing and well saying, we must not think it strange; Christ will give those the kisses of his mouth, Cant. 1:2. who for his sake receive blows on the mouth.

III. The denunciation of the wrath of God against the high priest for this wickedness in the place of judgment, Eccl. 3:16. it agrees with what follows there, v. 17. with which Solomon comforted himself, I said in mine heart, God shall judge the righteous and the wicked; God shall smite thee, thou whited wall, v. 3. Paul did not speak this in any sinful heat or passion, but in a holy zeal against the high priest's abuse of his power, and with something of a prophetic spirit, not at all with a spirit of revenge. 1. He gives him his due character; Thou whited wall; thou hypocrite; a mud-wall, trash and dirt, and rubbish, underneath, but plastered over, or white-washed,—the same comparison in effect with that of Christ, when He compares the Pharisees to whited sepulchres, Mat. 23:27. 2. His just doom; 'God shall smite thee, shall bring on thee his sore judgments, especially spiritual judgments;' Grotius thinks this was soon fulfilled, in his removal from office, either by death or deprivation, for he finds another in office a little while after; probably, he was smitten by some sudden stroke of divine vengeance. Jeroboam's hand was withered when stretched out against a prophet. 3. He assigns a good reason for that doom; 'For sittest thou there as president in the supreme judicature of the church, pretending to judge me after the law, to convict and condemn me by the law, and yet commandest me to be smitten before any crime is proved upon me, which is contrary to the law? Deut. 25:2. It is against all law, human and divine, natural and positive, to hinder a man from making his defence, and to condemn him unheard. When beaten by the rabble, Paul could say, Father, forgive them, they know not what they do; but it is inexcusable in a high priest, that is appointed to judge according to the law.

IV. The offence taken at this bold word of Paul's, v. 4. It is a probable conjecture, that those who blamed Paul for what he said, were believing Jews, who were zealous for the law, and consequently for the honor of the high priest, and therefore took it ill that Paul should thus reflect on him, and checked him for it. See here, then, 1. What a hard game Paul had to play, when his enemies were abusive to him, and his friends, so far from standing by him, and appearing for him, were ready to find fault with his management. 2. How apt even the disciples of Christ, themselves, are, to overvalue outward pomp and power. As, because the temple had been God's temple, and a magnificent structure, there were those who followed Christ, that could not bear to have anything said that threatened the destruction of it; so, because the high priest had been God's high priest, and was a man that made a figure, though an inveterate enemy to Christianity, yet these were disgusted at Paul, for giving him his due.

V. The excuse Paul made for what he had said, because he found it was a stumbling-block to his weak brethren, and might prejudice them against him in other things. These Jewish Christians, though weak, yet were brethren, so he calls them here, and, in consideration of that, is almost ready to recall his words; for Who is offended, said he, and I burn not? 2 Cor. 11:29. His fixed resolution was, rather to abridge himself in the use of his Christian liberty, than give offence to a weak brother; rather than do it, he will eat no flesh while the world stands, 1 Cor. 8:13. And so here, though he had taken the liberty to tell the high priest his own, yet when he found it gave offence, he wished he had not done it; and though he did not beg the high priest's pardon, nor excuse it to him, yet he begs their pardon, who took offence at it, because this was not a time to inform them better, nor to say what he could say to justify himself.

1. He excuses it with this, that he did not consider, when he said it, whom he spake to, v. 5. 'I did not just then think of the dignity of his place, or else I would have spoken more respectfully to him.' I see not how we can with any probability think Paul did not know him to be the high priest, for Paul had been seven days in the temple, at the time of the feast, where he could not miss of seeing the high priest; and his telling him that he sat to judge him after the law, shows that he knew who he was; but, says he, I did not consider it. Dr. Whitby puts this sense on it: that the prophetic impulse that was on him, and inwardly moved him to say what he did, did not permit him to advert that it was the high priest, lest this law might have restrained him from complying with that impulse; but the Jews acknowledged, that prophets might use a liberty in speaking of rulers which others might not, as Is. 1:10, 23. Or, (as he quotes the sense of Grot. and Lightf.) Paul does not go about to excuse what he had said, in the least, but rather to justify it; 'I own that God's high priest is not to be reviled, but I do not own this Ananias to be high priest; he is a usurper, he came to the office by bribery and corruption; and the Jewish rabbins say, that he who does so, is neither a judge, nor to be honored as such.' Yet,

2. He takes care that what he had said should not be drawn into a precedent, v. 5. to the weakening of the obligation of that law in the least; it is for the public good, that the honor of magistracy should be supported, and not suffer for the miscarriages of those intrusted with it; and, therefore, that decorum be observed in speaking both of and to princes and judges, Job 34:18. Even when we do well, and suffer for it, we must take it patiently, 1 Pet. 2:20. Not as if great men may not hear of their faults, and public grievances be complained of by proper persons, and in a decent manner; but there must be a particular tenderness for the honor and reputation of those in authority, more than of other people, because the law of God requires a particular reverence to be paid to them, as God's vicegerents; and it is of dangerous consequence to have those any way countenanced, who despise dominions, and speak evil of dignities, Jude 8. Eccl. 10:20.

V. 6—11. Many are the troubles of the righteous, but, some way or other, the Lord delivereth them out of them all. Paul owned he had experienced the truth of this, in the persecutions he had undergone among the Gentiles, 2 Tim. 3:11. And now he finds that He who has delivered, does and will deliver.

1. His own prudence and ingenuity stand him in some stead, and contribute much to his escape. His being a citizen of Rome saved him in the foregoing ch. from being whipped by the chief captain as a vagabond, and here, his being a Pharisee saved him from being condemned by the Sanhedrim, as an apostate from the faith and worship of the God of Israel. It will consist very well with our willingness to suffer for Christ, to use all lawful methods, nay, and arts too, both to prevent suffering, and to extricate ourselves out of it. Paul's honest policy was, to divide his judges, and, by incensing one part of them more against him, to engage the contrary part for him.

1. The great council was made up of Sadducees and Pharisees, and Paul perceived it; he knew the characters of many of them ever since he had lived among them, and saw those among them whom he knew to be Sadducees, and others whom he knew to be Pharisees, v. 6. perhaps nearly an equal part. Now these differed very much

To be smitten with a shoe is the last ignominy. Burd. See Bush's III. Ed. 'This proud [Ananias] took umbrage, it seems, at Paul's undaunted look, and unqualified assertions of innocence, which gave the lie to all the accusations of the priests; as also, perhaps, at his addressing them with Brethren, not Fathers (as in 22. and 7:2.) or rulers of the people, and elders of Israel; as in 4:8. He must too have felt vexation at Paul's having been liberated by Roman soldiers; and having thrown himself on their protection as a Roman citizen.'

(3.) 'At this [aggravated] insult Paul inveighs with no little acrimony, [and] Dr. Graves remarks, that it is the only instance in which he forgot decorum and propriety. Many, as Erasmus, Beza, Pearce, and Doddr., [with Scott,] take the words to be a prediction, or prophecy (as Doddr. thinks, uttered by the impulse of the Spirit): and Grot. maintains, that Paul uses the right of a prophet. But this seems scarcely satisfactory; nay, almost absurd. I rather assent to Cam., Zeger, Wetst., Limb., Heum., and, indeed, most recent commentators, that it is a formula malè precantis. (Wetst. quotes a similar imprecation from Schævuos.) And this is apparent from the words of the apparitor, at v. 4. and of Paul, at v. 5. It is (as Kuin. observes) admitted by Jer. and Augustin; that this sudden insult provoked the apostle to express himself with more bitterness than he should have done, and that, on this occasion, he did not display the same patience under injuries that his Divine Master had done.'

(4.) 'Limb., Beng., Wetst., Pearce, Valck., Bp. Mann, Morus, Schoett., [Bp. Sanderson, Bl.,] &c., think, that Paul meant to excuse his lapse; and they tr.: "I did not consider, or reflect, that it was the high priest." Now this signification of eidō [tr. "wist"] often occurs, as Eph. 6:8. Col. 3:24. &c. Hence, in Acts 7:18. for ēdei [knew], some MSS. have (by a gloss) emnēsthē [recollected]. And this seems the best tr. Kuin. Whom see, for four other views, sustained by eminent men. Ep.

(5.) I wist not, &c. 'I was not aware that it was the high priest. This is a natural rendering of the original, which cannot fairly be tr. I do not acknowledge him to be the high priest; nor can it be imagined, that Paul would enter on so curious and so dangerous a question as the justice of his accession to that office. Paul's answer plainly shows he knew the person speaking, whoever he was, to be a judge. [And, so Bl., the character Paul gives him exactly suits and must be meant for Ananias.] The candor both of the historian and of the apostle is well worthy of remark.' Doddr. But see on v. 2. Camerarius, Calvini, Marnix, Pricæus, and Ros., think it irony. Id.

V. 6—10. The apostle showed a most consummate sagacity, and a deep acquaintance with the human heart, and [with] that universal disposi-

7 And when he had so said, there arose a dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees: and the multitude was divided.

8 For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit: but the Pharisees confess both.

9 And there arose a great cry: and the scribes that were of the Pharisees' part arose, and strove, saying, We find no evil in this man: but if a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him, let us not fight against God.

10 ¶ And when there arose a great dissension, the chief captain, fearing lest Paul should have been pulled in pieces of them, commanded the soldiers to go down, and to take him by force from among them, and to bring him into the castle.

from one another, yet ordinarily agreed well enough to do the business of the council together. (1.) The Pharisees were bigots; zealous for the ceremonies, not only those God had appointed, but those enjoined by the tradition of the elders; great sticklers for the authority of the church, and enforcing obedience to its injunctions, which occasioned many quarrels between them and our Lord Jesus; but at the same time very orthodox in the faith of the Jewish church concerning the world of spirits, the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come. (2.) The Sadducees were deists; no friends to the Scripture, or divine revelation. The books of Moses they admitted, but had little regard to the other books of the O. T.; see Mat. 22:23. These Sadducees, [1.] Deny the resurrection; they had neither hope of eternal happiness, dread of eternal misery, nor expectation of anything on the other side death; on these principles, they [perhaps] said, It is vain to serve God, and [they] call the proud happy, Mal. 3:14, 15. [2.] They denied the existence of angels and spirits, and allowed of no being but matter. They thought God Himself was corporeal, and had parts and members, as we have. The angels, they supposed to be messengers God made and sent on his errands as there was occasion; or impressions on the fancies of those they were sent to, and no real existences; this, or that, or anything, rather than what they were. And as for the souls of men, they looked upon them to be nothing else but the temperament of the humors of the body, or the animal spirits; but denied their existence in a state of separation from the body, and any difference between the soul of a man and of a beast. These, no doubt, pretended to be free-thinkers, but really thought as meanly, absurdly, and slavishly as possible. It is strange how men of such corrupt and wicked principles could come into office, and have a place in the great Sanhedrim; but many of them were of quality and estate, and they complied with the public establishment, and so got in, and kept in. But they were generally stigmatized as heretics, were ranked with the Epicureans, and prayed against, and excluded from eternal life. The prayer the modern Jews use against Christians, Witsius thinks, was designed by Gamaliel, who made it, against the Sadducees; and that they meant them in their usual imprecation, Let the name of the wicked rot. But how degenerate was the character, and how miserable the state of the Jewish church, when such profane men as these were among their rulers!

2. In this their difference, Paul openly declared himself to be on the Pharisees' side, v. 6. He cried out, so as to be heard by all, I am a Pharisee, so bred, may, born, in effect, the son of a Pharisee, and thus far still a Pharisee, that I hope for the resurrection of the dead, and, I may truly say, if rightly understood, this is it for which I am now called in question. When Christ was on earth, the Pharisees set themselves most against Him, because He witnessed against their traditions, and corrupt glosses on the law; but after his ascension, the Sadducees set themselves most against his apostles, because they preached through Jesus the resurrection of the dead, ch. 4:1, 2. And it is said, ch. 5:17. that they were the sect of the Sadducees that were filled with indignation at them, because they preached that life and immortality which is brought to light by the Gospel. As Pharisaism was opposed to Christianity, Paul set himself against it, yet, as it was opposed to Sadducism, he adhered to it. We must never think the worse of any truth of God, nor be more shy of owning it, for its being held by men otherwise corrupt. Paul might truly say, that, being persecuted, as a Christian, this was the thing he was called in question for; perhaps he knew the Sadducees, though they had not such an interest in the common people as the Pharisees had, yet had underhand incensed the mob against him, under pretence of his having preached to the Gentiles, but really because he had preached [to them and others] the hope of the resurrection. However, being called in question, for his being a Christian, he might truly say, he was called in question for the hope of the resurrection of the dead, as he afterward pleaded, ch. 24:15. and ch. 26:6, 7. Though Paul preached against the traditions of the elders, (as his Master had done,) and therein opposed the Pharisees, yet he valued himself more on his preaching for the resurrection of the dead, and a future state, in which he concurred with the Pharisees.

3. This occasioned a division in the council; probably the high priest sided with the Sadducees, as he had done, ch. 5:17. and made it to appear by his rage at Paul, v. 2. which alarmed the Pharisees so much the more; but so it was, there arose a dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees, v. 7. for this word of Paul's made the Sadducees more warm, and the Pharisees more cool, in the prosecution of him; so that there was a schism, a quarrel among them, and the edge of their zeal began to turn from Paul against one another; nor could they go on to act against him, when they could not agree among themselves, or prosecute him for breaking the unity of the church, when there was so little among them of the unity of the Spirit. All the cry had been against Paul, but now there arose a great cry against one another, v. 9.

4. The Pharisees hereupon (would one think it!) took Paul's part, v. 9. they strove, they fought, saying, We find no evil in this man. He had conducted himself decently and reverently in the temple, and had attended the service of the church; and though it was but occasionally, yet it showed that he was not such an enemy to it as he was said to be; he had spoken very handsomely in his own defence, and given a good account of himself, and had now declared himself orthodox in the great principles of religion, as well as regular and conscientious in his conversation; therefore, they cannot see that he has done anything worthy of death, or of bonds. Nay, they go further, If a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him concerning Jesus, and put him on preaching as he does, though we may not be so far satisfied as to give credit to him, yet we ought to be cautioned not to oppose him, lest we be found fighting against God; as Gamaliel, himself a Pharisee, had argued, ch. 5:39. Now here,

(1.) We may observe it, to the honor of the Gospel, that it was witnessed to even by its adversaries, and confessions, not only of its innocency, but of its excellency, were extorted sometimes by the power of truth, even from those that persecuted it. Pilate found no fault in Christ, though he put Him to death; nor Festus in Paul, though he continued him in bonds; and the Pharisees here supposed it possible, that Paul might have a commission sent him from heaven by an angel to do what he did; and yet, it should seem, as elders, they after this joined the high priest in prosecuting him, ch. 24:1. They sinned against the knowledge which they not only had, but sometimes owned, as Christ had said of them, They have both seen and hated both Me and my Father, John 15:24.

Yet, (2.) We will hope some of them did, from henceforward, conceive a better opinion of Paul, and then it must be observed, to their honor, that their zeal for the traditions of the elders, which Paul had departed from, was so far swallowed up in a zeal for the great and fundamental doctrines of religion, to which Paul still adhered, that if he will heartily join them against the Sadducees, and adhere to the hope of the resurrection of the dead, they will not think his shaking off the ceremonial law to be any evil in him, but charitably hope he walks according to the light God has given him by some angel or spirit, and are so far from persecuting him, that they are ready to patronize, and protect him. The persecuting Pharisees of the church of Rome are not of this spirit; for, let a man be ever so sincere and zealous for all the articles of the Christian faith, yet, if he lay not his neck under the yoke of their church's authority, they find evil enough in him to persecute him unto the death.

II. The chief captain's care and conduct stand him in more stead; for when he had thrown this bone of contention between the Pharisees and Sadducees, he is never the nearer, but is in danger of being pulled in pieces by them; the Pharisees pulling to have him set at liberty, and the Sadducees to have him put to death, or thrown to the people, like Daniel into the den of lions; so that the chief captain was forced to come with his soldiers, and rescue him, as he had done, ch. 21:32. and ch. 22:24. He ordered his soldiers to go down from the upper wards, and to take him by force, out of that apartment in the temple, where he had ordered the council to meet, and to bring him into the castle, or tower of Antonia; for he saw he could make nothing of them, toward the understanding of the merits of his cause.

III. Divine consolations stood him in most stead of all; the castle was indeed a protection, but withal it was a confinement; and as it was now his preservation from so great a death, it might be his reservation for a greater. We do not find that any of the apostles or elders at Jerusalem came to him; either they had not courage, or had not adtion, which continually manifests itself, of favoring those who take our part in any contested point. Grant me discernment, I allow it you.' Cowper. What must this heathen Lysias have thought of the worshippers of JEHOVAH, when he saw this assembly of chief priests, learned scribes, and rulers of Israel, forgetful of what became their rank, profession, and sacred character; and carried away by an unbridled rage, in their religious contests, to those excesses, which the Roman senators and magistrates, or principal persons, would have been ashamed of, even in their eager competition for preeminence and dominion? SEOTT.

(3.) Paul's excuse, unaccompanied by retraction, the Sanhedrim, it seems, did not accept, and, perceiving that his judges were too much under the dominion of anger, hatred, and prejudice to decide his case fairly, Paul bethought himself of a justifiable stratagem, to which Orobio has unreasonably objected. [See Limb. Am. Coll.] BLOOMF.

11 And the night following, the Lord stood <sup>k</sup> by him, and said, Be of good cheer, Paul: for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at <sup>l</sup> Rome.

12 ¶ And when it was day, <sup>m</sup> certain of the Jews banded together, and bound themselves <sup>n</sup> under a curse, saying, that they would neither eat nor drink <sup>o</sup> till they had killed Paul.

13 And they were more than forty which had made this conspiracy.

14 And they came to the chief <sup>p</sup> priests and elders, and said, We have bound ourselves under a great curse, that we will eat nothing until we have slain Paul.

15 Now therefore ye, with the council, signify to the chief captain that he bring him down unto you tomorrow, as though ye would inquire something more perfectly concerning him: and we, or ever he come near, are ready <sup>q</sup> to kill him.

16 And when Paul's sister's son heard of their lying in wait, he <sup>r</sup> went and entered into the castle, and told Paul.

17 Then <sup>s</sup> Paul called one of the centurions unto him, and said, Bring this young man unto the chief captain; for he hath a certain thing to tell him.

18 So he took him, and brought him to the chief captain, and said, Paul the prisoner <sup>t</sup> called me unto him, and prayed me to bring this young man unto thee, who hath something to say unto thee.

19 Then the chief captain took him by the hand, and went <sup>u</sup> with him aside privately, and asked him, What is that thou hast to tell me?

mission. But now the Lord Jesus makes him a kind visit, and, though at midnight, yet a very seasonable one, v. 11. Whoever is against us, we need not fear, if the Lord stand by us. The Lord is with those that uphold my soul, and then nothing can come amiss.

1. Christ bids him not be discouraged, saddened, or frightened. Note, Christ will have his servants, who are faithful, always cheerful. Perhaps Paul began to be jealous, whether he had done well in what he had said to the council the day before; but Christ satisfies him that God approved his conduct. Or, perhaps, it troubled him, that his friends did not come to him; but Christ's visit did itself speak, though he had not said, Be of good cheer, Paul.

2. It is a strange argument he uses, to encourage him; As thou hast testified of Me in Jerusalem, &c. One would think this but cold comfort; yet this was designed to hearten him; for hereby he is given to understand he had been serving Christ, as a witness for Him, in what he had hitherto endured, that he had not yet finished his testimony, nor was, by his imprisonment, laid aside as useless, but was only reserved for further service: nay, he seems to have had a particular fancy, and an innocent one, to go to Rome, to preach the Gospel there, though it was already preached, and a church planted there; yet, being a citizen of Rome, he longed for a journey thither, and had designed it, ch. 19:21. And he had written to the Romans some time ago, that he longed to see them, Rom. 1:11. Now he was ready to conclude, this had broken his measures, and he should never see Rome; but even in that Christ tells him he should be gratified, since he desired it for the honor of Christ, and to do good.

V. 12—35. Here is the story of a plot against Paul's life; how it was laid, how discovered, and how defeated.

1. They found they could gain nothing by popular tumult, or legal process, and therefore have recourse to the barbarous method of assassination; so restless is their malice against this good man. Observe,

1. Who formed this conspiracy; certain Jews that had the utmost degree of indignation against him, because he was the apostle of the Gentiles, v. 12. more than forty in the design, v. 13. Lord, how are they increased that trouble me!

2. When; as soon as it was day, answering to the account the prophet gives of some who work evil on their beds, and when the morning is light they practice it, and are laid under a woe for it, Mic. 2:1. In the night Christ appeared to Paul to protect him, and when it was day, here were forty men appearing against him to destroy him; they were not up so soon, but Christ was up before them. God shall help her, and that right early, Ps. 46:5.

3. By a league, perhaps they called it a holy league, they engaged to stand by one another, and every one, to his power, to be aiding and assisting to murder Paul. Strange, so many could so soon be got together, and that in Jerusalem, too, who were so perfectly lost to all sense of humanity and honor. Comp. Is. 1:21. What laws of truth and justice so sacred, so strong, which malice and bigotry will not break through!

4. How firm they made it, as they thought, that none might fly off, on conscience of the horror of the fact, at second thoughts; they bound themselves under an anathema, imprecating the heaviest curses on themselves, their souls, bodies, families, if they did not kill Paul, and so quickly, that they would not eat or drink till they had done it. What a complication of wickedness is here! It showed a great contempt of the providence of God, and a presumption on it, in that they bound themselves to do such a thing within so short a time as they could continue fasting, without any proviso or reserve for the disposal of an overruling Providence; nay, a great contempt of their own souls and bodies; of their souls, in imprecating a curse on them if they did not proceed. (God certainly meets them with his curse if they do go on in it, and they desire He would if they do not!) of their bodies, in tying themselves out from the necessary supports of life till they had accomplished a thing which they could never lawfully do, and perhaps not possibly do. Such language of hell they speak, that wish God to damn them, and the devil to take them, if they do not so and so. As they love cursing, so shall it come unto them. Some think, the meaning is, they would either kill Paul, as an Achan, an accursed thing, a troubler of the camp; or, if not, would make themselves accursed before God in his stead, Job 31:31. Persecutors are said to eat up God's people as they eat bread; it is as much a gratification to them, as meat to one that is hungry, Ps. 14:4.

5. What method they took to bring it about. Paul is under the particular protection of the government, imprisoned, not, as others, lest he should do harm, but lest he should have harm done him; therefore the contrivance is, that the chief priests and elders desire the governor to let Paul come to them to the council-chamber, to be further examined, and then, in his passage, they would put an end to all disputes about Paul, by killing him; thus the plot was laid, v. 14, 15. Towards evening they come to the principal members of the great Sanhedrim, and, though they might have concealed their main design, and yet might have moved them on some other pretence to send for Paul, they are so confident of their approbation of this villany, that they are not ashamed or afraid to own to them, that they design to breakfast the next morning on his blood; they doubt not but the chief priests will not only countenance them, but lend them a helping hand, be their tools to get them an opportunity of killing Paul; nay, tell a lie for them, too, pretending to the chief captain, that they would inquire something more perfectly concerning him, when they meant no such thing. What a mean, what an ill opinion had they of their priests, when they could apply to them on such an errand as this! Yet, vile as the proposal was, for aught that appears, the priests and elders consented, and, at the first word, promised to gratify them.

II. How the plot was discovered. 1. There was a youth related to Paul, whose mother, probably, lived in Jerusalem, and some how or other, we are not told how, he heard of their lying in wait, and went into the castle, probably, as he used to do, to attend on his uncle, and bring him what he wanted, which gave him a free access to him, and he told Paul what he heard. God has many ways of bringing to light the hidden works of darkness; though the contrivers of them dig deep to hide them from the Lord, He can make a bird of the air to carry the voice, Eccl. 10:20. or the conspirators' own tongues to betray themselves.

2. How it was discovered to the chief captain. This is related very particularly, perhaps because the penman was an eyewitness of the prudent and successful management of this affair, and remembered it with a deal of pleasure. (1.) Paul had got a good interest in the officers that attended, by his prudent, peaceable deportment; he could call one of the centurions to him, though a centurion, and used to call, not to be called to, v. 17. and he desired he would introduce this young man to the chief captain, to give in an information of something that concerned the honor of government. (2.) The centurion

V. 11. Must bear, &c.] 'Here is an instance of a divine appointment, without any necessity laid on the will of Paul.' Whitby. This erroneously supposes, that they, with whom this learned writer meant to contend, held that the divine decrees laid a necessity on the human will! 2:22—24, v. 23. 4:23—28, v. 28. In fact, the instance proves, beyond all controversy, that an event may be certainly determined by almighty God, and infallibly come to pass; though all parties concerned exercise the utmost free agency, of which the rational nature is capable. Some argue from this vision, that the Lord approved of the apostle's conduct: but, though this is undoubtedly true as to the grand outline, yet the vision no more proves that the conduct of the apostle was free from all mixture of infirmity, than the vision, with which Jacob was favored at Bethel, proves that he had not sinned in fraudulently obtaining the blessing. Gen. 27:6—14. 28:16, 17. The actions of men must be judged of by the law of God; and not by the event, or by any special instances of the Lord's unmerited kindness to them.

SCOTT. V. 12—22. The Jews, perceiving that Lysias was resolved to protect Paul, unless legally convicted of some crime, began to fear that their malice would be disappointed. [Hence their conspiracy.] 'Such execrable vows as these were not unusual among the Jews, who challenged to themselves a right of punishing those, without any legal process, whom they considered as transgressors of the law; and in some cases thought, that they were justified in killing them. . . It is no wonder, therefore, that these Jews should make no scruple of acquaint-

20 And he said, The Jews <sup>u</sup> have agreed to desire thee that thou wouldest bring down Paul tomorrow into the council, as though they would inquire somewhat of him more perfectly.

21 But do not thou yield <sup>v</sup> unto them: for there lie in wait for him of them more than forty men, which have bound themselves with an oath, that they will neither eat nor drink till they have killed him: and now are they ready, looking for a promise from thee.

22 So the chief captain then let the young man depart, and charged him, See thou tell no man that thou hast showed these things to me.

23 ¶ And he called unto him two centurions, saying, Make ready two hundred soldiers to go to Cesarea, and horsemen threescore and ten, and spearmen two hundred, at the third hour of the night:

24 And provide them beasts, that they may set Paul on, and bring him safe unto Felix the governor.

25 And he wrote a letter after this manner:

26 Claudius Lysias unto the most excellent governor Felix sendeth greeting.

27 This <sup>w</sup> man was taken of the Jews, and should have been killed of them: then came I with an army, and rescued him, having understood that he was a Roman.

28 And <sup>x</sup> when I would have known the cause wherefore they accused him, I brought him forth into their council:

very readily gratified him, v. 18. did not send a common soldier with him, but went himself to countenance the young man, to recommend his errand to the chief captain, and to show his respect to Paul. Note, It is true charity to poor prisoners, to act for them as well as to give them. 'I was sick, and in prison, and you went on an errand for me,' will pass as well in the account as, 'I was sick, and in prison, and you came unto me, to visit me, or sent me a token.' Those that have acquaintance and interest, should use them to assist persons in distress. This centurion helped to save Paul's life by his civility, which should engage us to do the like on occasion. Open thy mouth for the dumb, Prov. 31:8. Those that cannot give a good gift, may yet speak a good word. (3.) The chief captain received the information with great condescension and tenderness, v. 19. He took the young man by the hand, as a friend or father, to encourage him, that he might not be dashed out of countenance, but might be assured of a favorable audience. The notice taken of this circumstance, should encourage great men to make themselves easy of access to the meanest, on any errand which may give them an opportunity of doing good; to condescend to them of low estate. This familiarity of this Roman tribune is here on record to his honor. Let no man think he disparages himself by his humility or eharity. It is probable the chief captain was the more obliging in this case, because of having bound Paul, against his privilege as a Roman citizen, which he was willing now to atone for. (4.) The young man delivered his errand very readily and handsomely, v. 20, 21. 'The Jews,' he does not say who, lest he should invidiously reflect on the chief priests and the elders, and his business was to save his uncle's life, not to accuse his enemies; 'have agreed, &c. Lastly, The captain dismissed the young man with a charge of secrecy, v. 22. The favors of great men are not always to be boasted of; and those that cannot keep counsel, are not fit to be employed in business. If it should be known that the chief captain had this information brought him, perhaps they would compass and imagine the death of Paul some other way.

III. How the plot was defeated; The chief captain, finding how implacable and inveterate the malice of the Jews was against Paul, and how near he was to become himself necessary to it as a minister, resolves to send him away with all speed out of their reach. What a melancholy observation is it, that the Jewish chief priests, when they knew of this assassination-plot, should countenance it, and assist in it, while a Roman chief captain, purely from a natural sense of justice and humanity, when he knows it, sets himself to baffle it, and puts himself to a deal of trouble to do it effectually!

1. He orders a considerable detachment of the Roman forces under his command to get ready to go to Cesarea, with all expedition, and to bring Paul thither to Felix the governor, where he might sooner expect to have justice done him than by the great Sanhedrim at Jerusalem. I see not but the chief captain might, without any unfaithfulness to the duty of his place, have set Paul at liberty, and given him leave to shift for his own safety, for he was never legally committed to his custody as a criminal, he himself owns, that nothing was laid to his charge worthy of bonds, v. 29. and he ought to have the same tenderness for his liberty that he had for his life; but he feared [his death, perhaps, or that it] would have incensed the Jews too much against him. [In fact, he was now accountable for Paul's life, both to God and Rome.] Two centurions, or captains of the hundreds, must get ready 200 foot soldiers, probably those under their own command, with 70 horse, and 200 spearmen beside, which some think were the chief captain's guards; whether horse or foot is not certain, most probably foot, as pikemen for the protection of the horse. [So large a force would render a rescue for any purpose, hopeless, and a smaller might have led to bloodshed, which this prompt and soldierly Roman determined to prevent.] See how justly God brought the Jewish nation under the Roman yoke, when such a party of the Roman army was necessary to restrain them from the most execrable villanies! There needed not all this force, not any of it, to keep Paul from being rescued by his friends; ten times this force would not have kept him from being rescued by an angel, if it had pleased God to work his deliverance that way, as He had sometimes done; but, (1.) The chief captain designed hereby to expose the Jews, as a headstrong, tumultuous people; and hearing how many were in the conspiracy, he thought less would not serve to defeat their attempt. (2.) God designed hereby to encourage Paul; for being thus attended, he was not only kept safe in the hands of his friends, but out of the hands of his enemies. Paul was by this made considerable; thus his bonds in Christ were made manifest all the country over; Phil. 1:13. and so great an honor having been put on them before by the prediction of them, it was agreeable enough that they should be thus honorably attended, that the brethren in the Lord might wax the more confident by his bonds, when they saw him rather guarded as the patriot of his country, than guarded against as the pest of his country; and so great a preacher made so great a prisoner.

When his enemies hate him, and I doubt his friends neglect him, then does a Roman tribune patronize him, and carefully provide, [1.] For his ease; the chief captain treats him like a gentleman, and orders him a good horse to ride upon. Nay, beasts, either a led horse, or more; or, as some, for his friends and companions, as many as pleased [according to the custom in the E., note, 10:23.] to go along with him, to divert him in his journey, and to minister to him. [2.] For his security; they have a strict charge to bring him safe to Felix the governor, to whom he is consigned, and who was supreme in all civil affairs among the Jews, as the chief captain was in military affairs. The Roman historians speak much of this Felix, as a man of mean extraction, but that raised himself by his shifts to be governor of Judea; in the execution of which office, Tacitus, Hist. 5. says, He used royal power with a servile genius, and in connexion with all the varieties of cruelty and lust. To the judgment of such a man as this is poor Paul turned over; and yet better so than in the hands of Ananias the high priest! Now a prisoner, thus on his deliverance by course of law, ought to be protected as well as a prince.

The chief captain orders, for greater security, that Paul be taken away at the 3d hour of the night, which some understand of 3 hours after sunset, that, it being now soon after the feast of pentecost, (i. e. midsummer,) they might have the cool of the night to march in. Others understand it of 3 hours after midnight, in the 3d watch, about 3 in the morning, that they might have the day before them, and get out of Jerusalem before Paul's enemies were stirring, and so prevent any popular tumult, leaving them to roar, when they rose, like a lion disappointed of his prey.

2. He writes a letter to Felix, the governor of this province, by which he discharges himself from any further care about Paul, and leaves the whole matter with Felix. This letter is here inserted, v. 25. Probably Luke had a copy of it, having attended Paul in this remove. Observe, after the proper ing the chief priests and elders with their conspiracy against the life of Paul; who were so far from blaming them for it, that not long after they renewed the same design themselves. (25:2, 3.)... Dr. Lightfoot has shown from the Talmud, that if they were prevented from accomplishing such vows as these, it was an easy matter to obtain an absolution from their Rabbies' Doddr.

V. 21. 'The cavalry used often to take each a led horse; by which means they travelled long distances without stopping.'

V. 25—30. This epistle is a good specimen of the Roman method of writing letters, and a model of brevity, simplicity, and perspicuity. The customary title of respect to a superior, and expression of goodwill, are once only made use of: and in this it differs exceedingly from modern epistles, to persons of high rank and authority; which are generally enumbered with multiplied compliments, and ascriptions of honor.—As we suppose this to have been an exact copy of the letter, it appears, Lysias was willing Felix should conclude, that his interposition in Paul's favor arose from a previous knowledge that he was a Roman citizen; though it is evident this was not the case. 21:31—40. 22:27—30. In other respects, the account was fair and candid. Scott.

(27.) Having understood, &c.] Bl. sensibly remarks, 'Rois and Doddr. think Lysias only confounds, inadvertently, the times of delivery; since he delivered Paul twice. But this confusion could scarcely be accidental [yet Paul's being a Roman, was a reason for a good deed that the tribune did.]... Lysias ventured, it seems, to take a little more credit for zeal in behalf of his fellow citizens, than, in strictness, he merited. As, however, his conduct was, throughout the rest of this business, so humane, judicious, and every way worthy of a public functionary, we must not visit the lapse too severely on his head. As to his concealment of the fact, that he had caused Paul to be strapped to the whipping-post, no one can justly blame him for that; though, if this had come to the ears of Felix, it would have destroyed the only excuse that Lysias could have advanced; namely, that he had not known Paul to be a Roman citizen. So dangerous is it to deviate ever so little from the path of truth, to gratify any petty vanity, or serve any temporary purpose.' Ep.

29 Whom I perceived to be accused of questions of their law, but to have nothing laid to his charge worthy of death or of bonds.

30 And when it was told me, how that the Jews laid wait for the man, I sent straightway to thee, and gave commandment to his accusers also, to say before thee what they had against him. Farewell.

31 Then the soldiers, as it was commanded them, took Paul, and brought him by night to Antipatris.

32 On the morrow they left the horsemen to go with him, and returned to the castle :

33 Who, when they came to Cesarea, and delivered the epistle to the governor, presented Paul also before him.

34 And when the governor had read the letter, he asked of what province he was. And when he understood that he was of Cilicia :

35 I will hear thee, said he, when thine accusers are also come. And he commanded him to be kept in Herod's judgment-hall.

PRACT. OBS. To rejoice in the testimony of a good conscience before God, amidst calumnies and persecutions, is an invaluable blessing ; but this cannot be habitually possessed, except by the constant exercise of faith in Christ, and an upright obedience to his commandments.—The best of men are liable, when greatly injured and insulted, to be put off their guard : and it is in general advisable to decline a strenuous justification of ourselves, and to admit that our conduct was in some respects unfit for imitation : and in no ordinary circumstances should we by any means 'speak evil' of our rulers ; whatever their characters may be, or however they may have injured us ; for the Christian's maxims are, to honor those in authority, and 'to overcome evil with good.' Rom. 13: 1—5. Tit. 3:1, 2. 1 Pet. 2:13—17. 2 Pet. 2:10, 11. Jude 9, 10.—It is useless to urge the most conclusive arguments, when we know that our cause is already prejudged.—Among those who oppose spiritual religion, some come nearer to the truth than others ; and though self-righteous Pharisees are to be warned and shunned ; yet Sadducees and infidels, who deny all the doctrines of revealed religion, should be still more

V. 31. By Night.] 'I. e. principally : to Neopolis was 22 miles, to Lydda (or Diospolis) 10, to Antipatris 10, to Cesarea 16. See Reland, Bloomf. Antipatris.] 'Very different accounts are given of the situation of Antipatris, which must, however, have been N. W. from Jerusalem. Its ancient name was Capharsalama, or Chabarzaba ; but Herod the Great rebuilt it, and gave it the name of Antipatris, in honor of his father, Antipater. Some have supposed it but 18 or 20 m. from Jerusalem ; but Mr. Biscoe has shown it was something more than 38 of our miles, which must have been too far for one night's march ; he therefore very well observes, it is not necessary to conclude Paul was carried there in one night, or that the soldiers returned in one day. . . It appears from Jos. that from Jerusalem to Cesarea was 600 furlongs, or near 70 miles.'

V. 35. Judgment-hall.] 'Praitēriō : now the prætorium was the habitation of the provincial governors. Thus Cic. calls Verres' (prætor of Sicily's) house. Finally, the term was applied, as here, to any magnificent edifice.'

NOTES. CHAP. XXIV. V. 1—9. (2) Worthy deeds.] We read of no benefit whatever, resulting from Felix's oppressive government, except that he freed the country from some daring gangs of robbers.—As for Judea, its state under Felix was so far from being what Tertullus here represents, that Josephus declares, that the Jews accused him before think much the worse of him for that, v. 27. [2.] That he had protected him because he was a Roman ; which action for a citizen of Rome would recommend him to the Roman governor. [3.] That he could not understand the merits of his cause, nor what made him so odious to the Jews. He took the proper method to know, brought him forth into their council, v. 28. to be examined there ; hoping that, either from their complaints, or his own confessions, he should learn something of the ground of all this clamor, but he found he was accused of questions of their law, v. 29. about the hope of the resurrection of the dead, v. 6. This chief captain was a man of sense and honor, and had good principles in him of justice and humanity ; and yet see how slightly he speaks of another world, and the great things of that world, as if that were a question, which is of undoubted certainty, and which both sides agreed in, except the Sadducees ; and as if that were a question only of their law, which is of the utmost concern to all mankind ! * Or, perhaps, he refers rather to the question about their rituals than about their doctrinals, and the quarrel he perceived they had with him, was for lessening the credit and obligation of their ceremonial law, which he looked upon as a thing not worth speaking of. The Romans allowed the nations they conquered the exercise of their own religion, and never offered to impose their's on them ; yet, as conservators of the public peace, they would not suffer them, under color of their religion, to abuse their neighbors. [4.] That thus far he understood that there was nothing laid to his charge worthy of death or of bonds, much less proved or made out against him. (2.) His referring Paul's ease, his life being there in danger, to Felix, v. 30. as the most proper person to judge the cause, and 'let his accusers go after him, if they please, and say before thee what they have against him, for, being bred a soldier, I will never pretend to be a judge, and so farewell.'

3 Paul is accordingly conducted to Cesarea ; the soldiers got him safe out of Jerusalem by night, and if any of the conspirators did starve themselves to death, in conscience of their oath, and vexation at their disappointment, they fell unpitied. Paul was conducted to Antipatris, 17 miles from Jerusa-strenuously opposed.—Man is a vain-glorious creature, who courts flattery, and would have his own opinion considered as the standard of truth ! A practical uniform attention to this characteristic of our fallen nature seems the grand device for managing mankind ; whether among the giddy multitude, or in the great councils of nations, or in ecclesiastical conventions. But it is a delicate operation, which requires great skill and caution, and there is imminent danger of deviating from strict 'simplicity, and godly sincerity,' into carnal policy, whenever we have recourse to it : though we may avail ourselves of it on some great emergency ; and when it may evidently be done, without at all receding from our principles, and to the advantage of the truth.—But what a scandal is it, when the professors and ministers of true religion are so furious in their contests, that idolatrous and ungodly men cry shame of their violence, and are constrained to interpose authority, or military force, to quell the riot, and prevent more fatal consequences ! or when national and ecclesiastical assemblies more resemble a meeting of furious assassins, than a convention of legislators, or servants of God ! Sc.

Nero, of insufferable oppressions ; and had certainly ruined him, if his brother Pallas had not interposed in his favor.' Doddr.—The high priest, the chief magistrate of the Jews, was known to be one of Paul's accusers : yet the tribune, a subordinate officer under the Roman governor, commanded these accusers to go to Cesarea. This shows to what entire subjection the Jews were at this time reduced. And was not then 'the sceptre departed from Judah,' because Shiloh was come? Gcn. 49:10.—The disciples long before had been named Christians : yet Tertullus still calls them Nazarenes ; which shows that the disciples were not first called Christians by [all] their enemies. 11:25, 26, v. 26. (1.) Orator.] 'Rhetor. The Jews being subjected to the Roman empire, were obliged to transact their law affairs after the Roman manner : but, being little conversant with the Roman laws, and the forms of the Jurists, it was necessary for them, in pleading a cause before a Roman magistrate, to employ the assistance of some Roman lawyer and advocate (as this Tertullus), who was well versed in Greek and Latin. See Ottius. Rhetor., indeed, signifies properly, an orator or speaker, but it also denotes a pleader ; as here, in Ælian., Æsch., Cic., Juv. In all the Roman provinces these rhetores were found, who devoted their time and labor, for hire, to the pleading of causes, and transacting other business before the provincial courts. So Lamprid. And from Cic. it appears, that many Roman youths, who had devoted themselves to forensic

2 And when he was called forth, Tertullus began to accuse him, saying, Seeing that by thee we enjoy great quietness, and that very worthy deeds are done unto this nation by thy providence,

3 We accept it always, and in all places, most noble Felix, with all thankfulness.

4 Notwithstanding, that I be not further tedious unto thee, I pray thee that thou wouldest hear us of thy clemency a few words.

5 For we have found this man a pestilent fellow, and a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout the world, and a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes:

6 Who also hath gone about to profane the temple: whom we took, and would have judged according to our law.

7 But the chief captain Lysias came upon us, and with great violence took him away out of our hands, not ashamed to own himself a sworn enemy to Paul. The elders attended him, to signify their concurrence, and to invigorate the prosecution; attorneys or solicitors could not be found to follow it with sufficient violence. The pains evil men take in an evil matter, should shame our coldness and backwardness, and indifference in what is good.

8 Commanding his accusers to come unto thee: by examining of whom, thyself mayest take knowledge of all these things whereof we accuse him.

II. The prosecutors brought with them a certain orator named Tertullus, a Roman, skilled in the Roman law and language, and therefore fittest to be employed in a cause before the Roman governor, and most likely to gain favor. His business is, on the behalf of the prosecutors, to open the information against Paul, and he is a man that will say anything for his fee; mercenary tongues will do so. No cause so unjust, but can find advocates to plead it; yet we hope many advocates so just, as not knowingly to patronize an unrighteous cause; but Tertullus was none of those, his speech, or at least an abstract of it, is here reported; and it is made up of flattery and falsehood; it calls evil good, and good evil.

1. One of the worst of men is here applauded, as one of the best of benefactors, only because he was the judge. Felix is represented, by historians, as a very bad man, who, depending on his interest in the court, allowed himself in all manner of wickedness, was a great oppressor, very cruel, and very covetous, patronizing and protecting assassins, Jos. Ant. l. 20. c. 6. And yet Tertullus here, in the name of the high priest and elders, compliments him, as if he were so good a magistrate as never was the like: and this comes the worse from the high priest and the elders, because he had given a late instance of his enmity to their order; for Jonathan the high priest, or one of the chief priests, having offended him, by too free an invective against the tyranny of his government, he got him murdered by some villains whom he hired for that purpose, and who afterward did the like for others, as they were hired: and that even in the temple itself.

(1.) To give him his due, he had been instrumental to suppress the insurrection of that Egyptian whom the chief captain spake of, ch. 21:38. but will the praise of that screen him from the just reproach of his tyranny and oppression afterward? See here, [1.] The unhappiness of great men, and a great unhappiness it is, to have their services magnified beyond measure, and never to be faithfully told of their faults; and hereby they are hardened and encouraged in evil. [2.] The policy of bad men, by flattering princes in what they do amiss, to draw them in to do worse. The bishops of Rome got to be confirmed in their exorbitant church power, and have been assisted in persecuting the servants of Christ, by flattering and caressing usurpers and tyrants, and so making them the tools of their malice, as the high priest, by his compliments, designed to make Felix here.

(2.) They promise to retain a grateful sense of it, v. 3. 'We accept it always, and in all places, everywhere and at all times, we embrace it, we admire it, most noble Felix, with all thankfulness.' Had this been true, it had been just; the benefits we enjoy by government, especially by wise and good governors, are what we ought to be thankful for, both to God and man.

(3.) They therefore expect his favor in this cause, v. 4. They pretend a great care not to entrench on his time; 'We will not be further tedious to thee,' and yet to be very confident of his patience, 'hear us of thy clemency a few words.' All this address is only to induce him to give countenance to their cause; and they were so conscious it would soon appear to have more malice than matter in it, they found it necessary thus to insinuate themselves into his favor. Everybody knew the high priest and the elders were enemies to the Roman government; and yet, to gain their ends against Paul, they, by their counsel, show him all this respect; as they did to Pilate and Cesar, when persecuting our Savior. Princes cannot always judge of the affections of their people by their applauses; flattery is one thing, true loyalty another.

2. One of the best of men is here accused as one of the worst of malefactors, only because he was the prisoner. After a flourish of flattery, in which you cannot see matter for words, he comes to his business, and it is, to inform his excellency concerning the prisoner at the bar; and this part of his discourse is as nauseous for its rallery, as the former for its flattery. I pity the man, and believe he has no malice against Paul, nor does he think as he speaks in calumniating him, any more than he did in courting Felix; but as I cannot but be sorry that a man of wit and sense should have such a saleable tongue, as one calls it, so I cannot but be angry at those dignified men, that had such malicious hearts as to put such words into his mouth. Tertullus complains,

(1.) That the peace of the nation was disturbed by Paul. Innocence, nay excellence and usefulness, are no fence against calumny, no, nor against the impressions of calumny on the minds both of magistrates and multitudes, to excite their fury and jealousy; for be the representation ever so unjust, when enforced, as here, with gravity and pretence of sanctity, and with assurance and noise, something will stick. The old charge against God's prophets, was, that they were the troublers of the land, and against

God's Jerusalem, that it was a rebellious city, hurtful to kings and provinces, Ezra 4: 15, 19. and against our Lord Jesus, that He perverted the nation, and forbade to give tribute to Cesar; it is the very same against Paul here; and, though utterly false, is averred with all the confidence imaginable. They do not say, 'We suspect him;' but, as if the thing were past dispute, 'We have found him, often and long found him, a pestilent fellow;' as if he were a traitor and rebel already convict. [1.] Paul was a useful man, and a great blessing to his country, a man of exemplary candor and goodness, obliging to all, and provoking to none; yet he is here called a pestilent fellow, v. 5. the plague of the nation, a walking pestilence; which supposes him to be a turbulent man, malicious and ill-natured, that threw all things in disorder wherever he came. Many a good sermon he had preached, and many a good work he had done, and for those he is called a pestilent fellow. [2.] Paul was a peacemaker, a preacher of that Gospel which has a direct tendency to slay all enmities, and to establish true and lasting peace; he lived peaceably and quietly himself, and taught others to do so too, and yet is here represented as a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout the world. The Jews were disaffected to the Roman government, the most bigoted, most so. This Felix knew, and had therefore a watchful eye on them; now they would fain make him believe that this Paul was the man that made them so, whereas they themselves sowed the seeds of faction and sedition: and they knew it; and the reason why they hated Christ and his religion, was, because He did not go about to head them in an opposition to the Romans. The Jews were everywhere much set against Paul, and stirred up the people to clamor against him; they moved sedition in all places where he came, and then [like all mobs and mobbers] cast the blame unjustly on him, as if he had been the mover of the sedition; as Nero not long after set Rome on fire, and said that the Christians did it. [3.] Paul was a man of catholic charity, who did not affect to be singular, but made himself the servant of all for their good; and yet he is here charged to be a ringleader, lit. standard-bearer, of the sect of the Nazarenes. Now it was true, Paul was an active, leading man in propagating Christianity. But, 1st. It was utterly false that that was a sect; he did not draw people to a party or private opinion, nor did he make his own opinions their rule. True Christianity establishes that which is of common concern to all mankind, publishes good-will to men, and shows us God in Christ reconciling the world to Himself, and therefore cannot be thought to take its rise from such narrow opinions and private interests as sects owe their original to. True Christianity has a direct tendency to the uniting of men, and the gathering of them together in one; and, as far as it obtains its just power and influence on the minds of men, will make them meek and quiet, and peaceable and loving, and every way easy, acceptable, and profitable one to another, and therefore is far from being a sect, which is supposed to lead to division, and to sow discord. True Christianity aims at no worldly benefit or advantage, and therefore must by no means be called a sect. Those that espouse a sect, are governed in it by their secular interests, they aim at wealth and honor; but the professors of Christianity are so far from this, that they expose themselves thereby to the loss and business, used to repair to the provinces with the consuls and prætors, in order, by managing the causes of the provincials, to fit themselves for more important ones at Rome.

9 And the Jews also assented, saying that these things were so.

10 ¶ Then Paul, after that the governor had beckoned unto him to speak, answered, Forasmuch as I know that thou hast been of many years a judge unto this nation, I do the more cheerfully answer for myself:

11 Because that thou mayest understand, that there are yet but twelve days since I went up to Jerusalem for to worship.

12 And they neither found me in the temple disputing with any man, neither raising up the people, neither in the synagogues, nor in the city:

13 Neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me.

14 But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and the prophets;

15 And have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust.

ruin of all that is dear to them in this world. 2dly. It is invidiously called the sect of the Nazarenes, by which Christ was represented as of Nazareth, whence no good thing was expected to arise; whereas He was of Bethlehem. 3dly. It was false, that Paul was the author or standard-bearer of this sect; for he did not draw people to himself, but to Christ; did not preach himself, but Christ Jesus. [4.] Paul had a veneration for the temple, as it had been the place God chose, to put his name there, and had lately himself with reverence attended the temple-service; yet it is here charged on him, that he went about to profane the temple, and that he designedly put contempt on it, and violated the laws of it, v. 6. Their proof of this failed; for the matter of fact they alleged was utterly false, and they knew it. ch. 21:29.

(2.) That the course of justice against Paul was obstructed by the chief captain. [1.] They pleaded, that they took him, and would have judged him according to their law. This was false; they did not go about to judge him according to their law, but, contrary to all law and equity, went about to beat him to death, or to pull him to pieces, without hearing what he had to say for himself; went about, under pretence of having him into their court, to throw him into the hands of ruffians, that lay in wait to destroy him. [2.] They reflected on the chief captain, as having done them an injury in rescuing Paul; whereas he therein not only did him justice, but them the greatest kindness that could be, in preventing the guilt they were bringing on themselves. When David in a heat of passion was going on a bloody enterprise, he thanked Abigail for stopping him, and God for sending her to do it, so soon did he correct and recover himself; not so these cruel men. [3.] They referred themselves to Felix and his judgment, yet seeming uneasy at the necessity, 'the chief captain, v. 8. having forced us to give your excellency this trouble, and ourselves too.'

III. The Jews' assent to this charge, v. 9. 1. Some think, this speaks the proof of their charge by witnesses on oath, that were examined as to the particulars, and attested them. And no wonder, if, when they had found an orator that would say it, they found witnesses that would swear it, for money. 2. It rather seems to intimate, the approbation the high priest and elders gave to what Tertullus said; so they made themselves guilty of all the falsehood in his speech. Many that have not learning enough to plead, yet have wickedness enough to vote for Baal.

V. 10—21. Here is Paul's defence, and there appears in it a great deal of the spirit of wisdom and holiness, and an accomplishment of Christ's promise, that when before governors and kings, for his sake, it should be given his followers in that same hour what to speak. He did not presently fly out into passionate exclamations against the iniquity of the times and the men, but waited for a permission from the judge to speak in his turn; v. 10. He made no reflections on Tertullus; he knew he spoke for his fee, and therefore despised what he said, and levelled his defence against his employers. And here,

I. He addresses himself very respectfully to the governor. He was very cheerful when he had an indifferent person to be his judge; nay, when he considers who his judge is, he answers the more cheerfully; and why so? he does not say, 'Because I know thee to be a judge of inflexible justice and integrity, that hatest bribes, and in giving judgment fearest God, and regardest not men;' but, I know thou hast been many years a judge to this nation; and that was very true. And being so, 1. He could say, of his own knowledge, that there had not formerly been any complaints against Paul; therefore he was not an old offender, nor so dangerous a criminal as represented. 2. He was well acquainted with the Jewish [laws and] nation, and with its temper and spirit; he knew how bigoted they were to their own way, what furious zealots they were against all that did not comply with them, how peevish and perverse they generally were; and therefore would make allowances for that in their accusation of him, and not regard what he had reason to think came so much from party-malice.

II. He denies the facts he was charged with, Moving sedition, and profaning the temple; crimes [the latter of which] they knew the Roman governors were not accustomed to inquire into, and therefore they hoped the governor would return him back to them to be judged by their law, and that was all they wished for. But Paul desires, that though he would not inquire into the crimes, he would protect one that was unjustly charged with them, from those whom he knew to be spiteful and ill-natured enough. Now he would have him to understand, 1. That he came up to Jerusalem on purpose to worship God in peace and holiness, so far was he from any design to move sedition, or profane the temple. He came to keep up his communion with the Jews, not to affront them. 2. That it was but 12 days since he came up, and he had been 6 days a prisoner; he was alone, and it could not be supposed that in so short a time he could do the mischief they charged on him. And as for what he had done in other countries, they knew nothing of it but by uncertain report, by which the matter was very unfairly represented. 3. If he was a mover of sedition among all the Jews, surely he would have been industrious to make a party at Jerusalem: but he did not. He was in the temple, attending the public service there; in the synagogues, where the law was read and opened; he went about in the city among his relations and friends, and conversed freely in the places of concourse, and he was a man of a great genius and an active spirit; and yet they could not charge him with offering anything either against the faith, or against the peace of the Jewish church. (1.) He had nothing in him of a contradicting spirit, as the movers of sedition have; they never found him disputing with any man, either affronting the learned with captious cavils, or perplexing the weak and simple with curious subtleties; he was ready, if asked, to give a reason of his own hope, and to give instruction to others, but he never picked a quarrel with any man about his religion, nor made that the subject of debate and controversy, and perverse dispute, which ought always to be treated of with humility and reverence, with meekness and love. (2.) He had nothing in him of a turbulent spirit; raising up the people, incensing them against their governors in church or state, or suggesting fears and jealousies concerning public affairs, or setting them at variance one with another, or sowing discord among them; he behaved as became a Christian and minister, with love and quietness, and due subjection to lawful authority; though he could have made, perhaps, as strong a party among the common people as his adversaries, yet he never attempted it. 4. As to moving sedition in other countries, he was wholly innocent, and they could not make good the charge, v. 13. He thus shows the iniquity of his prosecutors, who said what they knew they could not prove, and thereby did him wrong in his name, liberty, and life, and did the judge wrong too, in imposing on him, and doing what in them lay to pervert his judgment. He appeals to the equity of his judge, and awakens him to look about him, that he might not be drawn into a snare by the violence of the prosecution.

V. 10. Many years.] '6 years, or (as Tac.) much longer, at least over Samaria, of which Felix was procurator, while Cnmanus governed the rest of Palestine. Biscoe thinks 7, considerably longer than any of his 3 predecessors. Judge.] The procurator united the judicial power to the civil and military.'

V. 11—17. (11) Mayest understand.] As knowing, that the feast of Pentecost was observed at that time.—(14) God of my fathers.] Had Paul worshipped some other god, than the God of Israel, he would not have been entitled to protection by the Roman laws, made in favor of the Jews.—(15) Just and unjust.] 'The doctrine of the Pharisees, according to Josephus, restrained the resurrection to the just, condemning the unjust to perpetual torments without any resurrection.' Whitby. Mat. 22:23—33.—(17) Alms, &c.] This purpose, of Paul's journey to Rome, is not before mentioned in the history; but it appears evidently in his epistles; and this shows how little the historian aimed to enhance the credit of his principal character. Rom. 15:22—29.—The apostle's answer refers distinctly to the 3 charges brought against him, namely, sedition, heresy, and profanation of the temple. Scorr.

(11.) Twelve.] 'On the 1st day, Paul arrives at Jerusalem; 2d, attends the meeting of the Presbyters; 3d, commences his week of active abstinence, which he continues on the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th, (for so 21:27. seems to require.) On the same 8th day he is attacked by the Jews, and committed to the castle; on the 9th, he is brought before the Sanhedrim; the 10th he spends in the castle, during which the plot is formed; on the night of the 10th, he is removed to Antipatris, where he arrives early on the 11th; and on the 12th day arrives at Cesarea. The days spent at Cesarea are not numbered, since in them he could excite no tumult.'

(14.) Heresy.] 'I cannot but think this a place where the word rendered heresy, which I own to be often indifferent, is used in a bad sense; for Paul intimates, that Christianity did not deserve the name they gave it. Yet while it was not the national religion, but its professors were distinguished from most of their countrymen by their adherence to Christ, as the Leader they chose to follow, they might properly be called a sect, or party of men, unless the very word sect or party be taken always in a bad signification, which none well acquainted with the Greek language can imagine.' [Note, 1 Cor. 11:18, 19.] Dondr.

(15.) They allow.] 'The loter doctrine of the Pharisees, that the just only should rise, in the times now in question was not the general one. Mat. 25:31. John 5:29.'

16 And herein do I exercise myself, to have 'always a conscience void of offence toward God and toward men.

17 Now after many years, I came 'to bring alms to my nation, and offerings.

18 Whereupon certain Jews from Asia found me purified in the temple, neither with multitude, nor with tumult :

19 Who ought to have been here 'before thee, and object, if they had aught against me.

20 Or else let these same here say, if they have found any evil-doing in me, while I stood before the council ;

21 Except it be for this one voice, that I cried standing among them, Touching the resurrection of the dead, I am called in question by you this day.

22 ¶ And when Felix heard these things, having more perfect knowledge of that way, he deferred them, and said, When Lysias 'the chief captain shall come down, I will know the uttermost of your matter.

III. He gives a fair and just account of himself, which at once both clears him from crime, and likewise intimates the true reason of their violence.

1. He acknowledges himself to be one whom they looked upon as a heretic, and that was the reason of their spleen. The chief captain had observed, and the governor now cannot but observe, an uncommon violence and fury in his prosecutors, which they know not what to make of, but, guessing at the crime by the cry, conclude he must needs have been a very bad man : now Paul here unriddles the matter ; I confess, that in the way they call heresy, or a sect, so worship I. The controversy is in a matter of religion, and such controversies are commonly managed with most fury and violence. It is no new thing for the right way of worshipping God to be called heresy ; and for the best of God's servants to be stigmatized and run down as sectaries. The reformed churches are called heretical ones by those who themselves hate to be reformed, and are themselves heretics. Let us therefore never be driven off from any good way by its being put into an ill name ; for true and pure Christianity is never the worse, nor to be the worse thought of for its being called heresy ; no, not though it be called so by the high priest and the elders.

2. He vindicates himself from this imputation : he is not a heretic ; for,

(1.) He worships the God of his fathers, and therefore is right in the Object of his worship. If he had said, Let us go after gods we have not known, Deut. 13:2. they might justly call his way heresy, a drawing of them aside into a by-path, and a dangerous one ; but he worships the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, not only the God whom they worshipped, but the God who took them into covenant with Himself, and was, and would be, called their God. Paul adheres to that covenant, and sets up no other in opposition to it. The promise made unto the fathers, Paul preached as fulfilled to the children, ch. 13: 32, 33. and so directed both his own devotions, and those of others, to God, as the God of their fathers. He also refers to the practice of all his pious ancestors ; his religion gloried in its antiquity, and in an uninterrupted succession of its professors. It is very comfortable in our worshipping God, to have an eye to Him, as the God of our fathers ; what an emphasis is laid on that, Ex. 15:2.

(2.) He believes all things written in the law and the prophets, and therefore is right in the rule of his worship ; his religion is grounded on, and governed by, the Holy Scriptures ; they are his oracle and touchstone, and he speaks and acts according to them. He receives them entire, and believes all things there written ; and he receives them pure, for he says no other things than what are contained in them ; as he explains himself, ch. 26: 22. He sets not up any other rule of faith or practice but the Scriptures,—not tradition, nor the authority of the church, or the infallibility of any man or company of men on earth, nor the light within, or human reason ; but divine revelation, as it is in the Scripture, is that which he resolves to live and die by, therefore he is not a heretic.

(3.) He has his eye on a future state, and is a believing expectant of that, therefore is right in the end of his worship. [1.] There shall be a resurrection of the dead, the dead bodies of men, of all men from the beginning to the end of time ; it is certain, not only that the soul does not die with the body, but that the body itself* shall live again ; we have not only another life to live when our present life is at an end, but there is to be another world, which shall commence when this world is at an end, into which all men must enter at once by a resurrection from the dead, as they entered into this, one after another, by their birth. [2.] It shall be a resurrection both of the just and of the unjust, John 5: 29. See Dan. 12: 2. This implies, that it will be a resurrection to a final judgment, by which all men will be determined to everlasting happiness or misery in a world of retribution, according to what they were, and what they did, in this state of probation and preparation. The just shall rise, by virtue of their union with Christ as their Head ; the unjust, by virtue of Christ's dominion over them as their Judge. [3.] God is to be depended on for the resurrection of the dead ; I have hope toward God, and in God, that there shall be a resurrection ; it shall be effected by the almighty power of God, in performance of the word God hath spoken ; so that they who doubt of it, betray their ignorance, both of the Scriptures, and of the power of God, Mat. 22: 29. [4.] The resurrection of the dead is a fundamental article of our creed, as it was also [of] that of the Jewish church ; it is what they themselves also allow ; nay, it was the expectation of the ancient patriarchs, witness Job's confession of his faith ; but it is more clearly revealed and more fully confirmed by the Gospel, therefore, they who believe it, should have been thankful to the preachers of the Gospel for their explanations and proofs of it, instead of opposing them. [5.] In all our religion we ought to have an eye to the other world, and to serve God, in all instances, with a confidence in Him, that there will be a resurrection of the dead, doing all in preparation for that.

(4.) His conversation is of a piece with his devotion, v. 16. Prophets and their doctrine were to be tried by their fruits. Paul was far from having made shipwreck of a good conscience, and therefore it is not likely he has made shipwreck of the faith, the mystery of which is best held in a pure conscience. This protestation of Paul, is to the same purport with that which he made before the high priest, ch. 23: 1.

IV. Having made confession of his faith, he gives a plain and faithful account of his case, and of the wrong done him by his persecutors. Twice he had been rescued by the chief captain out of the hand of the Jews, when they were ready to pull him to pieces, and he challenges them to prove him guilty of any crime either time.

1. In the temple. It was very hard to accuse him as an enemy to their nation, when after long absence from Jerusalem he came to bring alms to his nation, money which, though he had need enough himself of, yet he had collected among his friends, for the relief of the poor at Jerusalem. It was very hard to accuse him of having profaned the temple, when he brought offerings to the temple, and was himself at charges therein, ch. 21: 24. and was found purifying himself in the temple, according to the law, v. 18. and that in a very quiet, decent manner, neither with multitude nor with tumult ; though he was a man so much talked of, he was far from coveting to show himself, when he came to Jerusalem, or of being crowded after, but went to the temple, as much as was possible, incognito ; they were Jews from Asia, his enemies, that made him to be taken notice of ; they had no pretence to make a tumult and raise a multitude against him, for he had neither multitude nor tumult for him. And as for what was perhaps suggested to Felix, that he had brought Greeks into the temple, contrary to their law, and the governor ought to reckon with him for that, the Romans having stipulated with the nations that submitted to them, to preserve them in their religion, he challenges them to prove it, v. 19. 'Those Jews of Asia ought to have been here before thee, that they might have been examined, whether they had aught against me, that they would stand by and swear to ;' for some that will not scruple to tell a lie, have such hearings of conscience, that they scruple confirming it with an oath.

2. In the council ; 'Since the Jews of Asia are not here, to prove anything on me done amiss in the temple, let these same that are here, the high priest and the elders, say, whether they have found any evil doing in me, or if I were guilty of any misdemeanor when I stood before the council, when also they were ready to pull me in pieces, v. 20. When I was there, they could not take offence at anything I said ; for all I said was, Touching the resurrection of the dead, I am called in question by you this day, v. 21. which gave no offence to any but the Sadducees. This, I hope, was no crime, that I stuck to that which is the faith of the whole Jewish church, excepting those whom they themselves call heretics.'

V. 22—27. I. Felix adjourned the cause, and took time to consider of it, v. 22. He had a more perfect knowledge of that way called heresy, than the high priest and the

V. 20. 'A delicate irony. "Except for one speech, if they can make a crime of that." Paul not unfrequently uses irony, as in 2 Cor. 12:13. &c.' Beza.

V. 22. Having more perfect knowledge, &c. [The words in the original are very ambiguous, and might be rendered, "That Felix, when he had heard these things, having been more accurately informed concerning this way of Christianity, and knowing it not to be so mischievous a thing as these accusers suggested, put them off." But I rather think [contrary to Scott and Whitby] with Beza, Grotius, and others, that they are all the words of Felix, and take the meaning to be, "that he would take an opportunity of being more particularly informed of [144]

this sect, and of its aspect on the public tranquillity, and when Lysias should come, and give him an account of what he had observed concerning it, as well as of the circumstances attending Paul's apprehension, &c., he would determine the affair." Which answer was the more proper, as Paul did not deny, that he was indeed a leading person among the Christians, which made a part of their accusation ; and we soon after find, that Felix sent for Paul to give him an account of his religion, v. 24. and endeavored by this, as well as other means, to inform himself in it.' Doddr. 'He saw that the case involved, in part, a question of law, and in part, a question of fact ; the former, whether this sect of the Nazarenes was opposed to the law of the Jews ; and the latter, 23 And he commanded a centurion to keep Paul, and to let him have <sup>z</sup>liberty, and that he should forbid none of his acquaintance to minister or to come unto him.

24 ¶ And after certain days, when Felix came with his wife Drusilla, which was a Jewess, he sent for Paul, and heard him concerning the faith in Christ.

25 And as he reasoned of <sup>v</sup>righteousness, temperance, <sup>z</sup>and judgment <sup>a</sup>to come, Felix <sup>b</sup>trembled, and answered, Go <sup>c</sup>thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee.

26 ¶ He hoped also that money <sup>d</sup>should have been given him of Paul, that he might loose him: wherefore he sent for him the oftener, and communed with him.

elders thought; he understood something of the Christian religion; for, living at Caesarea, where Cornelius, a Roman centurion, was, who was a Christian, from him and others he had got a notion of Christianity, that it was not such an evil thing as represented; he himself knew some of that way to be honest, good men, and very conscientious; and, therefore, he put off the prosecutors with an excuse. Now, 1. It was a disappointment to the high priest and the elders. But thus, sometimes, God restrains the wrath of his people's enemies by the agency, not of their friends, but of strangers. 2. It was an injury to Paul, that he was not released; Felix ought to have released him, when he so plainly saw there was nothing but malice in the prosecution, Ps. 82:4. But what good could be expected from such a judge?

II. He continued the prisoner in custody, v. 23. did not commit him to the common jail, but took care he should be a prisoner at large; his keeper must let him have liberty, not bind him, or lock him up, but make his confinement as easy to him as possible; the high priest and the elders grudged him his life, but Felix generously allows him a sort of liberty; for he had not their prejudices against him and his way; he also gave orders, that none of his friends should be hindered from coming and ministering to him; and a man's prison is, as it were, his own house, if he has but his friends about him.

III. He had frequent conversation with him afterward in private, once particularly, not long after his public trial, v. 24, 25. Observe,

1. Felix's design in this; he had a mind to talk with Paul more freely than he could in open court, where he observed Paul or his guard, concerning the faith of Christ, the Christian religion; and this only to satisfy his curiosity, or rather the curiosity of his wife Drusilla, which was a Jewess, daughter of Herod Agrippa, that was eaten of worms; being educated in the Jewish religion, she was more inquisitive concerning the Christian religion, which pretended to be the perfection of that, and desired to hear Paul discourse of it. But it was no great matter what religion she was of; for, whatever it was, she was a reproach and scandal to it; a Jewess, but an adulteress; she was another man's wife when Felix took her to be his wife, and she lived with him in whoredom, and was noted for an impudent woman, yet she desires to hear concerning the faith of Christ. Many are fond of new notions and speculations in religion, who yet hate to come under the power and influence of religion.

2. The account Paul gave him of the Christian religion; by the idea he had of it, he expected to be amused with a mystical divinity, but as Paul represents it to him, he is alarmed with a practical divinity. It is probable, Paul mentioned to him the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, concerning the death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus, and his being the Mediator between God and man; but he hastened to his application, in which he designed to come home to the consciences of his hearers, and he discoursed, with clearness and warmth, of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come: and there he showed, (1.) That the faith in Christ is designed to enforce on men the great laws of justice and temperance, Tit. 2:12. These were celebrated virtues among the heathen moralists; if the doctrine Paul preaches, which Felix has heard of as proclaiming liberty, will but free him from an obligation to these, he will readily embrace it; 'No,' says Paul, 'so far from doing so, it strengthens the obligations of those sacred laws; it binds all under the highest penalties to be honest in all their dealings, and to render to all their due; to deny themselves, and to keep under the body, and bring it into subjection.' Paul reasoned of righteousness and temperance, to convince Felix of his unrighteousness and intemperance, which he had been notoriously guilty of; that, seeing the odiousness of them, and his obnoxiousness to the wrath of God for them, Eph. 5:6. he might inquire concerning the faith of Christ, with a resolution to embrace it. (2.) That by the doctrine of Christ is discovered the judgment to come, by the sentence of which the everlasting state of all men will be finally and irreversibly determined. Paul reasoned concerning this; he showed what reason we have to believe that there is a judgment to come, and what reason we have, in consideration thereof, to be religious.

Now, from this account of the heads of Paul's discourse, we may gather, [1.] That Paul, in his preaching, had no respect of persons, as the Word of God has not: he urges the same convictions and instructions on the Roman governor, that he did on other people. [2.] That he aimed at the consciences of men, and came close to them; sought not to please their fancy, or gratify their curiosity, but led them to a sight of their sins, and a sense of their duty and interest. [3.] That he preferred the serving of Christ, and the saving of souls, before his own safety. He lay at the mercy of Felix, to deliver him back to the Jews, or to release him. Yet, while he has a fair opportunity of ingratiating himself with him, and, on the contrary, if he disoblige him, he may do himself a great diskindness by it, he is wholly negligent of these considerations, and is intent on doing good, at least discharging his duty. [4.] That he was willing to take pains, and run hazards, in his work, even there where there was little probability of doing good. Such hardened sinners, as Felix and Drusilla, were not at all likely to be brought to repentance by Paul's preaching, especially under such disadvantages; yet Paul did not despair.

3. What impressions Paul's discourse made on this great, but bad man; Felix trembled, being put into a fright, or made a terror to himself, a magor-missabib, as Pashur, Jer. 20:3, 4. Paul never trembled before him, but he was made to tremble before Paul. We do not find that Drusilla trembled, though she was equally guilty, for she was a Jewess, and depended on the ceremonial law, which she adhered to the observance of, to justify her; but Felix for the present could fasten on nothing to pacify his conscience, and therefore trembled.

4. How Felix struggled to get clear of these impressions, and to shake off the terror of his convictions, v. 25. He trembled, and that was all. Paul's trembling, ch. 9:6. and the jailer's, ch. 16:29. ended in their conversion, but this of Felix did not. Many are startled by the Word of God, who are not effectually changed by it; are in fear of the consequences of sin, and yet continue in love and league with sin. He did not fight against his convictions, nor fly in the face of the Word, or of the preacher of it; but artfully shifted off his convictions, by putting off the prosecution of them to another time; he has nothing to object against what Paul had said, but, like a sorry debtor, he begs a day; Paul has spent himself, and has tired him and his lady, and therefore, 'Go thy way for this time, break off here, business calls me away; but when I have a convenient season, and nothing else to do, I will call for thee, and hear what thou hast further to say.' Note, (1.) Many lose all the benefit of their convictions for want of striking while the iron is hot. If Felix, now that he trembled, had but asked, as Paul and the jailer did, when they trembled, What shall I do? he might have been brought to the faith of Christ, and have been a Felix indeed, happy for ever; but by dropping his convictions now, he lost them for ever, and himself with them. (2.) In the affairs of our souls, delays are dangerous; nothing is of more fatal consequence than men's putting off their conversion from time to time. The present season is, without doubt, the most convenient season. Behold, now is the accepted time. To-day, if ye will hear his voice.

IV. After all, he continued him a prisoner, and left him so, when two years after he was removed from the government, v. 26, 27. To little purpose had Paul reasoned with him about righteousness, though he then trembled at the thought of his own iniquity, who could thus persist in such a palpable piece of injustice. But here we are told what principles he was governed by herein; and they were such as make the matter yet much worse:

1. The love of money. He would not release Paul, because he hoped that at length his friends would make a purse to purchase his liberty: he cannot find in his heart to do his duty as a judge, unless he can get money by it. In hopes of that, he continues Paul a prisoner, and sends for him the oftener, and communed with him; not any more about the faith of Christ, he had had enough of that, but about his discharge, or ransom, rather. He cannot, for shame, ask Paul, what he

V. 24-27. Drusilla was daughter to that Herod, who beheaded James the brother of John, 12:1, 2. and sister to king Agrippa, who is afterwards mentioned. 25:13-27. She was married to Azizus, king of the Emesenes, who had been circumcised in order to obtain her; but she had left her husband to cohabit with Felix, being a very profligate woman.—Neither the apostle, nor his friends, would purchase his liberty, by becoming accessory to the bribery and extortion of Felix; they would not 'do evil, that good might come.'—'It was during the two years of Paul's imprisonment here, that these contentions arose between the <sup>2</sup> The Jews accuse Paul before Festus. 8 He answereth for himself, 11 and appealeth unto Cesar. 14 Afterwards Festus openeth his matter to king Agrippa, 23 and he is brought forth. 25 Festus cleareth him of having done any thing worthy of death.

NOW when Festus was come into the province, after three days he ascended from Cesarea to Jerusalem.

2 Then the high priest and the chief of the Jews informed him against Paul, and besought him, will give him to release him, but he sends for him, to feel his pulse, and give him an opportunity to ask what he would take to release him. And now we see what became of his promise, both to Paul and to himself, that he would hear more of Christ, at some other convenient season. Here were many seasons convenient enough to have talked that matter through, but nothing is done in it; all his business now is to get money by Paul, not to get the knowledge of Christ by him. It is just with God, to say, concerning those who trifle with their convictions, and think they can have the grace of God at command when they please, My Spirit shall no more strive with them.

3 And desired favor against him, that he would send for him to Jerusalem, laying * wait in the way to kill him.

Paul was but a poor man himself; but Felix knew there were those who wished well to him, who were able to assist him; he having lately collected a deal of money, to relieve the poor saints, it might also be expected that the rich saints should contribute some to release him, and I wonder it was not done; nay, I know not whether his friends can be justified, in not doing it. I ought not to bribe a man to do an unjust thing, but if he will not do me justice without a fee, it is but doing myself justice to give it him; and if they might do it, I blush for them, that they would let such an eminent and useful man as Paul lie in the jail, when a little money would have fetched him out, and restored him to his usefulness again. The Christians here at Cesarea, where he now was, had parted with their tears to prevent his going to the prison, ch. 21:13. but

PRACT. OBS. In how different a light will the characters of Paul and Felix appear, at the day of judgment, than they do in Tertullus' harangue! Let us not then value the applause, or be troubled at the revilings of ungodly men; as the basest and most criminal of the human race have been almost deified by encomiums, and the excellent of the earth have been treated as deserving of universal execration; and this by professors of the true religion! by priests, elders, and persons of chief authority in the visible church!—But they have never rightly understood the doctrines of Paul, who do not 'exercise themselves to have

[it would seem] could not find in their hearts to part with their money to help him out. Yet there might be a providence of God in it; Paul's bonds must be for the furtherance of the Gospel of Christ, and therefore he must continue in bonds. However, this will not excuse Felix.

2. Men pleasing. He was willing to do the Jews a pleasure; though he would not deliver Paul to death, to please them, yet he would continue him a prisoner rather than offend them; and he did it in hope hereby to atone for his many offences against them. Thus they who do some base things, are tempted to do more, to screen themselves and bear them out. But it seems he did not gain his point; the Jews, notwithstanding this, accused him to the emperor, and some historians say he was sent bound to Rome by Festus; and if so, surely his remembering how light he had made of Paul's bonds, would help to make his own heavy. Those that aim to please God, by doing good, will have what they aim at; but so will not they that seek to please men by doing evil.

CHAP. XXV. Some think Felix was turned out, and Festus succeeded him, quickly after Paul's imprisonment; and that the two years, mentioned in the close of the foregoing ch., are to be reckoned from the beginning of Nero's reign; but it seems more natural to compute it from Paul's being delivered into the hands of Felix; however, we have here much the same management of Paul's case, as we had in the foregoing ch.

V. 1—12. Festus, the new governor, like Felix, is not just to Paul, for he does not release him; and yet not so unjust as the Jews would have him, for he will not condemn him to die, nor expose him to their rage.

1. The high priests and other Jews press the governor to send Paul to Jerusalem, in effect, to abandon him.

1. See how restless a thing malice is! As soon as ever Festus was come into the province, and had taken possession of the government, within 3 days, as he went up to Jerusalem, to show himself there, presently the priests were upon him to proceed against Paul; we do not find that Paul, in the 3 days Festus stayed at Cesarea, made any application to him to release him! Paul more patiently bears the lengthening out of his imprisonment, than his enemies do the delay of his prosecution even to the death.

2. How spiteful their application. They informed the governor against Paul, v. 2. before a fair trial, that so they might, if possible, prejudice the cause with the governor, and make him a party, who was to be the judge. But this artifice, though base enough, they could not confide in; for the governor would be sure to hear him himself, and then all their informations against him would fall to the ground; therefore they form another project much more base, and hellish, and that is, to assassinate Paul before he came on his trial.—Such is their malice against the Gospel of Christ; and this too under color of zeal for Moses.

3. How specious the pretence. Now that the governor was himself at Jerusalem, designing to waylay Paul, they desired he would send for him thither, and try him there, which would save the prosecutors a great deal of labor, and looked most reasonable, because he was charged with having profaned the temple at Jerusalem, and it is usual for criminals to be tried in the court where the fact was committed. It is said, They desired favor against Paul. The business of prosecutors is, to demand justice against one they suppose to be a criminal, and, if he be not proved so, it is as much justice to acquit him as it is to condemn him if he be. But to desire favor against a prisoner, and from the judge too, who ought to be of counsel for him, is a very impudent thing. The favor ought to be for the prisoner, to favor his life, but here they desire it against him. They will take it as a favor if the governor will but condemn Paul, though they can prove no crime on him!

II. The governor's resolution that Paul shall take his trial at Cesarea, v. 4, 5. It does not appear he had any suspicion, much less any certain information, of their bloody design, ch. 23:30. but whatever his reason for refusing it, God made use of it as a mean of preserving Paul out of their hands. Yet he will do the prosecutors the justice to hear what they have to say against Paul, at Cesarea. 'Let them among you who are able in body and purse, or in mind and tongue, those who are fit to be managers; or, who are competent witnesses, able to prove anything criminal on him, let them go down.'

III. Paul's trial before Festus; since they are so eager in the prosecution, he is willing this cause should be first called on his return, v. 6. Expedition in administering justice is very commendable, provided more haste be not made than good speed.

1. The court is set, and the prisoner called to the bar. Christ, to encourage his disciples, and keep up their spirits under such awful trials of their courage, as this was to Paul, promised them, that the day should come when they should sit on thrones, judging the tribes of Israel.

2. The prosecutors exhibit their charge against the prisoner, v. 7. The Jews stood round about, which intimates, that they were many, also unanimous, intent on the prosecution, and eager in clamoring against Paul; they stood round about, if possible, to frighten the judge into a compliance with their malicious design; however, to frighten the prisoner, and, at least, to put him out of countenance; but in vain; he had too just and a conscience void of offence towards God and man.' 1 Pet. 3:13—16. In a continual application of the blood of Jesus, and an habitual dependence on his grace, we should daily seek to have our conduct and temper more and more conformed to his holy precepts, as the rule of our duty. Thus our actions will recommend our principles; our kindness even to those who injure us will expose the malignity of our accusers; and a sober, righteous, and godly life will prove the most effectual refutation of all their calumnies. NOTES. CHAP. XXV. V. 1—5. It was very wonderful, that Festus [146] should refuse to gratify the great men of the nation, which he was appointed to govern, by sending for Paul to Jerusalem; as he staid in that city long enough to have heard his cause there. But God was pleased thus to influence his mind, in order to Paul's preservation.—'When we consider, how much edification to the churches depended on Paul's life, and how evidently, under God, his life depended on this resolution of Festus; it must surely lead us to reflect, by what invisible springs the blessed God governs the world; with what silence, and yet at the same time with what wisdom and energy!' 5 Let them therefore, said he, which among you are able, go down with me, and accuse this man, if there be any wickedness in him.

6 And when he had tarried among them<sup>b</sup> more than ten days, he went down unto Cesarea; and the next day sitting on the judgment-seat, commanded Paul to be brought.

7 And when he was come, the Jews which came down from Jerusalem stood round about, and laid many and grievous complaints against Paul, which<sup>c</sup> they could not prove.

8 ¶ While he answered for himself, Neither against the law of the Jews, neither against the temple, nor yet against Cesar, have I offended any thing at all.

9 But Festus, willing to do the Jews a pleasure, answered Paul, and said, Wilt thou go up to Jerusalem, and there be judged of these things before me?

10 Then said Paul, I stand at Cesar's judgment-seat, where I ought to be judged: to the Jews have I done no wrong, as thou very well knowest.

11 For if I be an offender, or have committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die: but if there be none of these things whereof these accuse me, no man may deliver me unto them. I appeal<sup>d</sup> unto Cesar.

12 Then Festus, when he had conferred with the council, answered, Hast thou appealed unto Cesar? unto Cesar shalt thou go.

strong an assurance to be dashed by them. Ps. 118:12. When they stood round about him, they brought many and grievous accusations against Paul, so it should be read; they charged him with high crimes and misdemeanors; the articles of impeachment were many, and contained things of a very heinous nature; but when they had opened the cause, and came to the evidence, there they failed; they could not prove what they alleged against him, for it was all false, the complaints groundless and unjust; either the fact was not as they opened it, or there was no fault in it; they laid to his charge things that he knew not, nor they neither. It is no new thing for the most excellent ones of the earth to have all manner of evil said against them falsely, not only in the song of the drunkards, and on the seat of the scornful, but even before the judgment-seat.

3. The prisoner's insisting on his own vindication, v. 8. His general plea, is, Not guilty; Neither against the law of the Jews, nor against the temple, nor yet against Cesar, have I offended anything at all. By this, it appears, that now, his cause being brought before the government, to curry favor with the governor, and seem friends to Cesar, they had charged him with some instances of disaffection, which obliged him to purge himself, protesting he was no enemy to Cesar.

IV. Paul's appeal to the emperor, and the occasion of it; this gave the cause a new turn; whether he had before designed it, or whether it was a sudden resolve on the present provocation, does not appear; but [it was his only chance for his life, and] God puts it into his heart to do it, to bring it about that he bear witness to Christ at Rome, for there the emperor's court was, ch. 23: 11. We have here,

1. The proposal Festus made to Paul, to go and take his trial at Jerusalem, v. 9. Festus was inclined to gratify the prosecutors, rather than the prisoner, as far as he could go with safety against one that was a citizen of Rome; he would not offer to turn him over to the high priest and the Sanhedrim, as the Jews would have had him; but, Wilt thou go thither, and be judged of these things before me? He might, if he had pleased, have ordered him thither, but he would not do it without his consent, which, if he could have wheedled him to give it, would have taken off the odium of it. In suffering times, the prudence of the Lord's people is tried, as well as their patience; being sent forth therefore as sheep in the midst of wolves, they have need to be wise as serpents.

2. Paul's refusal, and his reasons. He knew, if he were removed to Jerusalem, notwithstanding the utmost vigilance of the president, the Jews would find some means or other to murder him; therefore he pleads, (1.) That, as a citizen of Rome, it was most proper for him to be tried, not only by the president, but in what was properly his court, at Cesarea, the metropolis of the province. The court being held in Cesar's name, and by his authority and commission, before one delegated by him, it might well be said to be his judgment-seat, as all writs run in the name of the sovereign, [whether an individual, a state, or the people,] in whose name all courts are held. Paul's owning that he ought to be judged at Cesar's judgment-seat, plainly proves, that Christ's ministers are not exempted from the jurisdiction of the civil powers, but ought to be subject to them, as far as they can with a good conscience; and, if they be guilty of a real crime, to submit to their censure; if innocent, yet to submit to their inquiry, and to clear themselves before them. (2.) That, as a member of the Jewish nation, he had done nothing to make himself obnoxious to them; no wrong, as Festus knew. It very well becomes the innocent, to plead their innocency, and insist on it; it is a debt we owe to our own good name, not only not to bear false witness against ourselves, but to maintain our own integrity against those who bear false witness against us. (3.) That he was willing to abide by the rules of the law, and to let that take its course, v. 11. *Not that all who have committed anything worthy of death, are obliged to accuse themselves, and offer themselves to justice; * but when accused and brought to justice, they ought to submit, and to say, both God and the government are righteous. But if he be innocent, as he protests, 'If the prosecution be malicious, and they are resolved to have my blood, right or wrong, no man may deliver me unto them, no, not the governor himself, without palpable injustice; for it is his business as much to protect the innocent, as to punish the guilty;'* and he claims his protection.

3. Since he is continually in danger of the Jews, and one attempt is made after another to get him into their hands, he flies to the last refuge of oppressed innocency, and takes sanctuary there, since he cannot have justice done him in any other way; 'I appeal unto Cesar, rather than be delivered to the Jews,' which Festus seems inclined to consent to. So David, 1 S. 27:1. But it is a hard case, that a son of Abraham must appeal to a Philistine, to a Nero, from those who call themselves the seed of Abraham, and shall be safer in Gath or Rome, than in Jerusalem! How is the faithful city become a harlot!

V. The judgment given. Paul is neither released nor condemned; both his enemies and his friends are disappointed, the thing is left as it was. It is an instance of the slow steps Providence [for good ends] sometimes takes.

The president, when he had advised with his council, determines to send Paul to Rome; some think, Paul meant not an appeal to Cesar's person, but only to his court, and that Festus might have chosen whether he would have sent him to Rome, or, at least, whether he would have joined issue with him on the appeal; but, it should seem, by what Agrippa said, ch. 26: 32. that, by the course of the Roman law, a Roman citizen might appeal at any time to a superior court, even to the supreme; as with us. Festus therefore, either of choice or of course, comes to this resolution; he found there was something very extraordinary in the ease, which he was therefore afraid of giving judgment on, either one way or other; and the knowledge of which he thought would be an entertainment to the emperor, therefore he transmitted it to his cognizance.

V. 13—27. We have here the preparation made for another hearing of Paul before king Agrippa, not in order to his giving judgment on him, but to his giving advice concerning * Why not? are they not obliged to bring others to justice? Ed.

(5.) Able. 'Rather, of credit and might: so the Gr. is used very frequently in the classics, also in Philo. and Jos. This tr. is supported by the Syr. and Vulg., and so Zeger, Cam., Pric., Wets., Pearce, Krebs, Ros., Loesner, and Kuin.'

V. 8. Against Cesar. The epistle to the Romans, in which submission to the existing powers, without excepting the most faulty characters, is decidedly enforced, was written before this time. SCOTT.

V. 9—11. This proposal renders it the more wonderful, that he did not before send for him to Jerusalem, at the request of the same persons. 1—5, vv. 4, 5.—It may be supposed, that Festus was not aware of a conspiracy formed against his life; but probably the apostle was fully informed of it; or at least was assured, that no kind or degree of violence or deceit would be wanting to murder him. And, though assured by the Lord Himself, that he should 'bear testimony to Him at Rome,' he used all proper means for his own preservation: so far was he from thinking, that the divine decrees and man's free agency were incompatible, or that the purposes of God, even when known, render the use of means needless or useless. 2:22—24. 4:23—23. 23:11. 27:29—32.—The Roman governors were the emperor's representatives: the apostle, therefore, as a Roman citizen, when standing at the tribunal of Festus, was in the place where 'he ought to be judged;' but, should he be sent to Jerusalem, to be tried under the influence of the Jewish rulers, he would, independently of plots and conspiracies, be deprived of his privilege. Nero, who is still infamous, was at that time the Roman emperor.

(9.) Before me. 'I. e. under my authority, and subject to my final determination; for a sentence of the Sanhedrim required the confirmation of the president. [Note 24:6.]' BLOOMF.

(10.) I stand, &c. 'Grot. and others have abundantly proved, that the tribunal of the Roman procurators in the provinces, as it was held in Cesar's name, and by commission from him, was looked upon as Cesar's tribunal.' DODDR.

• V. 12. I appeal, &c. 'It is well known, that the Roman law allowed such an appeal to every citizen, before sentence was passed, and made it highly penal for any governor, after that, to proceed to any extremities against the person making it.' Doddr. Council. 'Sumbouloi: the assessores of the president, as they are called by Lamprid. Dio Cass. calls them paredroi, and Suet. consilarii. (Kuin.) This Roman custom seems, like many others, to have been adopted from the Lacedaemonian institutions. Thus we read often, in Thucyd., of these sumbouloi sent with generals and admirals, and sometimes with governors of cities and provinces [to prevent abuses, &c.]' BLOOMF.

V. 13. [Except as suspected of incest,] Agrippa bore a good character; being equitable in his administration, of a generous disposition, and paying a strict attention to the externals of religion. SCOTT.

(13.) King Agrippa. 'Son of Herod Agrippa, spoken of ch. 12:1.

14 And when they had been there many days, Festus declared Paul's cause unto the king, saying, There is a certain man left in bonds by Felix :

15 About whom, when I was at Jerusalem, the chief priests and the elders of the Jews informed me, desiring to have judgment against him.

16 To whom I answered, It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, and have license to answer for himself concerning the crime laid against him.

17 Therefore when they were come hither, without any delay, on the morrow I sat on the judgment-seat, and commanded the man to be brought forth.

18 Against whom, when the accusers stood up, they brought none accusation of such things as I supposed :

19 But I had certain questions against him of their own superstition, and of one Jesus, which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive.

20 And because I doubted of such manner of questions, I asked him whether he would go to Jerusalem, and there be judged of these matters.

21 But when Paul had appealed to be reserved unto the hearing of Augustus, I commanded him to be kept till I might send him to Cesar.

him, or rather to gratify his curiosity. Here is,

I. The kind and friendly visit king Agrippa made to Festus, now on his coming into the government in that province, v. 13.; personal converse is the most pleasant among friends.

1. The visitants were; (1.) King Agrippa, son of that Herod, surnamed Agrippa, who killed James, the apostle, and was himself eaten of worms, and great grandson of Herod the Great, under whom Christ was born. Josephus calls this Agrippa the younger; Claudius, the emperor, made him king of Chalcis, and tetrarch of Trachonitis and Abylene, mentioned Luke 3:1. The Jewish writers, as Lightfoot tells us, relate among other things this story of him, 'That reading the law publicly, in the latter end of the year of release, as was enjoined, when the king came to those words, Deut. 17:15. Thou shalt not set a stranger king over thee, which is not of thy brethren, the tears ran down his cheeks, for he was not of the seed of Israel, which the congregation observing, cried out, Be of good comfort, king Agrippa, thou art our and grandson of Aristobulus, son of Herod the Great. As he was but 17 years of age when his father died, the emperor Claudius did not think proper to appoint him k. of Judea in the room of his father, but made it a Roman province: however, on the death of his uncle Herod, he made him k. of Chalcis, which, after he had governed it four years, he exchanged for a greater kingdom, and gave him the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias, to which Nero afterwards added part of Galilee, with several towns in Perea.' Doddr. Bernice. 'A Macedonian name, for the Macedonians change Ph into B. So Burgas for Phurgas.' Ros. This was also the person whom Titus Vespasian so passionately loved, and whom he would have made empress, had not the elainers of the Romans prevented it.' Doddr.

V. 15. Judgment. 'Sentence of condemnation.' Kuin. 'The judgment they demanded against Paul, was not a trial, but a sentence upon a previous conviction, which they falsely and wickedly pretended: and, probably, it was the knowledge that Festus had of Paul's being a Roman citizen, that engaged him to determine to try the cause himself.' Doddr. (2.) Bernice came with him, she was his own sister, now the widow of his uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, after whose death she lived with this brother of hers, who was suspected to be too familiar with her, and after she was a second time divorced from him, and returned to her brother, king Agrippa. Juvenal, Sat. 6. speaks of a diamond ring, Agrippa gave to Bernice, his incestuous sister; and both Tacitus and Suetonius speak of a criminal intimacy afterward, between her and Titus Vespasian. Drusilla, the wife of Felix, was another sister. Such lewd people, were the great people generally in those times! Say not that the former days were better.

2. Their design was, to salute Festus, to compliment him on his accession to the government, and to keep up a good correspondence with him, that Agrippa, who had the government of Galilee, might act in concert with Festus, who had the government of Judea; but, probably, as much to divert themselves, as to show respect to him, and to share in the entertainments of his court, and to show their fine clothes, which would do vain people no good, if they did not go abroad.

II. The account Festus gave king Agrippa of Paul, and his case. 1. To entertain him; and truly it was a very remarkable story, and worth any man's hearing, not only as surprising and entertaining, but, if truly and fully told, very instructive and edifying; and it would be particularly acceptable to Agrippa, not only because he was a judge, and there were some points of law and practice in it, well worth his notice, but much more as he was a Jew, and there were some points of religion in it, much more deserving his cognizance. 2. To have his advice. Festus was but newly come to be a judge, at least, to be a judge in these parts, therefore is diffident of his own ability, and willing to have the counsel of older and more experienced persons, especially in a matter of so much difficulty as Paul's case seemed to have, and therefore he declared it to the king. Let us now see his particular account of Paul, v. 14—21.

1. He found him a prisoner when he came into office; therefore could not of his own knowledge, give an account of his cause from the beginning, and if there were anything amiss in the first taking of him into custody, Festus is not to answer for that. When Felix left Paul bound, he knew not what he did, knew not but he might have fallen into worse hands than he did, though they were none of the best.

2. That the Jewish Sanhedrim were extremely set against him; 'The chief priests and the elders informed me against him, as a dangerous man, and desired he might therefore be condemned to die.' These being great pretenders to religion, and therefore to be supposed men of honor and honesty, Festus thinks he ought to credit them; but Agrippa knows them better than he, and therefore he desires his advice.

3. That he had insisted on the Roman law in favor of the prisoner, and would not condemn him unheard, v. 16. He seems to upbraid them, as if they reflected on the Romans, and their government, in asking such a thing, or expecting they would condemn a man without trying him; 'No,' says he, 'The Romans allow not of such a piece of injustice among them.' Hear the other side, was become a proverb among them. This rule we ought to be governed by in our private censures, in common conversation. See John 7:51.

4. That he had brought him on his trial, according to the duty of his place, v. 17. had been expeditious in it, and had likewise tried him in the most solemn manner, on the judgment-seat, as they used to do in weightier causes, while those of small moment, they judged on even ground. He called a great court, on purpose for the trial of Paul, that the sentence might be definitive, and the cause ended.

5. That he was extremely disappointed in the charge they brought against him, v. 18, 19. He supposed, by the eagerness of their prosecution, and their urging it thus on the Roman governors, one after another, that they had something to accuse him of that was, (1.) Dangerous either to private property or the public peace; they would prove him a robber, or a murderer, or a rebel against the Roman power. Such were the outcries against the primitive Christians, so loud, so fierce, that the standers-by, who judged of them by those outcries, could not but conclude them the worst of men; and to represent them so was the design of that clamor, as it was against our Savior. (2.) Cognizable in the Roman courts.—But, to his great surprise, he finds the matter is neither so, nor so: they had certain questions, instead of proofs and evidences against him; questions fitter for the schools than for the judgment-seat; questions of their own superstition, so he calls their religion, or rather, that part of it which Paul was charged with doing damage to. The Romans protected their religion according to their law, but not their superstition, nor the tradition of their elders. But the great question, it seems, was concerning one Jesus that was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive. Some think, the superstition he speaks of, was the Christian religion, which Paul preached, and that he had the same notion of it that the Athenians had, that it was the introducing of a new dæmon, even Jesus. See how slightly this Roman speaks of Christ; of the great controversy between the Jews and the Christians, whether He were the Messiah promised or no; and the great proof of his being the Messiah, his resurrection from the dead, as if it were no more than this, There was one Jesus that was dead, and Paul affirmed He was alive. Whereas this Jesus, whom he prides himself in being thus ignorant of, as if He were below his notice, is He that was dead, and is alive, and lives for evermore, and has the keys of hell and of death, Rev. 1:18. What Paul affirmed concerning Jesus, that He is alive, is a truth of such importance, that if it be not true we are all undone!

6. That therefore he had moved it to Paul, that the cause might be adjourned to the Jewish courts, as best able to take cognizance of an affair of this nature, v. 20. that he might not have his conscience burdened with a cause of such a kind.

7. That Paul had chosen rather to remove man citizen, that engaged him to determine to try the cause himself.' Doddr. Scott.

V. 17—19. (19) Superstition. As Festus entertained Agrippa with great respect; so it cannot be supposed, that he would have used the word here tr. superstition, if it had implied any harsh censure of his religion: we must therefore conclude that it was of a doubtful signification; to be understood in a good or evil sense, according to its application. [So Doddr. and Ros.] 17:22—25.—Festus seems to have regarded Paul as a credulous visionary, in affirming that Jesus was alive: but he thought his opponents far more criminal, in persecuting him so virulently on that account; for the matter in contest was in his judgment of no importance! Scott.

V. 21. Augustus. 'Sebastos: this surname [contrary to Doddr.'s remark here] was borne by all the emperors, from Cesar Octavianus, who first assumed it.' Bloomf.

22 Then Agrippa said unto Festus, I would also hear the man myself. To-morrow, said he, thou shalt hear him.

23 ¶ And on the morrow, when Agrippa was come, and Bernice, with great pomp, and was entered into the place of hearing, with the chief captains, and principal men of the city, at Festus' commandment Paul<sup>k</sup> was brought forth.

24 And Festus said, King Agrippa, and all men which are here present with us, ye see this man, about whom all the multitude of the Jews have dealt with me, both at Jerusalem, and also here, crying<sup>m</sup> that he ought not to live any longer.

25 But when I found that he had committed nothing<sup>n</sup> worthy of death, and that he himself hath appealed<sup>o</sup> to Augustus, I have determined to send him.

26 Of whom I have no certain thing to write unto my lord. Wherefore I have brought him forth before you, and specially before thee, O king Agrippa, that, after examination had, I might have somewhat to write.

27 For<sup>p</sup> it seemeth to me unreasonable, to send a prisoner, and not withal to signify the crimes laid against him.

CHAP. XXVI.

2 Paul, in the presence of Agrippa, declareth his life from his childhood, 12 and how miraculously he was converted, and called to his apostleship. 24 Festus chargeth him to be mad, whereunto he answereth modestly. 28 Agrippa is almost persuaded to be a Christian. 31 The whole company pronounce him innocent.

THEN Agrippa said unto Paul, Thou art permitted to speak his cause to Rome, as expecting fairer play from the emperor than from the priests, v. 21. having no other way to stop proceedings here in this inferior court; therefore I have commanded him to be kept a close prisoner till I might send him to Cesar; for I did not see cause to refuse his appeal, but rather was pleased with it.

III. The bringing of him before Agrippa.

1. Agrippa desires it, v. 22. knowing more of this matter than Festus does; he has heard of Paul, and knows of what vast con-

PRACT. OBS. The malignant enmity of hardened persecutors cannot be worn out by length of time, or satisfied with any sufferings of those against whom they are enraged, unless terminating in their violent death. They deem it a peculiar favor, when rulers will gratify their malice; and they have no scruples about conspiracies, assassinations, or massacres, when legal forms fail of effecting their purposes. We cannot, therefore, too much watch against the feeblest risings of that principle, which may be matured into such dire excesses. The most important questions, which relate to the worship of God, the way of eternal salvation, and the grand truths of the Gospel, appear dubious and uninteresting to the politicians and wise men of the world. They can see, however, and condemn the mismanagement, into which men are betrayed by an indiscreet or furious zeal; and this confirms them in their skeptical disregard of religion in general. Yet the day is at hand, when Festus and the whole world will know, that all the temporal concerns of the immense Roman Empire were frivolous, as the toys and sports of children, compared with the single question, whether Jesus the crucified

V. 22. Would also hear myself.] 'No doubt, but Agrippa had learned from his father, by whom, it is to be remembered, James had been put to death, and Peter imprisoned, ch. 12:2, 3, and from many others, something of the history and pretensions of Christianity: so that he would naturally have a curiosity to see and discourse with so eminent a Christian teacher as Paul was; who, on account of what he had been in his unconverted state, was, to be sure, more regarded and talked of among the Jews, than any other of the apostles.'

V. 23, &c. 'Festus, thinking of no such thing, exposes the wickedness of the Jews, and shows the innocence of Paul, even in the presence of kings; and thus marvellously assists the church of God.' Beza. Percern this question is, which Festus makes such a jest of, whether Jesus be alive or no. He would not for all the world have gone to hear Paul preach, any more than Herod to hear Jesus; yet both are glad to have them brought before them, only to satisfy their curiosity. Perhaps Agrippa desired to hear him himself, that he might be in a capacity to do him a kindness, and yet did him none, only put some credit on him.

2. Festus granted it; To-morrow thou shalt hear him. There was a good providence in this, to encourage Paul, who seemed buried alive in his imprisonment, and deprived of all opportunities of doing good; we know not [i. e. certainly; comp. on 24:27.] of any of his epistles, that bore date from his prison at Cesarea; what opportunity he had of doing good to his friends that visited him, and perhaps to a little congregation that might come every Lord's day, was but a low and narrow sphere of usefulness; but this gives him an opportunity of preaching Christ to a great congregation, and, which is more, to a congregation of great ones. And we have reason to think his sermon in the next ch., though not so instrumental as some other, for the conversion of souls, redounded as much to the honor of Christ and Christianity, as any he ever preached.

3. Great preparation was made for it, v. 23. The next day there was a great appearance in the place of hearing, Paul and his cause being much talked of, and the more for their being much talked against. (1.) Agrippa and Bernice took this opportunity to show themselves in state, and to make a figure, and perhaps for that end desired the occasion, that they might see and be seen; for they came with great pomp, richly dressed with gold and pearls, and costly array; with a great retinue of footmen, in rich liveries, which made a splendid show, and dazzled the eyes of the gazing crowd. They came with great [phantasio] fancy, so the word is. Great pomp is but great fancy; it neither adds any real excellency, nor gains any real respect, but feeds a vain humor, which wise men would rather mortify than gratify. It is but a show, a dream, a fantastical thing, so the word signifies; superficial, and it passeth away. And the pomp of this appearance, would put one for ever out of conceit with pomp, when thus stained by their lewd characters (for all virtuous people could not but contemn them in the midst of all, as vile, Ps. 15:4.); and thus outshone by the real glory of the poor prisoner at the bar. What was the honor of their fine clothes, compared with that of his wisdom, and grace, and holiness; his courage and constancy in suffering for Christ! His bonds in so good a cause were more glorious than their chains of gold; and his guards, than their equipage. Who would be fond of worldly pomp, that here sees so bad a woman loaded with it, and so good a man loaded with the reverse? (2.) The chief captain and principal men of the city took this opportunity to pay their respects to Festus, and to his guests; it answered the end of a ball, at court; it brought the fine folks together, in their fine clothes, and served for an entertainment. I am apt to think, that they who were to appear in pomp, perplexed themselves more with care about their clothes, than Paul, who was to appear as a prisoner, did with care about his cause; for he knew whom he had believed, and who stood by him.

IV. Festus introduced the cause; in a speech of much to the same purport with his account to Agrippa. 1. He addresses himself respectfully to the company. 2. He represents the prisoner, as one the Jews had a very great spite against; not only the rulers, but the multitude of them, both at Jerusalem, and here at Cesarea; they could not charge him with any capital crime, but they want to have him out of the way. 3. He confessed the prisoner's innocency; much for Paul's honor, v. 25. on a full hearing of the cause, it appeared, that there was no evidence at all to support the indictment; therefore though inclinable enough to favor the prosecutors, yet his own conscience brought in Paul not guilty. And why not discharge him then? Why truly, because he was so much clamored against, and he feared the clamor would turn on himself if he should. It is pity but every man that has a conscience, should have courage to act according to it. Or, perhaps, because there was so much smoke, he concluded there could not but be some fire, which would appear at last, and he would continue him a prisoner, in expectation of it. 4. He acquaints them with the present state of the case; that the prisoner had appealed to the emperor himself; and that he had admitted his appeal. And thus the cause now stood. 5. He desires their assistance in examining the matter, calmly and impartially, now that there was no danger of their being interrupted, as he had been, with the noisiness and outrage of the prosecutors; that he might have at least such an insight into the cause, as was necessary to his stating it to the emperor, v. 26, 27.; who is supposed to be a man of great business, and therefore every affair must be laid before him, in as little compass as possible. He could not as yet write anything certain concerning Paul; so confused were the informations given in against him, and so inconsistent. He therefore desired he might be thus publicly examined, that he might be advised by them what to write.

was risen from the dead, according to the doctrine of the apostle, or was not risen. Then those who have had the means of instruction, and have despised them, will be most awfully convinced of their sin and folly. But alas! many, who seem to desire information on such questions, only want to gratify a vain curiosity, and not to learn the way to heaven: and 'the great pomp,' with which some of the rich and honorable of this world, attend at 'the places of hearing the Word of God,' nay, at the Lord's table, show, that they are actuated by the same motives as Paul's splendid auditory was, though in a far more aggravated manner.—Ministers, indeed, do not commonly now stand in fetters, as prisoners, to make their defence before their hearers; yet numbers affect rather to sit in judgment on them, as 'offenders for a word,' than to learn from them the truth and will of God, for the salvation of their own souls; and alas, too many preachers seem far more anxious to collect together, and to please, their genteel and splendid congregations, than to 'declare the whole counsel of God,' and to keep themselves pure from the blood of all men.'

It occurs perpetually in his Epistles and Panegyrics. Our idiom will not better express it than by the phrase, our sovereign lord.' See Bl.

the bench, or about it, waiting to hear what he had to say for himself.

V. 1-11. Agrippa was the most honorable, having the title of king, though otherwise having only the power of the other governors under the emperor; and though not here superior, yet senior to Festus, and therefore Festus having opened the cause, Agrippa, as the mouth of the court, intimates to Paul a license given him to speak for himself, v. 1.

I. Paul addresses himself with a very particular respect to Agrippa, v. 2, 3. He is glad he has an opportunity of clearing himself; though an apostle, he is not exempt from the jurisdiction of the civil powers; as we all have benefit by magistracy, so we all must be subject to it. He is glad it is before king Agrippa, who, being himself a proselyte to the Jewish religion, understood all matters relating to that, better than the other Roman governors did. It seems, Agrippa was a scholar, particularly in Jewish learning; he was well versed in the O. T., and therefore could make a better judgment than another on the controversy between him and the Jews, concerning Jesus being the Messiah. Paul designed a long discourse, and begs he would not be weary; he designs a plain discourse, and begs he would hear him with mildness, and not be angry. Paul had some reason to fear, that Agrippa, though the more competent judge, might be soured in some measure with the Jewish leaven, and therefore prejudiced against him as the apostle of the Gentiles; therefore says, to sweeten him, I beseech thee, hear me patiently.

II. He professes, that though hated and branded as an apostate, yet he still adhered to all that good which he was first educated and trained up in; his religion was always built on the promise of God made unto the fathers; and this he still built upon.

1. See here what his religion was in his youth; his manner of life was well known, v. 4, 5. His education was neither foreign nor obscure, it was among his own nation at Jerusalem, where religion and learning flourished; and this, all that could remember so long, and knew him from the beginning, could testify for him, that he was not only of the Jewish religion, but that he was of the most strict sect of that religion, not only called a Pharisee, but lived a Pharisee; nay, of the better sort of Pharisees, brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, an eminent rabbin of the school or house of Hillel, which was in much greater reputation for religion, than the school or house of Samai.

Now if Paul was a Pharisee, and lived a Pharisee, (1.) Then he was a scholar, a man of learning; the Pharisees were well versed in the law, and in the traditional expositions of it. The other apostles were bred fishermen, ch. 4:13. therefore, that the unbelieving Jews might be left without excuse, here is an apostle raised up, that had sat at the feet of their most eminent doctors. (2.) Then he was a moralist, a man of virtue, and not a rake, or a loose, debauched young man, no drunkard or fornicator; and being a young Pharisee, we may hope no extortioner, nor had yet learned the arts of the crafty, covetous, old Pharisees, of devouring widows' houses, but he was, as touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless; therefore, as he could not be thought to have deserted his religion because he did not know it, for he was a learned man; so he could not be thought to have deserted it because he did not love it, or was disaffected to the obligations of it, for he was a virtuous man, and not inclined to any immorality. (3.) Then he was orthodox, sound in the faith, and not a deist or skeptic, or a man of corrupt principles that led to infidelity; he was a Pharisee, in opposition to a Sadducee; he received those books of the O. T. which the Sadducees rejected, believed a world of spirits, the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, and the rewards and punishments of the future state, all which the Sadducees denied. They could not say, He quitted his religion for want of a principle, or for want of a due regard to divine revelation; no, he always had a veneration for the ancient promise made of God unto the fathers, and built his hope on it.

Now, though Paul knew very well that all this would not justify him before God, yet he knew it was for his reputation among the Jews, and an argument such as Agrippa would feel, that he was not such a man as they represented him to be. He knew very well, that all this while he was a stranger to the spiritual nature of the divine law, to heart-religion, and that, except his righteousness exceeded this, he should never go to heaven; yet he reflects on it with some satisfaction, that he had not been before his conversion an atheistical, profane, vicious man, but, according to the light he had, had lived in all good conscience before God.

2. See here what his religion is; he has not indeed such a zeal for the ceremonial law as he had in his youth; the sacrifices and offerings appointed by that, he thinks, are superseded by the great Sacrifice which they typified; ceremonial pollutions and purifications from them he makes no conscience of, and thinks the Levitical priesthood is honorably swallowed up in the priesthood of Christ; but, for the main principles of his religion, he is as zealous for them as ever, and more so, and resolves to live and die by them.

(1.) His religion is built on the promise made of God unto the fathers; built on divine revelation, which he receives and believes, and ventures his soul upon; that promise which was more ancient than the ceremonial law, Gal. 3:17. it may look back as far as the promise made to father Adam, concerning the Seed of the woman, and those discoveries of a future state which the first patriarchs acted faith upon, and were saved by that faith; but it respects chiefly the promise made to father Abraham, that in his seed all the families of the earth should be blessed, and, that God would be a God to him, and to his seed after him. The former meaning Christ, the latter heaven; for if God had not prepared for them a city, He would have been ashamed to have called Himself their God, Heb. 11:16.

(2.) His religion consists in the hopes of this promise; he places it not, as they did, in meats and drinks, and the observation of carnal ordinances; but in a believing dependence on God's grace in the covenant, and on the promise, which was the great charter by which the church was first incorporated. He had hope in Christ as the promised Seed; he had hopes of heaven; this is expressly meant, as appears by comp. ch. 24:15. That there shall be a resurrection of the dead. Paul had no confidence in the flesh, but in Christ; no expectation of great things in this world, but of greater things in the other.

(3.) Herein he concurred with all the cles, Themistocles, and Aristides, thought it a point of modesty to avoid it. But this was the effect of a false taste; and it is plain, the eloquent Demosthenes often used the same gesture with Paul here. DODDR.

V. 4-8. 'Paul, dividing the narrative of his life into two parts, cites his adversaries themselves as witnesses of the former part, and the fathers and prophets to attest the latter part.' Beza. — Some commentators suppose the apostle to mean, almost exclusively, that the resurrection to eternal life, was 'the promise made unto the fathers;' but it is manifest, beyond all doubt, that the promise of a Savior was the most prominent part of the revelation made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the grand subject of prophecy; Luke 24:44-49. John 5:39-44. Heb. 11:39, 40. 1 Pet. 1:10-12. Rev. 19:9, 10. while the doctrine of the resurrection was not so fully and plainly revealed in the O. T. as it is in the New. 2 Tim. 1:10. Paul says, elsewhere, 'We declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children; in that He hath raised up Jesus again.' 13:24-37. Rom. 1:1-4, v. 4. Thus the resurrection of Jesus demonstrated, that He was the promised Messiah, against all the unbelieving Jews; and the doctrine of the resurrection, against the Sadducees. The latter were instigated to persecute the apostles, 'for preaching, through Jesus, the resurrection of the dead;' 4:1-3. 23:6-10. the former, for preaching the very person whom they had crucified, as the Messiah, and as risen and exalted to be a Prince and a Savior.' Yet the whole nation expected a Messiah; and all, except the Sadducees, professed to believe the doctrine of the resurrection. And, as the resurrection of Jesus was proved, by most inexceptionable and abundant testimony, and might be shown to be the fulfilment of ancient prophecies; what reason could be given, why it should not be credited?—Thus the apostle makes a natural and easy transition, from the hope of their fathers, and the doctrine of the resurrection, to that which was his principal subject; namely, the proof, he intended to adduce, that Jesus was indeed risen, and was the promised Messiah. — Some render v. 8. thus, 'What! Is it a thing incredible with you, if God raises the dead?' and this indeed gives a peculiar animation to the question. SCOTT.

(4.) From my youth. 'Probably, so Dr. Wells, he had in his childhood been brought up in the schools of Tarsus, [to which all Asia flocked,] and there formed an acquaintance with the politest of the Greek and Roman authors, till he entered on a kind of academical course under the celebrated Gamaliel, about the 15th or 16th year of his age, when he came to Jerusalem, and was there educated from the beginning of his youth.' pious Jews; 'Our twelve tribes, the body of the Jewish church, all the Israelites, profess to believe in this promise, both of Christ and heaven, and hope to come to the benefits of them. They all hope for a Messiah to come, and we that are Christians, hope in a Messiah already come; so that we all agree to build on the same promise. They look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come, and that is what I look for. Why should I be looked upon as advancing something dangerous and heterodox, or as an apostate from the faith and worship of the Jewish church, when I agree with them in this fundamental article?

Nay, the Jewish church not only hoped to come to this promise, but, in the hope of it, they instantly served God day and night. The temple-service, morning and evening, day and night, from the beginning of the year to the end of it, was kept up by the priests and Levites, and the stationary men, as they called them, continually attended there to lay their hands on the public sacrifices, as the representatives of all the twelve tribes; this service was kept up in the profession of faith in the promise of eternal life, and, in expectation of it, Paul instantly serves God day and night, in the Gospel of his Son; the twelve tribes by their representatives do so in the law of Moses, but he and they do it in hope of the same promise. Much more should Christians, who hope in the same Jesus for the same heaven, though differing in the modes and ceremonies of worship, hope the best one of another, and live together in holy love. Or it may be meant of particular persons who continued in the communion of the Jewish church, and were very devout in their way, serving God with great intensesness, and a close application of mind, and constant in it, night and day, as Anna, Luke 2:37.

(4.) This was it he was now suffering for; for preaching that doctrine which they themselves, if they did but understand themselves aright, must own; I am judged for the hope of the promise made unto the fathers. He stuck to the promise, against the ceremonial law, while his persecutors stuck to the ceremonial law, against the promise. It is common for men to hate and persecute the power of that religion in others, which yet they pride themselves in the form of.

This was it he would persuade all, that heard him, cordially to embrace, v. 8. Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead? This seems to come in somewhat abruptly; but, probably, Paul said much more than is here recorded, and explained the promise made to the fathers, to be the promise of the resurrection and eternal life; and proved that he was in the right way of pursuing his hope of that happiness, because he believed in Christ who was risen from the dead, which was a pledge and earnest of that resurrection which the father's hoped for. Now many of his hearers were Gentiles, most of them perhaps, Festus particularly, and we may suppose, when they heard him speak so much of Christ's resurrection, and of the resurrection from the dead, which the tribes hoped for, that they mocked, as the Athenians did, began to smile at it, and whispered to one another what an absurd thing it was; which occasioned Paul thus to reason with them, What! is it thought incredible with you, that God should raise the dead? So it may be read. We are not required to believe anything that is incredible, that implies a contradiction, Zech. 8:6. There are motives of credibility sufficient to carry us through all the doctrines of the Christian religion, and this particularly of the resurrection of the dead. Has not God an infinite, almighty power!

III. He acknowledges, that while he continued a Pharisee, he was a bitter enemy to Christians and Christianity, and thought he ought to be so, and continued so to the moment that Christ wrought that wonderful change in him. This he mentions,

I. To show, that his becoming a Christian and a preacher, was not the product and result of any previous disposition or inclination that way, or any gradual advance of thought in favor of the Christian doctrine; he did not reason himself into Christianity by a chain of arguments, but was brought into the highest degree of an assurance of it, immediately from the highest degree of prejudice against it: by which it appeared, that he was made a Christian and a preacher by a supernatural power; so that his conversion, in such a miraculous way, was not only to himself, but to others, also, a convincing proof of the truth of Christianity.

2. Perhaps he designs it for such an excuse of his persecutors as Christ made for his, when He said, They know not what they do. It is possible for those to be confident they are in the right, who yet are evidently in the wrong; and for those to think they are doing their duty, who are wilfully persisting in the greatest sin. There is not a more violent principle in the world, than conscience, misinformed, 1 Tim. 1:13.

Paul filled the jails with Christians, made himself the tool of the chief priests, and was very officious to vote, unasked, for the putting of Christians to death, ch. 8:1. and so made himself partaker of the crime. He brought them under punishments of an inferior nature, in the synagogues, where they were scourged, as transgressors of the rules of the synagogue; he had a hand in the punishing of divers; nay, it should seem, the same persons were by his means often punished; as he himself was five times, 2 Cor. 11:24. He not only punished them for their religion, but, taking a pride in triumphing over men's consciences, he forced them to abjure their religion, by putting them to the torture, compelled them to blaspheme, and to say Christ was a deceiver. His rage swelled so, that Jerusalem itself was too narrow a stage for it to act upon. He was mad, to see how much the Christians had to say for themselves; mad, to see them multiply the more for their being afflicted; he was exceedingly mad, mad to see, that those in other cities were not so outrageous against the Christians as he was; therefore, he made himself busy there, where he had no business, and persecuted the Christians even in strange cities. There is not a more restless principle than malice, especially [that] which pretends conscience.

This was Paul's character, and this his manner of life in the beginning of his time; therefore he could not be presumed to be a Christian by education or custom, or that he was drawn in by hope of preferment, for all imaginable external objections lay against his being a Christian.

V. 12—23. All who believe a God, and have a reverence for his sovereignty, must acknowledge, that they who speak and act by direction and warrant from Him, are not to be opposed; for that is fighting against God. Now Paul here, by a plain and faithful narrative of matters of fact, makes it out to this august assembly, that he had an immediate call from heaven, to preach the Gospel of Christ to the Gentile world, which was the thing that exasperated the Jews against him. He here shows,

I. That he was made a Christian by a divine power; notwithstanding all his prejudices against that way, he was brought into it on a sudden by the hand of heaven; not compelled by outward force, but by a divine and spiritual energy, by a revelation of Christ from above, both to him and in him: and this when in the full career of his sin, going to Damascus, to suppress Christianity by persecuting the Christians there; as hot as ever in the cause, his persecuting fury not in the least spent or tired, nor he tempted to give it up by the failing of his friends, for he had at this time as ample an authority and commission from the chief priests, as ever he had, to persecute Christianity, when he was obliged by a superior power to give up that, and accept another commission to preach up Christianity.

Paul thought Jesus was buried, and, though stolen out of his own sepulchre, yet laid in some other; all the Jews were taught to say so, and, therefore, he is amazed to hear Him speak from heaven, to see Him surrounded with all this glory, whom he had loaded with all possible ignominy. This convinced him the doctrine of Jesus was divine and heavenly, and not only not to be opposed, but to be cordially embraced; that Jesus is the Messiah, for He is not only risen from the dead, but He has received from God the Father honor and glory; and this is enough to make him a Christian immediately.

II. That he was made a minister by a divine authority; that the same Jesus, that appeared to him in that glorious light, ordered him to go preach the Gospel to the Gentiles; he was not sent by men like himself, but by Him whom the Father sent, John 20:21. What is said of his being an apostle, is here joined immediately to that which was

V. 16—18. It is evident, this commission was given to Paul by our Lord, at the time of his conversion; though not mentioned in the compendious narrative of that event. 9:15, 16.—The words make a part of the sentence, in which Christ bids him rise from his astonishment, into which his appearance to him, in the way to Damascus, had thrown him. Doddr. 'To open their eyes:' though their bodily eyes were open, and 18 To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God ; that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified, by faith that is in me.

19 Whereupon, O king Agrippa, I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision :

20 But shewed first unto them of Damascus, and at Jerusalem, and throughout all the coasts of Judea, and then to the Gentiles, that they should repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance.

21 For these causes the Jews caught me in the temple, and went about to kill me.

22 Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day, witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come :

said to him by the way, though it appears by ch. 9 : 15. and 22 : 15, 17, &c. that it was spoken to him afterward ; but he puts the two together for brevity-sake ; Rise, and stand upon thy feet. He must stand up, for Christ has work for him to do ; has an errand, a very great errand, to send him on ; I have appeared to thee to make thee a minister. Christ has the making of his own ministers, both their qualifications and their commissions are from Him. Paul thanks Christ Jesus who put him into the ministry, 1 Tim. 1 : 12. One way or other, Christ will manifest Himself to all whom He makes his ministers ; for how can they preach Him, who do not know Him? And how can they know Him, to whom He does not, by his Spirit, make Himself known? Observe,

The office to which Paul is appointed ; that of a minister, to attend on Christ, and act for Him, as a witness ; to give evidence in his cause, and attest the truth of his doctrine ; Christ appeared to him, that he might appear for Christ before men. Christ often appeared to Paul, oftener, it is likely, than is recorded, and still taught him, that he might still teach the people knowledge. Further, he was taken under spiritual protection while thus employed as Christ's witness, v. 17.

Paul has a special commission to go among the Gentiles, and, 1. Two things must be done, which their case calls for : A world that sits in darkness must be enlightened, and a world that lieth in wickedness, must be sanctified and reformed, v. 18. He is sent to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light. It is not enough for them to have their eyes opened, they must have their hearts renewed, must be turned from the power of Satan unto God ; which will follow of course ; for Satan rules by the power of darkness, and God, by the convincing evidence of light. Sinners are under the power of Satan ; idolaters, in a special manner, and all sinners are under the influence of his temptations ; converting grace turns them from under his dominion, and brings them into subjection to God ; to conform to the rules of his Word, and comply with the dictates and directions of his Spirit, translates them out of the kingdom of darkness into the kingdom of his dear Son. When gracious dispositions are strong in the soul, as corrupt and sinful dispositions had been, it is then turned from the power of Satan unto God.

2. There is a great happiness designed for the Gentiles by this work,—that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified ; they are turned from the darkness of sin to the light of holiness, from the slavery of Satan to the service of God ; not that God may be a gainer by them, but they gainers by Him,—be restored to his favor, which by sin they have forfeited and thrown themselves out of, receive forgiveness of sins, and be delivered from the dominion of sin ; that they may be happy in the [obedience and] fruition of Him ; the forgiveness of sins makes way for this inheritance, by taking that out of the way, which alone hindered. All that shall be saved hereafter, are sanctified now ; those that have the heavenly inheritance, must have it in this way, must be prepared and made meet for it ; none can be happy, that are not holy ; nor shall any be saints in heaven, that are not first saints on earth. We need no more to make us happy, than to have our lot among them that are sanctified ; let us, therefore, now cast in our lot among them, by coming into the communion of saints, and be willing to take our lot with them, and share with them in their afflictions, which, how grievous soever, our lot with them in the inheritance will abundantly make amends for. We are sanctified and saved by faith in Christ ; some refer it to the word next herefore, sanctified by faith, for faith purifies the heart, and applies the promises, and subjects the soul to the influence of that grace, by which we partake of a divine nature ; others refer it to the receiving of both pardon and the inheritance ; it is by faith accepting the grant, it comes all to one ; for it is by faith that we are justified, sanctified, and glorified ; by faith, that faith which is in Me ; it is emphatically expressed ; that faith which not only receives divine revelation in general, but which, in a particular manner, fastens on Jesus Christ, and his mediation ; by which we rely on Christ as the Lord our Righteousness, and resign ourselves to Him, as the Lord our Ruler ; this is that by which we receive the remission of sins, the gift of the Holy Ghost, and eternal life.

III. That he had discharged his ministry, pursuant to his commission, by divine aid, and under divine direction and protection.

God, who called him to be an apostle, owned him in his apostolical work, and carried him on in it with enlargement and success.

1. God gave him a heart to comply with the call, v. 19.

2. He enabled him to go through a great deal of work, though in it he grappled with a great deal of difficulty, v. 20. He applied himself to the preaching of the Gospel with all vigor, began at Damascus, ch. 9 : 20. came soon to Jerusalem, where he had most furiously set himself against Christ, ch. 9 : 28. preached throughout all the coasts of Judea, as Christ had done, made the first offer of the Gospel to the Jews, as Christ had appointed, and did not leave them till they had wilfully thrust the Gospel from them ; and then, he turned to the Gentiles, and laid out himself for the good of their souls, laboring more abundantly than any of the apostles, nay, perhaps, than all put together.

3. His preaching was all practical ; not notional, or speculative, or doubtfully disputatious, but demonstrative of the truth. He taught, that men must repent of their sins, bethink themselves, so the word properly signifies ; turn to God, not only turn from that which is evil, but turn to that which is good ; they must turn to God, in love and affection, in duty and obedience, and they must do works meet for repentance, as John preached, Mat. 3 : 3. Those that profess repentance, must practice it, in everything carry it as becomes penitents.

4. The Jews had no quarrel with him but on this account, v. 21. He suffered ill, not only for doing well himself, but for doing good to others.

5. He had no help but from heaven, and by that, he went on in this great work, v. 22. It was now above 20 years since Paul was converted, and all that time he had been very busy, preaching the Gospel in the midst of hazards ; and what bore him up ? Not any strength of his own resolutions, but having obtained help of God ; I have stood, my life has been preserved, and my work continued ; I have stood my ground, and have not been beaten off ; I have stood to what I said, and have not been afraid or ashamed to persist in it. The work was so great, and he had so much opposition, he could not otherwise have gone on in it, but by help obtained of God. And Paul mentions it as an evidence that he had his commission from God, that from Him he had ability to execute it.

6. He preached no doctrine but what agreed with the scriptures of the O. T. ; he witnessed both to small and great, to all, all being concerned in it ; it was an evidence of the condescending grace of the Gospel, that the poor were welcome to it ; and of the incontestable truth and power of it, that it was neither afraid nor ashamed to show itself to the greatest. The enemies of Paul objected against him, that he preached something more than that men should repent, and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance ; those, indeed, were but what the prophets of the O. T. had preached ; but, besides these, he had preached Christ, and his death, and his resurrection, and that was what they quarrelled with him for, as appears by ch. 25 : 19. that he affirmed Jesus to their intellectual powers, in secular matters, might be very penetrating ; they had, notwithstanding, been hitherto spiritually blind, through the influence of the devil, and the depravity of their carnal minds ; so that they could see nothing of the glory of God, of his truth and will, or of the way of acceptance and holiness.—The distinction between opening their eyes, and turning them from darkness to light, should be particularly noticed.—To interpret the language of this passage, as if it were exclusively applicable to idolaters, implies an opinion, that nominal Christians are of a better nature than other men ; or that pride, covetousness, and all the other vices, by which men are enslaved to Satan, are not so heinous in professed Christians, as they are in heathens ! Gross idolatry indeed has been, in this part of the world, exchanged for irreligion, infidelity, superstition, formality, and hypocrisy, among nominal Christians ; but the hearts and minds of the unregenerate and unconverted are as much blinded by aversion to spiritual religion, and by the love of the world and of sin, as those of the ancient Gentiles were. Those who call themselves Christians, because they happen to be born in a Christian country ; but attend neither to the doctrines, nor the duties of the Gospel, seem to differ but little, with respect to the point under consideration, from those to whom the Gospel was first preached ; the process in both must be nearly the same. Bp. Tomline's Refutation of Calvinism.—May it not be added, 'Because they have been baptized with water?'—(18) By faith, &c.] 'This may be referred to sanctified ; . . . but the sentence is much fuller, if we join it with the word receive.' Beza. No doubt we are 'sanctified,' as well as 'justified,' by faith in Christ ; but the words under consideration seem to show, that all the blessings mentioned are received by faith in Christ, and not one of them only.

V. 21. Kill.] 'Kill with their own hands. Beza justly observes, that this is the exact import of the original, which was the more properly used here : as there was reason to apprehend, that Paul would have been actually pulled in pieces, in an assembly, as it seems, less numerous and less violent than that which seized him in the temple.'

be alive; 'And so I did,' says Paul, 'and so I do, but therein, also, I say no other than that which Moses and the prophets said should come; and what greater honor can be done to them, than to show, that what they foretold is accomplished, and in the appointed season, too; that what they said should come, is come, and at the time they prefixed?'

Three things they prophesied, and Paul preached. (1.) That Christ (the Messiah) should suffer; be a Sufferer; not only a Man, and capable of suffering, but that, as Messiah, He should be appointed to sufferings; that his ignominious death should be not only consistent with, but pursuant of, his undertaking. The cross of Christ was a stumbling-block to the Jews, and Paul's preaching that, was the great thing that exasperated them; but Paul stands to it, that, in preaching that, he preached the fulfilling of the O. T. predictions, and, therefore, they ought not only not to be offended, but to embrace it. (2.) That He should be the first that should rise from the dead; not in time, but in influence; the Chief of the resurrection, the Head, or principal One, in the same sense that He is called the First begotten from the dead, Rev. 1:5. and the First-born from the dead, Col. 1:18. and the first fruits of them that slept, 1 Cor. 15:20. for He sanctified the harvest, was the first that rose from the dead, to die no more; and to show that the resurrection of all believers is in virtue of his, just when He arose many dead bodies of saints arose, and went into the holy city, Mat. 27:53. (3.) That He should show light unto the people, and to the Gentiles; to the Jews first, for He was to be the glory of his people Israel; and then to the Gentiles, by the ministry of his apostles, for He was to be a Light to lighten them who sat in darkness. In this Paul refers to his commission, v. 18. He rose from the dead, on purpose that He might show light to the people, that He might give a convincing proof of the truth of his doctrine,

V. 24—29. Festus had never heard anything before on these subjects; the resurrection of Jesus, and the vision of Paul, appeared to him incredible, or visionary in the highest degree. Probably he was astonished to hear him speak of his doctrine, as of universal concernment; and aver that one, who arose among the despised Jews, was appointed to be 'the Light of the Gentiles,' even of the philosophical Greeks and Romans. He perhaps had observed, that the apostle spent much time in retirement, study, and reading.—To this rude interruption, before so large and splendid an audience, the apostle calmly and gravely replied, addressing the governor, by the customary title.

(24.) 'It has been the opinion of the vulgar, in all ages, that devoted attention to mental or spiritual pursuits, tends to madness. And, in illustration of this, Kypke and Wets. adduce numerous passages from the classical writers.'

and might send it with so much the greater power, both among Jews and Gentiles. This, also, was foretold by the O. T. prophets, that the Gentiles should be brought to the knowledge of God by the Messiah; and what was there in all this, that the Jews could justly be displeased at?

V. 24—32. We have reason to think Paul had a great deal more to say in defence of the Gospel he preached; but there is no remedy; the court thinks it is time to proceed to give in their judgment on his case, and he must be interrupted.

I. Festus, the Roman governor, is convinced he is no criminal, nor bad man, that should be punished, but he takes him to be a lunatic, a distracted man, that should be pitied, but not heeded; and thus he thinks he has found out an expedient to excuse himself, both from condemning Paul as a prisoner, and from believing him as a preacher; for, if he be not in his senses, he is not to be either condemned or credited.

1. He said it with a loud voice; a whisper to those next him had been more excusable, but (without consulting Agrippa, to whose judgment he had seemed to pay profound deference, ch. 25:26.) he said aloud, that he might oblige Paul to break off, and might divert the auditors, 'Paul, thou art beside thyself:' he puts the most candid construction he can on his delirium; 'Much learning hath made thee mad, thou hast cracked thy brains with studying.' This he speaks, not so much in anger, as in scorn and contempt; what Paul said was above his capacity, all a riddle to him; therefore, he imputes it to a heated imagination. He owns Paul to be a scholar, but even this is turned to his reproach. The apostles who were fishermen, were despised because they had no learning; Paul, who was a university-man, and bred a Pharisee, is despised as having too much learning, more than did him good: the enemies of Christ's ministers will always have something to upbraid them with! He reproaches him as a madman. The prophets of the O. T. were thus stigmatized, to prejudice people against them, by putting them into an ill name, 2 K. 9:11. Hos. 9:7. John Baptist and Christ were represented as having a devil, as being crazed. Probably Paul now spake with more life and earnestness than in the beginning of his discourse, and used some gestures expressive of his zeal, therefore Festus put this invidious character on him, which, perhaps, never a one in the company but himself thought of.

2. How Paul cleared himself; it should seem, it had been said of him by the false apostles, 2 Cor. 5:13. but never charged on him before the Roman governor; therefore he must say something to this. (1.) He denies the charge, with due respect indeed to the governor, but with justice to himself, protesting that there was neither ground nor color for it, v. 25. Observe, Though Festus gave Paul this base and contemptuous usage, yet Paul is so far from resenting it, and being provoked by it, that he gives him all possible respect, compliments him with his proper title of honor, most noble Festus, to teach us not to render railing for railing, nor one invidious character for another, but to speak civilly to those who speak slightly of us. It becomes us, on all occasions, to speak the words of truth and soberness, and then we may despise the unjust censures of men. (2.) He appeals to Agrippa concerning what he spake, v. 26. He knew those things were not fancies, but matters of fact, knew something of them, and, therefore, would be willing to know more; his own conversion, and commission to preach the Gospel, Agrippa could not but have heard of, having been so long conversant among the Jews; all the country rang of it; and any of the Jews present might have witnessed for him, that they had heard it many a time from others, and therefore it was unreasonable to censure him as a distracted man for relating it, much more for speaking of the death and resurrection of Christ, which was so universally spoken of. Peter tells Cornelius and his friends, ch. 10:37. That word you know, which was published throughout all Judea concerning Christ; and, therefore, Agrippa could not be ignorant of it, and it was a shame for Festus that he was so.

II. Agrippa, so far from thinking him a madman, thinks he never heard a man argue more strongly, nor talk more to the purpose.

1. Paul applies himself closely to Agrippa's conscience: and because he had mentioned Moses and the prophets, as confirming the Gospel he preached, he refers Agrippa to them, v. 27. Dost thou receive the scriptures of the O. T. as a divine revelation, and admit them as foretelling good things to come? He does not stay for an answer, but, in compliment to Agrippa, takes it for granted; I know that thou believest; for every one knew that Agrippa professed the Jews' religion, as his fathers had done, and therefore both knew the writings of the prophets, and gave credit to them.

2. Agrippa owns there was a great deal of reason in what Paul said, v. 28. Some understand this as spoken ironically, and read it thus, Wouldest thou in so little a time persuade me to be a Christian? But taking it so, it is an acknowledgment that Paul spake very much to the purpose, and that to his mind there came a convincing power in what he said. Others take it as spoken seriously, and as a confession that he was, within a little, convinced that Christ was the Messiah; for he could not but own, and had many a time thought so within himself, that the prophecies of the O. T. had had their accomplishment in Him; and now that it is urged thus solemnly on him, he is ready to yield to the conviction, and is as near persuaded to believe in Christ, as Felix, when he trembled, was to leave his sins; he sees a great deal of reason for Christianity, so that if it were not for his obligations to the ceremonial law, his respect to the religion of his fathers and of his country, or his regard to his dignity as a king, and to his secular interests, [&c. &c.] he would turn Christian immediately. Many are almost persuaded to be religious, who are not quite persuaded; they are under strong convictions of their duty, and of the excellency of the ways of God, but yet are overruled by some external inducements, and do not pursue their convictions.

3. Paul; not being allowed time to pursue his argument, concludes with a compliment, or rather a pious wish, that all his hearers were Christians, and this wish turned into prayer, I pray to God for it, v. 29. it was his heart's desire and prayer to God for them

(28.) Almost thou persuadest.] 'To interpret this as an irony, is supposing Agrippa very unseasonably and absurdly ludicrous. . . and it plainly appears from Paul's answer, and from the sense in which he there uses almost, in opposition to altogether, that he took him to mean seriously that he was almost persuaded, and consequently that he did indeed mean so.' Doddr.—'Paul was proceeding to prove, that the prophets had pointed out Jesus as the promised Messiah, when Agrippa interrupted him by the words, "Almost," &c. accompanied (as I suspect) with a motion to take his departure.' 31 And when they were gone aside, they talked between themselves, saying, This man doeth nothing worthy of death or of bonds.

all, that they might be saved, Rom. 10:1. Hereby, He professes his resolution to cleave to his religion, as that which he was entirely satisfied in, and determined to live and die by. He intimates his satisfaction, not only in the truth, but in the benefit and advantage of Christianity; he could not wish better to the best friend he had in the world, than to wish him such an one as he was, a faithful, zealous disciple of Jesus Christ; and it was his trouble and concern, that Agrippa went no further than being almost a Christian, and not altogether one; for he wishes that he and the rest of them might be not only almost, (what good would that do?) but altogether such as he was, sincere, thorough-paced Christians: it was their concern, and would be the unspeakable happiness of every one of them, to become true Christians; that there is grace enough in Christ for all, he they ever so many; enough for each, he they ever so craving. He intimates the PRACT. OBS. When Christian love abounds in the heart, it dictates a sincere language, far surpassing all compliment and worldly politeness; and teaches us to 'render honor to whom honor is due,' without flattery or fear of man.—A moral conduct, and a form of godliness, are often connected with a bigoted aversion to the Gospel; and this leads to many other heinous crimes; yet it is a mercy to be preserved, during our unconverted years, from those vices, which might afterwards disgrace our characters among worldly people, and so prevent the influence of our testimony; and this is greatly corroborated, when they, who 'knew our manner of life from our youth,' could testify, that we then acted consistently with our principles, and according to what we thought right; for they may thence infer, that our change of sentiment and conduct also originated from a regard to duty.—Those who have been most strict in their conduct, previous to conversion, will afterwards see abundant cause for deep humiliation, even on account of things, which at the time they 'verily thought they ought to do;' their contemptuous or injurious treatment of the saints, their opposition to the Gospel, and endeavors to seduce, reason, or terrify others into a neglect of it, will often sit very heavily on their minds; and they will condemn those words, as impious and blasphemous, which they once uttered, or excited others to utter, without remorse; and allow that conduct to be madness, in which they once gloried.—For calling on men to 'repent and be converted;' and for 'witnessing none other things,' than what are evidently contained in the Holy Scriptures; what numbers have been execrated, persecuted, and slain, even by the professed worshippers of God!—The persons whom God employs to protect his servants, often despise them as visionaries or madmen, for being so zealous about invisible objects, for believing subjects so mysterious, crediting facts of so natured, easy characters, as was Agrippa; whom Jos. calls luxurious, somewhat free-thinking, little attentive to religion, yet good-humored, and by no means tyrannical. 'The grave energy, and dignified pathos of the whole sentence, [Paul's reply,] is inexpressible.' Ep.

(29.) Prisoners (see Act. and Suet.) were brought forward for trial in chains; and Paul, doubtless, [with powerful effect,] held his chains up, as he spoke. Being in militari custodia, Paul was yet chained, by his right hand, to the left hand of the soldier that guarded him. See Bl. In.

V. 30—32. It does not appear, that either Agrippa or Festus, or any of those present, inquired further after Christ and his salvation; and this [154] heartly good-will he bore to them all; he wishes them as well as he wished his own soul, nay, better, than he was now as to his outward condition, for he excepts these bonds; be comforted Christians, as he, but not persecuted Christians, as he; they made light of his imprisonment, and were in no concern for him; Felix continued him in bonds to gratify the Jews; now this would have tempted many a one to wish them all in his bonds; but so far from this, when he wished them in bonds to Christ, he desired they might never be in bonds for Christ. Nothing could be said more [strikingly,] tenderly, nor with a better grace.

III. They all agree Paul was wronged.

1. The court broke up with some precipitation, v. 30. When he had spoken that obliging word, v. 29. afraid, if he were permitted to go on, he would say something yet more moving, which might work on some of them to appear more in his favor than was convenient, and perhaps might prevail with them to turn Christians; the king himself durst not trust himself to hear more, but, like Felix, dismissed Paul for this time. They ought in justice to have asked the prisoner, whether he had any more to say for himself.

2. They all concurred in an opinion of Paul's innocency, v. 31. and withdrew, to consult and know one another's minds; and they agree, he is not a criminal that deserves to die; nay he doeth nothing worthy of bonds; he is not a dangerous man, whom it is prudence to confine. After this, Nero made it death to profess the Christian religion, but as yet there was no law of that kind among the Romans; and this judgment of their's is a testimony against that wicked law, that Paul, the most active, zealous Christian that ever was, was adjudged, even by those that were no friends to his way, to have done nothing worthy of death, or of bonds. Thus was he made manifest in the consciences of those who yet would not receive his doctrine; and the clamors of the hot-headed Jews, who cried out, Away with him, it is not fit he should live, were silenced by the moderate counsels of this court.

3. Agrippa gave his judgment, that he might have been set at liberty, if he had not himself appealed to Cesar, v. 32. Some think, that, by the Roman law, this was true, that, when a prisoner had appealed to the supreme court, the inferior courts could no more discharge him than they could condemn him; and we suppose the law was so, if the prosecutors joined issue on the appeal, and consented to it. But it does not appear that in Paul's case they did so; he was forced to do it, to screen himself from their fury, when he saw the governor did not take the care he ought for his protection. Therefore others think, that Agrippa and Festus, being unwilling to disoblige the Jews by setting him at liberty, made this serve as an excuse for continuing him in custody, when they themselves knew they might have justified the discharging of him. Agrippa, who was but almost persuaded to be a Christian, proves no better than if he had not been at all persuaded.

Whether Paul repented having appealed to Cesar, as a rash thing, now he saw it hindered his discharge, I cannot tell. He had reason, perhaps, to regret it, and to charge himself with imprudence and impatience in it, and some distrust of the divine protection. He had better have appealed to God than to Cesar. It confirms what Solomon says, Eccel. 6:12. What we think is for our welfare often proves to be a trap; such short-sighted creatures are we, and so ill-advised, in leaning, as we do, to our own understanding. Or, notwithstanding this, he may have been satisfied in what he had done; his appealing to Cesar was lawful, and what became a Roman citizen, and would help to make his cause considerable; and forasmuch as, when he did it, it appeared to him, as the case then stood, to be for the best, though afterwards it appeared otherwise, he did not vex himself with any self-reproach in the matter, but believed there was a providence in it, and it would issue well at last. And besides, he was told in a vision, that he must bear witness to Christ at Rome, ch. 23:11. And it is all one to him, whether he goes thither a prisoner or at his liberty; he knows the counsel of the Lord shall stand, and says, Let it stand. The will of the Lord be done!

CHAP. XXVII. This whole ch. is taken up with an account of Paul's voyage toward Rome, when he was sent thither a prisoner by Festus the governor, on his appeal to Cesar.

V. 1—11. It does not appear how long after Paul's conference with Agrippa he was sent away. But,

1. Paul was shipped off for Italy; a long extraordinary a nature; and relating their experience of the way in which the Lord brought them to trust in his grace, and embrace his Gospel; and for attesting that the same faith and diligence, and an experience in many respects similar, are indispensably necessary to all men, both small and great, in order to their salvation. Indeed few ascribe the madness of modern teachers to deep study, or much learning; but they rather impute it to weakness of intellect, or contemptible ignorance; whatever evidences they give of good sense, enlarged minds, and extensive knowledge in other subjects. We should cautiously avoid all real enthusiasm, and whatever is ambiguous, or incapable of being supported by appropriate evidence, whilst we deny, and attempt to refute, the charge of being visionaries and fanatics.—It is highly important for us to lead men's attention, by clear instructions, conclusive arguments, and well authenticated facts, to the sacred oracles, as the standard of truth; and while we inquire, whether our hearers do indeed believe the Scriptures, we should, as much as may be, take it for granted, that they do; for many assent to the truth of the Bible, and pay a respect to the testimonies from it, who have not yet understood or received the doctrines of salvation there revealed. . . . In doing this, the language of fervent, disinterested affection is peculiarly becoming; and we should sincerely desire and pray, that others may participate all our hopes and comforts; and be exempted from our crosses and trials. Yet even this beautiful philanthropy, when expressed in the most graceful and conciliatory language, will fail to recommend the holy Gospel to the carnal hearts of worldly men. Alas! how many such persons have been almost persuaded to be Christians, who, nevertheless, at last perished in their sins! God grant that none who read these observations may be found in that unhappy number! SCOTT.

voyage, but there is no remedy. He appealed to Cesar, and to Cesar he must go. It was determined, determined by the counsel of God, before it was by that of Festus, that we should sail into Italy, for to Rome they must go by sea; by land would have been a vast way about. Hence when the Roman conquest of the Jewish nation is foretold, it is said, Num. 24: 24. Ships shall come from Shittim, i. e. Italy, and shall afflict Eber, i. e. the Hebrews. Now here we are told,

1. He was committed to the custody of one named Julius, a centurion of Augustus' band; as Cornelius was of the Italian band, or legion, ch. 10: 1. He had soldiers under him, who were a guard on Paul, both for security and protection.

2. He embarked in a ship of Adramyttium, v. 2. a [famous] sea-port of Africa, whence this ship brought African goods, on a coasting voyage for Syria.

3. His company; some prisoners committed to the custody of the same centurion, who, probably, had appealed to Cesar too, or were on some other account removed to Rome, to be tried there, or examined as witnesses against some prisoners there; perhaps some notorious offenders, like Barabbas, who were therefore ordered to be brought before the emperor himself. It is no new thing for the innocent to be numbered among the transgressors. But he had also some of his friends with him, Luke, particularly, the penman of this book, for he puts himself in all along, (We sailed, We launched, v. 2.) also Aristarchus a Thessalonian; Lightfoot thinks, Trophimus the Ephesian went off with him, but that he left him sick at Mile-tum, 2 Tim. 4: 20. when he passed by those coasts of Asia, mentioned here, v. 2. and that there likewise he left Timothy. It was a comfort to Paul to have some of his friends in this tedious voyage, when he had so much loose, profane company about him. Those that go long voyages at sea, are commonly necessitated to sojourn, as it were, in Mesech and Kedar, and have need of wisdom, that they may do good to the bad company they are in, making them better, or at least be made never the worse by them.

II. The course they steered, and the places they touched at, are particularly recorded, to confirm the truth of the history to those who lived at that time, and could by their own knowledge tell of their being at such and such a place.

1. They touched at Sidon, whither they came the next day. And (what is observable) there Julius, the centurion, was extraordinarily civil to Paul; probably he was one of the chief captains or principal men, that heard him plead his own cause before Agrippa, ch. 25: 23. and was convinced of his innocency, and therefore treated him as a friend, as a scholar, as a gentleman, and as a man that had an interest in heaven; he gave him liberty, while the business of the ship stayed at Sidon, to go among his friends there, to refresh himself; and it would be a great refreshment to him. Julius herein gives an example to those in power, to be respectful to those whom they find worthy of their respect. God herein encourages those that suffer for Him, to trust in Him; for He can put it into the hearts of those to befriend them, from whom they least expect it; can make them to be pitied, nay, prized and valued, even in the eyes of those that carry them captive, Ps. 106: 46. And it is likewise an instance of Paul's fidelity; being out on his parole of honor, he faithfully returns to his imprisonment; if the centurion be so civil as to take his word, he is so just and honest as to keep his word.

2. They thence sailed under Cyprus, v. 4.

If the wind had been fair, they had gone forward by direct sailing, and had left Cyprus on the right hand; but, the wind not favoring, they were driven to oblique sailing with a side wind, and so compassed the island, in a manner, and left it on the left hand. Sailors must do as they can, when they cannot do as they would, and make the best of their wind, whatever point it is in; so must we all, in our passage over the ocean of this world. When the winds are contrary, yet we must be getting forward as well as we can.

3. At a port of Myra, they changed their ship; that they were in, probably, having business no further, v. 5, 6. Alexandria was now the chief city of Egypt, and great trading there was between that city and Italy; from Alexandria they carried corn to Rome; and the East India and Persian goods imported at the Red Sea, they exported again to all parts of the Mediterranean, and especially to Italy. And it was a particular favor showed to the Alexandrian ships, in the ports of Italy, that they were not obliged to strike sail, as other ships were, when they came into port.

4. With much ado they made the Fair havens, a port of the island of Crete, v. 7, 8. They sailed slowly many days, being becalmed, or having the wind against them. It was a great while before they made the point of Cnidus, a port of Caria, and were forced to sail under Crete, as before under Cyprus; much difficulty they met with in passing by Salmone, a promontory on the eastern shore of Crete. Observe, The place they came to was called the Fair havens. Travellers say, it is known to this day by the same name, and answers the name from the pleasantness of its situation and prospect; yet it was not commodious to winter in, v. 12. It had a fine prospect, but lay exposed to the weather.

III. Paul's advice with reference to that part of the voyage they had before them; to be content to winter where they were.

1. It was now a bad time for sailing; they had lost a deal of time, struggling with contrary winds. Sailing was now dangerous, because the fast was already past; i. e. the yearly fast of the Jews, the day of atonement, the 10th of the 7th month, about the 20th of Sept. That yearly fast was very religiously observed; but (which is strange) we never have any mention made in all the scripture-history of its observance, unless it be meant here, where it serves only to describe the season of the year.

2. Paul put them in mind of it, and gave them notice of their danger, v. 10. but they would not be advised by Paul in this matter, v. 11. They thought him impertinent, though the centurion, to whom it was referred, was himself a passenger, and had not been oftener at sea, perhaps, than Paul, nor was better acquainted with these seas; for Paul had planted the Gospel in Crete, Tit. 1: 5. and coast of Asia; this ship, therefore, if only returning thither, could convey the company but a small part of their long voyage. Scorr.

(1.) Augustus.] Sebastēs: from the time of Augustus Octavianus, legions took the name Augustan. Thus Claudian mentions a Legio Augusta. Sc. Not unless it is absolutely necessary. Ed.

V. 10. The apostle doubtless had an intimation from God of the approaching storm: though the particular event of it was not as yet made known to him. 20—26.—The centurion, and all on board the ship, must have had some general knowledge of Paul's character and principles; and the religious converse and worship of him and his friends, as well as their whole behavior, must have excited attention: yet they probably regarded them as deluded men; entitled indeed to civil usage, being very inoffensive and well meaning, yet not worthy of notice as to their religious opinions. But it was the Lord's purpose to exhibit Paul among them, as a most extraordinary person; that they might learn to inquire after his principles, and receive his instructions. Sc.

11 Nevertheless, the centurion believed the master and the owner of the ship, more than those things which were spoken by Paul.

12 ¶ And because the haven was not commodious to winter in, the more part advised to depart thence also, if by any means they might attain to Phenice, and there to winter; which is an haven of Crete, and lieth toward the southwest and northwest.

13 And when the south wind blew softly, supposing that they had obtained their purpose, loosing thence, they sailed close by Crete.

14 But not long after there arose against it a tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon.

15 And when the ship was caught, and could not bear up into the wind, we let her drive.

16 And running under a certain island which is called Clauda, we had much work to come by the boat;

17 Which when they had taken up, they used helps, undergirding the ship; and fearing lest they should fall into the quicksands, strake sail, and so were driven.

18 And being exceedingly tossed with a tempest, the next day they lightened the ship;

19 And the third day we cast out with our own hands the tackling of the ship.

20 And when neither sun nor stars in many days appeared, and no small tempest lay on us, all hope that we should be saved was then taken away.

21 ¶ But after long abstinence, Paul stood forth in the midst of them, and said, Sirs, ye should have hearkened unto me, and not have loosed from Crete, and to have gained this harm and loss.

knew the several parts of the island, well enough. But the centurion would not be governed. Many will show respect to good ministers, that will not take their advice, Ez. 33:31.

V. 12—20. In these verses, we have,

I. The ship putting to sea again, and pursuing her voyage at first with a promising gale. Yet they aimed not to go far, but only to another port of the same island, here called Phenice, some think, because the Phenicians frequented it much, the merchants of Tyre and Sidon. It is here described to lie toward the S. W. and N. W.; i. e. the haven was between two promontories or jutting out of land into the sea, one of which pointed to the N. W. and the other to the S. W. by which it was guarded against the E. winds. Thus hath the Creator provided for the relief and safety of them who go down to the sea in ships, and do business in great waters. In vain were there waters to sail on, if there were not likewise natural harbors to take shelter in.

II. The ship in a storm presently, a dreadful storm. Observe,

1. What their danger and distress was, (1.) A tempestuous wind, not only contrary to them, so that they could not get forward, but violent, like that sent forth in pursuit of Jonah; though Paul was not, as Jonah, running away from God and his duty; the sailors called it Euroclydon, a N. E. wind, on those seas perhaps particularly dangerous; a sort of a whirlwind, for the ship is said to be caught by it, v. 15. God commanded this wind to rise, designing to bring glory to Himself, and reputation to Paul, out of it; stormy winds, being brought out of his treasures, Ps. 135:7. fulfil his word, Ps. 148:8. (2.) The ship was exceedingly tossed, v. 18. kicked like a football from wave to wave, elegantly described, Ps. 107:26, 27. and could not possibly bear up into the wind, i. e. make her way in opposition to the wind; therefore they folded up their sails, and so let the ship drive, whither it was impelled by the impetuous waves. (3.) They saw neither sun nor stars for many days; this made the tempest the more terrible; and the use of the loadstone, for the directing of sailors, not being then found out, made the case the more hazardous. Thus melancholy sometimes is the condition of the people of God on a spiritual account; they walk in darkness, and have no light: yet light is sown for them. (4.) They had abundance of winter weather; no small tempest, cold, rain, and snow, and all the rigors of that season of the year; so that they were ready to perish for cold, and all this many days: yet to get gain there are still those who make nothing of all this; and it is an instance of the wisdom of Divine Providence, that some, notwithstanding the difficulties that attend it, keep up commerce among the nations, and the isles of the Gentiles particularly; and Zebulun can as heartily rejoice in his going out, as Issachar in his tents. Perhaps Christ therefore chose ministers from among sea-faring men, because they had been used to endure hardness.

2. What means they used for their own relief; all the poor shifts (for I can call them no better) that sailors in distress have recourse to. (1.) When they let the ship run adrift, finding it to no purpose to ply either the oar or the sail, they nevertheless did what they could to avoid the present danger, and took care to prevent shipwreck, on a little island, Clauda, v. 16. (2.) When they were afraid they should scarcely save the ship, they were busy to save the boat, which they did with much ado. They had much work to come by the boat, v. 16. but at last they took it up, v. 17. That might be of use in any exigence, and therefore they made hard shift to get it into the ship to them; [for then as now in the E. they towed their boat astern.] (3.) They used means, which were proper enough in those times, when the art of navigation was far short of the perfection it is now come to; * they undergirded the ship, v. 17. i. e. bound it under the bottom with strong cables, to keep it from bulging in the extremity of the tempest. (4.) For fear of falling into the quicksands, they struck sail, and then let the ship go as it would. It is strange, how a ship will live at sea (so they express it) even in very stormy weather, if it have but sea-room; and when the sailors cannot make the shore, it is their interest to keep as far off it as they can. (5.) The next day, they lightened the ship of its cargo, threw the goods and merchandises overboard, (as Jonah, ch. 1:5.) being willing rather to be poor without them, than to perish with them. Any man will rather make shipwreck of his goods than of his life; but many will rather make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience than of their goods. (6.) The third day they cast out the tacklings of the ship; the utensils of it, armamenta, [the artillery,] (so some,) as if it were a ship of force; but I question whether it were not then a vulgar error among seamen thus to throw everything into the sea, even that which would be of great use in a storm, and no great weight.

3. The despair they were at last brought to, v. 20. The storm continued, and the means they had used were ineffectual, so that such was the consternation this melancholy prospect put them into, that they had no heart either to eat or drink. They had provision enough on board, v. 38. but such bondage were they under, through fear of death, that they could not admit the supports of life. Why did not Paul, by the power of Christ, and in his name, lay this storm? Why did he not say to the winds and waves, Peace, be still, as his Master had done? Surely it was because the apostles wrought miracles for the confirmation of their doctrine, not for the serving of a turn for themselves or their friends.

V. 21—44. We have here the issue of the distress of Paul and his fellow-travellers; they escaped with their lives; and that was all; and that was for Paul's sake. Their number is here told, v. 37 to make us the more concerned for them in reading the story, that they were such a considerable number, whose lives were now in the utmost jeopardy, and one Paul among them, worth more than all the rest. We left them in despair, giving up themselves for gone. Now here we have,

* Though Anson (Voyages) speaks of some Spanish men-of-war's resorting to this practice of undergirding. The ropes are passed across the deck and round under the keel. Ed.

V. 11. Master..owner.] Kubernētēs.. nauklēros: besides these the Gr. classics mention the emporos and the proreus as officers. They seem to have answered to the captain (or mate, or boatswain) who governed the sailors; the pilot, or sailing-master, who, at the side or prow, governed the sails, and directed the course, by the headlands, &c.; the steersman or helmsman; and the owner or supercargo. Of the last there seem sometimes to have been several, who made the voyage 'on shares, and consulted in common;' and when there was but one, he seems to have had great influence in directing the ship's manœuvres, as well as what ports she should touch at, &c. But every vessel had not all these officers. See note, Ez. 27:5,7. Ed.

V. 16. Clauda.] Tho islet is now called Gozzo. See Bl. Ed. Boat.] Skaphēs, skiff. As has been remarked, the orientals still tow the ship's boat behind, and do not hoist it up and fix it against the stern: so it would be very likely to be lost in a storm, by the parting of the rope which attached it to the vessel, or being itself stove by the waves, or against the vessel. We may here remark, also, that the custom of having two or more anchors astern as well as on the bows, is still kept up in the E. Note, v. 29. These facts may silence several ignorant scoffs which have been ventured on this ch. Ed.

V. 17. Quicksands.] Surtin. Supposed to have been the greater and less Syrtes, [shifting sand-banks,] towards the coast of Africa, which were extremely formidable to ancient navigators. SCOTT. V. 21. Gained, &c.] Lit. should have been as much better off as we are now worse off for (i. e. should have saved ourselves, avoided) this harm, &c. See Bl. Ed.

22 And now I exhort you to be of good cheer: for there shall be no loss of any man's life among you, but of the ship.

23 For there stood by me this night the angel of God, whose I am, and whom I serve, 24 Saying, Fear not, Paul; thou must be brought before Cesar: and, lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee.

25 Wherefore, Sirs, be of good cheer; for I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me.

26 Howbeit, we must be cast upon a certain island.

27 But when the fourteenth night was come, as we were driven up and down in Adria, about midnight the shipmen deemed that they drew near to some country:

28 And sounded, and found it twenty fathoms: and when they had gone a little further, they sounded again, and found it fifteen fathoms.

29 Then fearing lest they should have fallen upon rocks, they cast four anchors out of the stern, and wished for the day.

1. The encouragement Paul gave them, by assuring them, in the name of God, that their lives should all be saved, then when, in human appearance, all hope that they should be saved was taken away. After long abstinence, as if they were resolved not to eat, till they knew whether they should live or die, Paul stood forth in the midst of them. During distress hitherto Paul hid himself among them, was one of the crowd, helped with the rest to throw out the tackling, v. 19. but now he distinguished himself, and, though a prisoner, undertook to be their counsellor and comforter.

1. He reproves them for not taking his advice, which was to stay where they were, in the road of Lasea, v. 8. They did not hearken to Paul, when he warned them of their danger, and yet, if they will but acknowledge their folly, and repent of it, he will speak comfort and relief now; so compassionate is God to those that are in misery, though they bring themselves into it by their own incontinency, nay, by their own wilfulness, and contempt of admonition. Most people bring themselves into inconvenience, because they do not know when they are well off, but gain harm and loss by aiming, against advice, to mend themselves.

2. Paul quickens them to bestir themselves yet in working for their own safety, by telling them, if they would resume their vigor, they should secure their lives. He gives them this assurance when they were brought to the last extremity, for now it would be doubly welcome to them to be told that not a life should be lost, when they were ready to conclude they must inevitably be all lost. Yet they must count on the loss of the ship, which would be trying to those who were interested in that and the goods, probably, those greater part that were for pushing forward the voyage.

3. He tells them what ground he had for this assurance; it is not a banter on them, to put them into humor, nor a human conjecture, but he has a divine revelation for it, and is as confident of it as that God is true, being fully satisfied that he has his word for it, vs. 23—25. The God from whom he had it is, He whose I am, and whom I serve. He looks upon God as his rightful Owner, and sovereign Ruler and Master, who, having given him being, whose I am, has right to give him law; whom I serve. It is Christ Paul here has an eye to; He is God, and the angels are his, and go on his errands; Paul often calls himself a servant of Jesus Christ. Now this he tells the company, that, seeing their relief coming from his God, they might thereby be drawn in to take Him for their God, and to serve Him likewise; for the same reason Jonah said to his mariners, I fear the Lord, the God of heaven, who has made the sea and the dry land, Jonah 1:9.

Paul knows not where he is himself, yet God's angel knows where to find him out. The ship is tossed with winds and waves, hurried to and fro with the utmost violence, yet the angel finds a way into it. No storms or tempests can hinder the communications of God's favor to his people, for He is a very present Help, a Help at hand, even when the sea roars, and is troubled, Ps. 46:1, 3. We may suppose Paul, being a prisoner, had not a cabin of his own, much less a bed in the captain's cabin, but was put down into the hold; yet there the angel of God stood by him, v. 23. Meanness and poverty set none at a distance from God and his favor. Jacob, when he has no pillow but a stone, no curtains but the clouds, yet has a vision of angels. God chooses rather, by preserving them all for his sake, to show what great blessings good men are to the world, than, by delivering him only, to show how good men are distinguished from the world. God has given thee all them that sail with thee, i. e. spares them, in answer to thy prayers, or for thy sake. Sometimes good men deliver neither sons nor daughters, but their own souls only, Ez. 14:18. But God often spares wicked people for the sake of the godly; as Zoar for Lot's sake, and as Sodom might have been, had there been ten righteous persons in it. There is no greater satisfaction to a good man, than to know that he is a public blessing. Paul comforts them with the same comfort wherewith he himself was comforted, v. 25. and gives them a sign, telling them particularly what this tempestuous voyage would issue in, v. 26. When the church of God, like this ship, is tossed with tempests, and not comforted; when there is none to guide her of all her sons; yet God can bring her safe to shore, and will do it.

II. At length they anchor on an unknown shore, v. 27—29. 1. They had been a full fortnight in the storm, continually expecting death, driven up and down in Adria, not in the Adriatic Gulf, on which Venice stands, but in the Adriatic sea, a part of the Mediterranean, containing both the Sicilian and Ionian seas, and extending to the African shore; in this sea they were tossed, and knew not whereabouts they were. 2. About midnight the mariners, apprehending they drew near to some shore, sounded; by the first experiment they found they drew 20 fathom deep of water, and by the next 15 fathom; which was a demonstration that they were near some shore; God has wisely ordered such a natural notice to sailors in the dark, that they may be cautious. 3. They took the hint, and fearing rocks near the shore, cast anchor, and wished for the day. When those that fear God, walk in darkness, and have no light, yet let them not say, The Lord has forsaken us, or, Our God has forgotten us; but let them do as these mariners did, cast anchor, and wish for the day, and be assured that the day will dawn. Hope is an anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast, entering into that within the veil.

III. A new danger is added to their distress, which they narrowly escaped. Observe,

1. The treacherous design of the shipmen, to leave the sinking ship, v. 30. concluding no other than that when it run ashore it must be broken all to pieces; having the command of the boat, the base project was to get into that, and so save themselves, and leave all the rest to perish. To cover this vile design, they pretended they would cast anchors out of the fore-ship, or carry them further off, and in order to that they let down the boat, which they had taken in, v. 16, 17. and were going into it, having agreed among themselves, when they were in, to make straight for the shore. The treacherous seamen are like the treacherous shepherd, who flees when he sees the danger coming, and there is most need of his help, John 10:12. Paul had, in God's name, assured them they should come safe to land, but they will rather trust their own refuge of lies than God's word of truth.

2. Paul's discovery of it, and protestation against it, v. 31. It was indeed not by any skill of their's that they were brought to land, but now that they are near land, they must use their art to bring the ship to it. When God has done that for us which we could not, we must then in his strength help ourselves. Paul, therefore, speaks humanly, when he says, Ye cannot be saved except these abide in the ship; and he does not at all weaken the assurances he had divinely given, that they should infallibly be saved. God, who appointed the end, that they should be

V. 23. Stood by me the angel, &c.] Eich. in Ros. thinks, Paul dreamed that he and his companions were arrived ashore, and that providentially this dream came to pass, as other dreams sometimes come to pass. Dreams of this kind, i. e. that seem to come to pass, he says, the Jews believed were had by the aid of angels. At the same time, he refers to Storr, as having labored to prove, that this vision of the night was not a natural, but a divine impression, in which Paul could not possibly be deceived. As the human understanding cannot now comprehend the mode and constitution of being in the invisible world, why not confess our ignorance of the manner how, and content ourselves with simply believing the assertions of the text?

V. 27. Deemed, &c.] Lit. 'fancying some land drew near them': it is spoken by a figure (hypallage) which describes things not as they are, but as they appear. So we say the sun rises, &c., and, as here, seamen speak of nearing (i. e. bringing near) the land, fetching a point, &c. See Bloomf.

V. 28—32. Nothing could be more absolute than the promise above given (24): yet neither the centurion nor the soldiers charged Paul with inconsistency, in what he now said to them. If the end was absolutely decreed, the means of attaining it were so likewise; and the case is the same, in concerns of still higher importance. [Comp. note, 2:23.]—

'God hath indeed assured me, that none of all our lives shall miscarry in this danger; but that God, who hath ordained our preservation, hath also ordained the means thereof, and therefore hath appointed, that these mariners shall continue in the ship, if we will hope for safety.' Bp. Hall. 23:12—22, vv. 16—18. 25:9—11.

(28.) Fathoms.] Orguiai: (from oregesthai, to stretch,) the distance a man can compass by stretching his arms. This the Romans made five feet, the Greeks (who had shorter measures) six. So yard is from the Anglo-Saxon gered, stretched, i. e. the length of a stretched arm: and fathom or fadam (from the Dutch, vadem), the distance a man can stride, both ways, from one foot fixed.

(29.) Rocks.] 'Had they been sure of soft ground they would have run ashore, as the ancients never scrupled to do in such cases.' Four anchors out of the stern.] 'So Cesar speaks of vessels with four anchors at the four corners; and Val. Fla. of anchors cast from the stern; Virg. of anchors cast from the bows. James (Epist.) says, there were in his time ships plying between Alexandria and Constantinople, that carried anchors in the poops; and confirms it by a passage of Heliodorus. Further, Chardin tells us, that the large modern Egyptian ships always carry their anchors at their stern, never at the prow.' Bl. Note, v. 16.

30 And as the shipmen were about to flee out of the ship, when they had let down the boat into the sea, under color as though they would have cast anchors out of the foreship, 31 Paul said to the centurion and to the soldiers, Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved.

32 Then the soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat, and let her fall off.

33 And while the day was coming on, Paul besought them all to take meat, saying, This day is the fourteenth day that ye have tarried, and continued fasting, having taken nothing.

34 Wherefore I pray you to take some meat; for this <sup>c</sup>is for your health: for there <sup>d</sup>shall not an hair fall from the head of any of you.

35 And when he had thus spoken, he took bread, and <sup>e</sup>gave thanks to God in the presence of them all: and when he had broken it, he began to eat.

36 Then were they all of good cheer, and they also took some meat.

37 And we were in all, in the ship, two hundred threescore and sixteen souls.

38 And when they had eaten enough, they lightened the ship, and cast out the wheat into the sea.

39 And when it was day, they knew not the land: but they discovered a certain creek with a shore, into the which they were minded, if it were possible, to thrust in the ship.

saved, appointed the means, that they should be saved by the help of these shipmen; though if they had gone off, no doubt God would have made his word good, some other way. Paul speaks as a prudent man, not as a prophet, when he says, These are necessary to your preservation. Duty is ours, events are God's; and we do not trust God, but tempt Him, when we say, 'We put ourselves under his protection,' and do not use proper means, such as are within our power, for our own preservation.

3. The effectual defeating of it by the soldiers, v. 32. It was no time to stand arguing the case with the shipmen; therefore, they cut the ropes of the boat, and though it might otherwise have done them service in their present distress, they chose rather to let it fall off, and lose it, than suffer it to do them this dis-service. And now the shipmen, being forced to stay, are forced likewise to work for the safety of the ship, because, if the rest perish, they must perish with them.

IV. The new life Paul put into the company, by his cheerful inviting them to take some refreshment, and the repeated assurances given them, that they should all of them have their lives given them for a prey. Happy they who had such an one as Paul in their company, who not only had correspondence with heaven, but was of a hearty, lively spirit with those about him; such a friend in distress, is a friend indeed, Prov. 27:10. The day's coming on revived them a little, and then Paul got them together.

1. He chid them for their neglect of themselves, that they had so far given way to fear and despair, as to forget or not to mind their food, v. 33. Not that they had all, or any of them, continued 14 days without any food, but they had not had any set meal, as they used to have, all that time; they ate very little, next to nothing. Or, 'You have continued fasting, you have lost your stomach; you have had no appetite at all to your food, nor any relish of it, through prevailing fear and despair.' A very disconsolate state is thus expressed, Ps. 102:4. It is a sin to starve the body, and to deny it its necessary supports; and it is a sore evil under the sun, to have a sufficiency of the good things of this life, and not to have power to use them, Eccl. 6:2. If this arise from the sorrow of the world, and from any inordinate fear or trouble, it is so far from excusing it, that it is another sin, it is discounting, it is distrust of God, it is all wrong. What folly is it, to die for fear of dying! But thus the sorrow of the world works death, while joy in God is life and peace [as here to Paul], in the greatest distresses and dangers.

2. He courts them to their food, v. 34. 'We have a hard struggle before us, must get to shore as well as we can; if our bodies be weak through fasting, we shall not be able to help ourselves.' I pray you, I exhort you, if you will be ruled by me, take some nourishment; though you have no appetite to it, yet let reason bring you to it, for this is for your health; or rather, your preservation, or safety, at this time; it is for your salvation, you cannot without nourishment have strength to shift for your lives. Weak and trembling Christians, that give way to doubts and fears about their spiritual state, if they would feed and feast as they ought, on the provision Christ has made for them, would be strengthened, and it would be for their souls' health and salvation.

3. He assures them of their preservation; There shall not a hair fall from the head of any of you. It is a proverbial expression, denoting a complete indemnity.

4. He himself spread their table for them; for none of them had any heart to do it; When he had thus spoken, he took bread, fetched it from the ship's stores, to which every one might safely have access, when none of them had an appetite. We have reason to be thankful to God, that we have not only food to our appetite, but appetite to our food; that our soul abhors not even dainty meat, Job 33:20. through sickness or sorrow.

5. He was chaplain to the ship; he gave thanks to God in presence of them all. We have reason to think he had often and daily prayed with Luke and Aristarchus, and what other Christians there were among them, but whether before with the whole company promiscuously, is not certain; now he gave thanks to God in presence of them all; that they were alive, had been preserved, and had a promise they should be preserved in the imminent peril now before them; he gave thanks for the provision they had, and begged a blessing on it. He gave thanks in presence of them all, not only to show that he served a Master he was not ashamed of, but to invite them into his service too. If we crave a blessing on our meat, and give thanks for it in a right manner, we shall not only keep up a comfortable communion with God ourselves, but credit our profession, and recommend it to the good opinion of others.

6. He set them a good example; When he had given thanks, he brake the bread, and began to eat; whether they would be encouraged or no, he would; he would eat his meat, and be thankful. Those that teach others, are inexcusable, if they do not themselves as they teach; and the most effectual way of preaching is by example.

7. It had a happy influence on them all, v. 36. They then ventured to believe the message God sent them by Paul, when they plainly perceived that Paul believed it himself, who was in the same common danger with them. Thus God sends good tidings to the perishing world of mankind, by those who are of themselves, and in the same common danger with themselves, who are sinners too, and must be saved, if ever they be saved, in the same way in which they persuade others to venture; and it is here on this occasion that the number of the persons is set down, which we took notice of before, 276. See how many may be influenced by the good example of one! They did all eat, nay they did all eat enough, v. 38. they made a hearty meal; which explains the meaning of their fasting before for 14 days; not that they did not eat all that time, but they never had enough all that time, as they had now.

8. They once more lightened the ship, that it might escape the better in the shock it was now to have; they had before thrown the wares and the tackle overboard, and now the wheat, the victuals and provisions they had; better they should sink it, than that it should sink them. It is probable the ship was over-loaded with the multitude of the passengers, for this comes in just after the account of the number of them, and that obliged them so often to lighten the ship.

V. Their putting to shore, and the staying of the ship in the adventure. It was about break of day when they ate their meat, and when it was fair day, they began to look about them, and,

1. Knew not where they were, whether in Europe, Asia, or Africa, for each had shores washed by the Adriatic sea, though probably these shipmen had often sailed this way. Let not the wise glory in his wisdom.

2. They observed a creek with a level shore, into which they hoped to thrust the ship, v. 39. Though they knew not what country it was, nor whether the inhabitants were friends or foes, evil or barbarous, they determined to cast themselves on their mercy, for it was land. Those who live on the sea-coast, have often opportunity of succoring those in distress at sea, and of saving precious lives, and they ought to do their utmost in order to it, with all readiness and cheerfulness; for it is a great sin, and very provoking to God, to forbear to deliver them that are driven unto death, and are ready to be slain; and it will not serve for an excuse to say, Behold, we

(30.) Cast.] Rather carried out, technically speaking, so to drop them that their cables might not get entangled.

(31.) 'That God foretold the deliverance of this ship's company as certain, though suspended on this condition, because He knew it would be complied with, and directed Paul to urge the necessity of that compliance, as what He knew would be the successful means of securing it, though none can deny but these sailors had a natural power of going out of the ship, or the soldiers a natural power of permitting them to do it. The application of this remark to other affairs of greater moment appears both easy and important.'

V. 33. Taken nothing.] 'Not to be understood lit., and implying only, that they had not taken food during that time in the ordinary way, and a full meal.' Ros. 'So Appian speaks of an army, which, for 20 days, took no food nor sleep; by which he must mean, they never made full meals, nor slept whole nights together.'

V. 38. Wheat.] Most recent commentators, and Bloomf., tr. provisions, as Job 3:24. Prov. 4:17. for, 'had their cargo been wheat, they would doubtless have thrown it overboard before, as there had already been two apobolai' discharges, v. 18, 19.

V. 39. Shore.] I. e. beach to run upon (so the Gr.), as is the custom in the Mediterranean, even now, with smaller vessels. 'This inlet on the N. W. of Malta, is now called La Cala di San Paolo [St. Paul's Creek].'
Bl. It opens to the N. E. with a sand-bank in its middle, formed by a current, which passes between the coast and an island: here two seas meet, v. 41. Recurring to Dr. Anderson's travels, the Ed. finds this is the traditional place of the shipwreck. Cuts and note, Ae. end. Ed.

40 And when they had <sup>f</sup> taken up the anchors, they committed themselves unto the sea, and loosed the rudder-bands, and hoised up the mainsail to the wind, and made toward shore.

41 And falling into a place where two seas met, they ran the ship aground; and the forepart stuck fast, and remained unmovable, but the hinder part was broken with the violence of the waves.

42 And the soldiers' counsel <sup>g</sup> was to kill the prisoners, lest any of them should swim out, and escape.

43 But the centurion, willing to save <sup>h</sup> Paul, kept them from their purpose; and commanded that they which could swim should cast themselves first into the sea, and get to land:

44 And the rest, some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship. And so <sup>i</sup> it came to pass, that they escaped all safe to land.

CHAP. XXVIII.

AND when they were escaped, then they knew that the island <sup>a</sup> was called Melita.

knew it not; when either we did, or might, and should, have known it, Prov. 24: 11, 12. I have been told there are some, and in our own nation too, who, when from the sea-coast they see a ship in distress, and at a loss, will, by misguiding fires or otherwise, purposely lead them into danger, that the lives may be lost, and they may have the plunder of the ship. One can scarce believe any of the human nature could possibly be so wicked, so barbarously inhuman, and should have so much of the devil in them; if there be, let them know of a truth, that they shall have judgment without mercy, who have showed no mercy.

chors, the four anchors which they cast out of the stern, v. 29. Some think they took pains to weigh them up, hoping they should have use for them again at the shore; others, that they did it with such precipitation, that they were forced to cut the cables, and leave them; the original will admit either; they then committed themselves to the sea, the wind standing fair to carry them into the port, and they loosed the rudder-bands, which were fastened during the storm, for the greater steadiness of the ship, but, now that they were putting into the port, were loosed, that the pilot might steer with the greater freedom; they then hoisted up the mainsail to the wind, and made towards shore. The original words here used for the rudder-bands, and the mainsail, find the critics a deal of work, to accommodate them to the modern terms; but they need not give us any difficulty, who are content to know that when they saw the shore, they hastened to it as fast as they could; and perhaps made more haste than good speed. And should not a poor soul that has long been struggling with winds and tempests in this world, long to put into the safe and quiet haven of everlasting rest? Should it not get clear from all that which fastens it to this earth, and straitens the out-goings of its pious and devout affections heavenward? And should it not hoist up the mainsail of faith to the wind of the Spirit, and so with longing desires make to shore.

4. They made a shift among them to run the ship aground, in a shelf, or bed of sand, as it should seem, or an isthmus, or neck of land, washed with the sea on both sides, and, therefore, two seas are said to meet on it, and there the fore part stuck fast; and then, when it had no liberty to play, as a ship has when it rides at anchor, but remained unmovable, the hinder part would soon be broken, of course, by the violence of the waves. The ship, that had strangely weathered the storm in the vast ocean, where it had room to roll, is dashed to pieces when it sticks fast. Thus if the heart fixes in the world, in love and affection, and adherence to it, it is lost; Satan's temptations beat against it, and it is gone; but as long as it keeps above the world, though it be tossed with its cares and tumults, there is hope of it.

VI. A particular danger Paul and the rest of the prisoners were in, besides their share in the common calamity, and their deliverance from it.

1. In this critical moment, when every man hung in doubt of his life, the soldiers advised the killing of the prisoners committed to their custody, and whom they were to give account of, lest any of them should swim out and escape, v. 42. There was no great danger of that, for they could not escape far, weak and weary as they were; and under the eye of so many soldiers that had the charge of them, it was not likely they should attempt it; and if it should so happen, though they might be obnoxious to the law, for a permissive escape, yet, in such a case as this, equity would certainly relieve them. But it was a brutish, barbarous motion, and so much the worse, that they were thus prodigal of other peoples' lives, when, without a miracle of mercy, they must lose their own.

2. The centurion, for Paul's sake, quashed this motion presently. Though he despised Paul's advice, v. 11. yet he afterwards saw great cause to respect him; and therefore being willing to save Paul, he kept them from their purpose. It does not appear that any were malefactors convicted, but only suspected, and waiting their trial; and in such a case as this, better ten guilty escape, than one innocent be slain. As God had saved all in the ship for Paul's sake, so here the centurion saves all the prisoners for his sake; such a diffusive good is a good man!

VII. The saving of the lives of all the persons in the ship, by the wonderful providence of God. 1. Some were saved by swimming; The centurion commanded his own soldiers, in the first place, as many as could swim, to get to land first, and to be ready to receive the prisoners, and prevent their escape. The Romans trained up their youth to swimming, which was often of service to them in their wars: Julius Cesar was a famous swimmer. 2. The rest with much ado scrambled to the shore, some on boards, that they had loose with them in the ship, and others on the broken pieces of the ship; [or things which came from the ship;] so it came to pass, one way or another, that, through the good providence of God, they escaped all safe to land. Here was an instance of the performance of a particular word of promise God gave, that, whatever difficulties lie in the way, all the persons in this ship should be saved for Paul's sake.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1—10. We are the more concerned to notice and improve what is here recorded concerning blessed Paul, because, after the story of this ch., we hear no more of him in the sacred history, though

PRACT OBS. The Lord provides kind friends, and adequate consolations, for his faithful servants, in all their multiplied and varied trials: and even such persons, as might previously have been expected to be inimical to them, are sometimes induced to treat them courteously, and to minister to their refreshment; nor shall these fail of receiving a suitable reward.—Zealous and able ministers cannot, in any situation, be wholly excluded from usefulness: and their gracious God often causes them to pass through troubles, to manifest the power of his consolations in supporting them, and the excellency of their principles and character; in order to excite the attention of the careless, the ignorant, and the prejudiced, to their example and instructions. Men in general are so selfish, that they are ready to provide for their own preservation,

V. 40. De Dien, Wetst., Pearce, Markl., Schl., Heint., Kuin., Bl., &c., adopt the marg. tr., for the object was to lighten the ship. Grot., Boch., Elsn., Pearce, Scheffer, Lips., and Periz., prove, that the ancients in their large ships had two rudders. These appear to have been attached, one on each side of the stern; by bands, as on a pivot, so that the larger ends could be raised out of the water, either by lashing the upper ends close down to the deck, or sides, or the lower ends close against the sides of the ship: cuts, 2 S. 19:18. Is. 33:21. These rudders, it would seem, were unshipped and taken off when in port: here, by 'unloosing the rudder-bands' the lower or broad part of the rudder was probably dropped into the sea, and so again became of use for steering. See Bloomf. and comp. the cut of a vessel of this age, seen pictured at Pompeii. Mainsail.] It seems rather to have been a sail (see Bl.) attached to the dolon, a short foremast, perhaps one raised for the occasion: this even by such measures as directly conduce to the destruction of those, with whom they are most intimately connected! No peril or sufferings can subdue human depravity: so that soldiers and sailors, who experience more hardships, dangers, and evident deliverances than other men; and who, it might be thought, would be more careful than others to be always prepared for death and judgment; are too commonly peculiarly regardless of religion and morality [how imperious then is the duty of society, especially of Christians, towards them!]. It will at length so come to pass, that, by one mean or another, all [true believers will] escape safe to heaven, where mutual congratulations and admiring praises and thanksgivings, will succeed their present trials and distresses, and will not be terminated or interrupted to all eternity. SCOTT.

of course would lift the vessel's bows, and so ease her on to the land, and enable her to run farther in shore before she struck: but the design was frustrated by their grounding unawares on the spit, v. 41. It will be recollected that the ancients had no bowsprit. Ed.

V. 41. Where two, &c.] A portion of land, on a sandbank from the shore, ending in a point, (called by sailors, a spit, from its sharp ending,) divided the channel in the midst, on each side of which was deep water. SCOTT. This concealed spit of sand was, says Bl., 'the elongation of a ness plainly to be seen on Cluverius' map.' [Cut, and note, Ac. end.] Ed.

V. 42—44. This [the immediate execution of the whole company, though yet uncondemned] could not have been thought of, had not the Roman laws allowed it, or had it not been sometimes done. So that this cruel and unfeeling policy disgraced the jurisprudence of the renowned Romans! Indeed, the centurion himself seems not to have been at all shocked by the proposal: and he was induced, rather by a personal regard to Paul, than by general principles, either of humanity or justice, to negative the counsel: and this at a time too, when his own life and that of the soldiers were in as much peril, as the lives of the prisoners. It is highly reasonable to suppose, that these extraordinary incidents were overruled to the conversion and salvation of many of their souls. SCOTT.

NOTES. CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1. Melita.] 'It is well known that this island took its name from the abundance of honey found in it: it

2 And the barbarous <sup>b</sup> people shewed us no little kindness: for they kindled a fire, and received us <sup>c</sup> every one, because of the present rain, and because of the cold.

3 ¶ And when Paul had gathered a bundle of sticks, and laid them on the fire, there came a viper out of the heat, and fastened on his hand.

4 And when the barbarians saw the venomous beast hang on his hand, they said among themselves, No doubt <sup>d</sup> this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live.

5 And he shook off the beast into the fire, and felt <sup>e</sup> no harm.

6 Howbeit, they looked when he should have swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly: but after they had looked a great while, and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds, and said <sup>f</sup> that he was a god.

we have a great deal of him yet before us in his epistles; we have attended him through several chs., from one judgment-seat to another, and could at last have taken leave of him with the more pleasure, if we had left him at liberty; but in this eh. we are to console with him, and yet congratulate him. What a great variety of places and circumstances do we find Paul in! He was a planet, and not a fixed star. Here we have him in an island, to which, in all probability, he had never come, if he had not been thrown upon it by a storm; and yet, it seems, God has work for him to do here. This island was called Melita, lying between Sicily and Africa; 20 miles long, and 12 broad; it lies farthest from the continent of any island in the Mediterranean; it is about 60 miles from Sicily. It has been famous since, for the knights of Malta, who, when the Turks overran that part of Christendom, made a noble stand, and gave some check to the progress of their arms.

Now here we have,

I. The kind reception the inhabitants gave to the distressed, shipwrecked strangers, v. 2. God had promised there should be no loss of any man's life; and if, when they came ashore, they had perished for cold or want, it had been all one; therefore Providence continues its care of them, and what benefits we receive by the hand of man, must be acknowledged to come from the hand of God; for, as, when He pleases, He can make enemies to be at peace, so He can make strangers to be friends, friends in adversity, and that is the time a brother is born for. Observe,

1. The general notice taken of the kindness the natives of Malta showed to Paul and his company; they are called barbarous people, because not, in language and customs, conformed either to the Greeks or Romans, who looked superciliously enough on all but themselves as barbarians, though otherwise civilized enough, and perhaps in some cases more civil than they. These barbarous people, however so called, were full of humanity; they showed us no little kindness. Far from making a prey of this shipwreck, as many, I fear, called Christian people, would have done, they laid hold on it as an opportunity of showing mercy! and it is written for our imitation, that we may hence learn to be compassionate, and to relieve and succor those in distress to the utmost of our ability, as those that know we ourselves are also in the body; we should be ready to entertain strangers, Heb. 13:2. but, especially strangers in distress. Who knows but these barbarous people, had their lot cast in this island for such a time as this!

2. A particular instance of their kindness; They kindled a fire, in some large hall or other, and they received us every one; made room for us about the fire, and bid us all welcome, without asking either what country we were of, or what religion. We must suppose they were sadly wet, of course; and it was cold too; so they wanted nothing so much as a good fire, for they had eaten heartily just before on shipboard. It is sometimes as much a piece of charity to poor families, to supply them with fuel, as with food or raiment. Be ye warmed, is as necessary as, Be ye filled. When, in the extremities of bad weather, we find ourselves fenced against the rigors of the season, by the accommodations of a warm house, bed, clothes, and a good fire, we should think how many lie exposed to the present rain, and to the cold, and pity them, and pray for them, and help them if we can.

II. Paul's further danger by a viper's fastening on his hand, and the unjust construction the people put on it.

1. When the fire was to be made, and to be made bigger, that so great a company might all have the benefit of it, Paul was as busy as any of them in gathering sticks, v. 3. He was an industrious, active man, and loved to be doing when anything was to be done, and never contrived to take his ease. He was a humble, and self denying-man, and would stoop to anything by which he might be serviceable, even to the gathering of sticks to make a fire of. We should reckon nothing below us but sin, and be willing to condescend to the meanest offices, if there be occasion, for the good of our brethren. The people were ready to help them; yet Paul, wet and cold as he is, will not throw it all on them, but will help himself. They that receive benefit by the fire, should help to carry fuel to it.

2. The sticks being old, dry rubbish, it happened there was a viper among them, that lay as dead till it came to the heat, and then revived, or lay quiet till it felt the fire, and then was provoked, and flew at him that unawares threw it into the fire, and fastened on his hand, v. 3. Serpents, and such venomous creatures, commonly lie among sticks, Am. 5:19. It was so common, that people were by it frightened from tearing hedges, Eccl. 10:8. See how many perils human life is exposed to, and what danger we are in from inferior creatures, which are many of them become enemies to men, since men became rebels to God; and what a mercy it is, that we are preserved from them as we are!

3. The barbarous people concluded, that Paul, being a prisoner, was certainly a murderer, who had appealed to Rome, to escape justice in his own country, and that this viper was sent by divine justice, to be the avenger of blood. Now in this we may see,

(1.) Some discoveries of natural light; they were barbarous people, perhaps had no books of learning among them, yet they knew naturally, that there is a God that governs the world, and a providence that presides in all occurrences; that evil pursues sinners; that there are good works which God will reward, and wicked works which He will punish; they believe that murder is a heinous crime, which shall not long go unpunished; that whoso sheds man's blood, if his blood be not shed by man, by the magistrate, as it ought to be, it shall be shed by the righteous Judge of heaven and earth, who is the Avenger of wrong. Those that think they shall go unpunished in any evil way, will be judged out of the mouth of these barbarians, and those who, because they have escaped many judgments, are secure, may learn from these illiterate people, that, though malefactors have escaped the vengeance of the sea, yet there is no outrunning divine justice; vengeance suffers not to live. In Job's time, you might ask them that go by the way, ask the next body you met, and they would tell you, that the wicked is reserved to the day of destruction.

(2.) Some mistakes of natural light, which needed to be rectified by divine revelation; in two things their knowledge was defective. [1.] They thought all wicked people are punished in this life; whereas it is not so; the wicked, even murderers, sometimes live, become old, yea, are mighty in power; for the day of vengeance is to come in the other world, the great day of wrath; and many are left unpunished, to prove that there is a judgment to come. [2.] They thought all who were remarkably afflicted in this life, were wicked people; a mistake Job's friends went upon, in their judgment on his case; but divine revelation sets this matter in a true light,—that all things come ordinarily alike to all; that good men are oftentimes greatly afflicted in this life, for the exercise and improvement of their faith and patience.*

4. When he shook off the viper, yet they expected divine vengeance would ratify the censure they had passed, and that he would have swollen and burst, through the force of the poison, or that he should have fallen down dead suddenly. See how apt men are, when once they have got an ill opinion, though ever so unjust, to abide by it, and to think God must necessarily confirm and ratify their peevish sentence! It was well they did not knock Paul down themselves, when they saw he did not swell and fall down; but so considerate they are, as to let Providence work, and to attend the motions of it.

III. Paul's deliverance from the danger, and the undue construction the people put on that; The viper's fastening on his hand, was a trial of his faith; and it was found to praise, and honor, and glory: for,

1. It does not appear that it put him into also yields a great deal of cotton, and though it has but three feet depth of earth above the solid rock, is very fruitful. Paul's shipwreck here engaged a kind of superstitious regard to it, in consequence of which it was given, A. D. 1530, by the Emperor Charles V. to the knights of St. John in Jerusalem, when they had been expelled from Rhodes by the Turks. They [were] 1000 in number, of whom 500 always resided on the island, and [were] called Hospitaliers.' [Cuts, Ac. end.] Doddr.

V. 2. Barbarians.] Barbaroi: comp. the terms, shenmo, of the Egyptians; touran, of the Persians; goim, of the Jews, and ee-jin, of the Chinese, applied to foreigners. Bl. derives barbaroi from the Punie berber, a shepherd, a name especially appropriated to the indigenous and pastoral inhabitants of Africa, by their more civilized neighbors on the other side the Mediterranean; so it came at last to mean savage. The inhabitants, too, of Malta were of Carthaginian origin, and spoke Punie. Nations are not yet rid of these feelings! Ed.

V. 3. Viper, vs. 4, 5. Beast.] A fierce animal is the proper import of the word. Ros. has well shown, that the physicians use it to express any poisonous animal, and Lucian in particular applies it, as here, to a viper: but to render it beast is by no means justifiable. No harm, v. 5.] 'Elsner observes, that many of the heathen thought there was something divine in the nature of serpents, and that deities, or good genii, who were made use of as the instruments of delivering and honoring those that were the peculiar favorites of the gods, often appeared in that shape. Hence, idols were often made with serpents near them; and there have been numerous and indeed astonishing instances of religious worship paid to that kind of animal, absurd as it may seem.' Doddr. Indeed ophite or snake-worship seems to have been almost universal. Ed. The poisonous vipers of Italy and Africa do not, like some species of harmless snakes with us, wind around a person's hand, but dart upon and bite them at once, and keep fast hold.' BLOOMF.

V. 6. 'The swelling, first local, then universal, is a common symptom: and Waterton says, that darts, dipped in the Woral poison (of S.

7 ¶ In the same quarters were possessions of the chief man of the island, whose name was Publius; who received us, and lodged us three days courteously.

8 And it came to pass, that the father of Publius lay sick of a fever, and of a bloody flux: to whom Paul entered in, and prayed, and laid his hands on him, and healed him.

9 So when this was done, others also, which had diseases in the island, came, and were healed:

10 Who also honored us with many honors; and when we departed, they laded us with such things as were necessary.

any fright or confusion at all; he did not shriek, or start, nor, as it would be natural for us to do, throw it off with terror and precipitation; for he suffered it to hang on so long, that the people had time to notice it, and make their remarks upon it. Such a wonderful presence of mind he had, and such a composure, as no man could have on such a sudden accident, but by the special aids of divine grace, and the actual belief and consideration of that word of Christ concerning his disciples, Mark 16:18. They shall take up serpents. This is to have the heart fixed, trusting in God.

2. He carelessly shook off the viper into the fire, without any difficulty, calling for help, or any means used to loosen its hold; and, probably, it was consumed in the fire. Thus, in the strength of the grace of Christ, believers shake off the temptations of Satan, that the wicked one toucheth them not, so as to fasten on them, 1 John 5:18. When we despise the censures and reproaches of men, and look on them with a holy contempt, having the testimony of conscience for us, then we do, as Paul here, shake off the viper into the fire. It does us no harm, except we either fret at it, or be deterred by it from our duty, or be provoked to render railing for railing.

3. They looked a great while, but saw no harm come to him. God hereby intended to make him remarkable among these barbarous people, and so to make way for the entertainment of the Gospel among them. It is reported, that after this, no venomous creature would live in that island, any more than in Ireland; but I do not find that the matter of fact is confirmed, though the popish writers speak of it with assurance.

4. They then magnified him as much as before they had vilified him; They said he was a god; an immortal god. See the uncertainty of popular opinion, how it turns with the wind, and how apt it is to run into extremes both ways.

IV. The miraculous cure of an old gentleman ill of a fever, and of others, otherwise diseased, by Paul. And with these confirmations of the doctrine of Christ, no doubt there was a faithful publication of it. Observe,

1. The kind entertainment Publius, the chief man of the island, gave to them, v. 7. some think, he was governor. It is happy when God gives a large heart to those to whom He has given a large estate. It became him, who was the chief man of the island, to be most hospitable and generous; [him,] who was the richest man, to be rich in good works.

2. The illness of the father of Publius; a fever and a bloody flux often go together, and, when they do, are commonly fatal. Providence ordered he should be ill just at this time, that the cure of him might be a present recompense to Publius for his generosity, and the cure of him by a miracle, a recompense particularly for his kindness to Paul, whom he received in the name of a prophet, and had this prophet's reward.

3. His cure; Paul took cognizance of his ease, and though not urged to it, yet he entered in, not as a physician, but as an apostle, prayed, and then laid his hands on him, and he was perfectly well in an instant: he must needs be in years, yet he recovered his health, and the lengthening out of life yet longer would be a merey to him.

4. The cure of many others. A good man will endeavor to do good, wherever the providence of God casts him. Paul reckoned himself a debtor, not only to the Greeks, but to the barbarians, and thanked God for an opportunity of being useful among them. Nay, he was particularly obliged to these inhabitants of Malta, and hereby he did in effect discharge his quarters; which should encourage us to entertain strangers, for some thereby have entertained angels, and some apostles, unawares; God will not be behindhand with any for kindness shown to his people in distress. We have reason to think, that Paul, with these cures, preached the Gospel to them, and that, coming thus confirmed and recommended, it was generally embraced among them. And if so, never were any people so enriched by a shipwreck on their coasts, as these Maltese.

V. The grateful acknowledgment, which even these barbarous people made of the kindness Paul had done them, in preaching Christ unto them. They were civil to him, and to the other ministers that were with him, who, it is likely, were assisting him in preaching among them, v. 10. 1. They honored us with many honors; showed them all possible respect; they saw God honored them, and therefore justly thought themselves obliged to honor them; and thought nothing too much by which they might testify the esteem they had for them. The faithful preachers of the Gospel are worthy of a double honor, then especially when they succeed in their labors. 2. When we departed, they laded us with such things as were necessary; or, they put on board such things as we had occasion for. Paul could not labor with his hands here, for he had nothing to work upon, and therefore accepted the kindness of the good people of Melita, not as a fee for his cures, (freely he had received, and freely he gave,) but as the relief of his wants, and theirs that were with him. And having reaped of their spiritual things, it was but just they should make them those returns, 1 Cor. 9:11.

V. 11-16. We have here the progress of Paul's voyage towards Rome, and his arrival there at length; a rough and dangerous voyage he had had hitherto, and narrowly escaped with his life, but the latter part of his voyage was easy and quiet.

1. Their leaving Malta; notice is here taken,

1. Of the time of their departure; after three months, the three winter-months. Paul had warned them before, but now they needed not a further warning: their learning did them good when they had paid dear for it. Experience is therefore called the mistress of fools, because fools will not learn, till experience has taught them.

2. The ship in which they departed was of Alexandria; so was that which was east away, ch. 27:6. Two ships, both of Alexandria, both bound for Italy, both thrown on the same island, but one wrecked, the other saved. Events are thus varied, that we may learn both how to want, and how to abound. The historian notices the sign of the ship, Castor and Pollux, little, foolish, pagan deities, the poets made to preside over storms, and to protect seafaring men, as gods of the sea; these were painted or graven on the fore part of the ship, and thence its name. I suppose this is observed only the better to ascertain the story; that ship being well known by that name and sign, by all that dealt between Egypt and Italy. Lightfoot America), cause almost immediate death. Pliny says, of the Scythian darts, dipped in viper's blood, "on a slight touch they forthwith bring death."

V. 7-10. It had been providentially ordered, that the ship should be wrecked, near the house and estate of the governor of the island; thus Paul became acquainted with the sickness of the governor's father. It is reasonable to conclude from this compendious narrative, that the conduct and discourses of Paul and his friends, and all the events of the shipwreck and deliverance, had made a deep impression on the minds of the soldiers, sailors, and passengers; and that they too had behaved so well at Melita, as to conciliate the esteem and favor of the inhabitants.—No one will ever repent of having entertained a servant of God, however wretched and indigent. Beza. (7) The chief man. Protos: Grotius has produced an ancient inscription, by which it appears, the title of protos, or chief, was given the governor of this island, and so it is used here by Luke, with his usual propriety of expression. Doddr. Sc.

V. 11. Castor and Pollux. The figure used for these, as Lightf. says, was that of two young men on horseback, with each of them a javelin in his hand, &c. But others have observed, that it was the sign of a double cross: and though the Greeks took them for a sign in the zodiac, which was called the twins, and considered as sacred to these fictitious deities, it was not at first represented by two boys, but by two beasts, as referring to the fruitfulness of goats in producing twin kids about the time the sun was in that constellation. The appearance of both these constellations together was thought favorable to mariners, and therefore, for a good omen, they had them carved or painted on the head of the ships, [cut, Is. 33:21.] and gave it name from, thence, which the sacred historian does not scruple to use. Doddr. Sign. Parasēmon: the Romans had the tutela on the poop, and the insigne parasēmon at the prow: the image here seems to have been placed on both. Bl. Note and cut, Ez. 27:5-7. The cut, from a painting in Pompeii, of that age, will assist in explaining the arrangement of ancient vessels. The figure-head, half of which only seems to be seen, may be of 'Castor and Pollux,' another head being added on the other side of the board, which seems to separate the figure-head into two parts. En.

12 And landing at Syracuse, we tarried there three days.

13 And from thence we fetched a compass, and came to Rhegium : and after one day the south wind blew, and we came the next day to Puteoli ;

14 Where we found brethren, and were desired to tarry with them seven days : and so we went toward Rome.

15 And from thence, when the brethren heard of us, they came <sup>k</sup> to meet us as far as Appii Forum, and the Three Taverns : whom when Paul saw, he thanked God, and took <sup>l</sup> courage.

16 And when we came to Rome, the centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the guard : but Paul was suffered to dwell by himself <sup>m</sup> with a soldier that kept him.

17 ¶ And it came to pass, that after three days Paul called the chief of the Jews together : and when they were come together, he said unto them, Men and brethren, though <sup>n</sup> I have committed nothing against the people, or customs of our fathers, yet was I delivered <sup>o</sup> prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans ;

thinks Luke mentions it, to intimate the men's superstition, that they hoped they should have better sailing under this badge than before.

II. Their landing, and journey toward Rome.

1. At Syracuse in Sicily ; there they tarried three days, probably to put ashore goods, or make some merchandise there ; for this ship seems to have been on a trading voyage. Paul had now his curiosity gratified, with the sight of places he had often heard of, and wished to see ; particularly Syracuse, a place of great antiquity and note ; yet, it should seem, there were no Christians there.

2. From Syracuse they came to Rhegium, a city in Italy, directly opposite to Messina in Sicily, belonging to the kingdom of Calabria or Naples ; there, it seems, they stayed one day. And a very formal story the Rómish legends tell, of Paul's preaching here at this time, and the fish coming to the shore to hear him ; that with a candle he set a stone pillar on fire, and by that miracle convinced the people of the truth of his doctrine, and they were many of them baptized, and he ordained Stephen, one of his companions in this voyage, to be their bishop ; and all this, they tell you, was done in this one day ; whereas it does not appear that they did so much as go ashore, but only came to an anchor in the road.

3. From Rhegium, they came to Puteoli, a sea-port town not far from Naples, now called Pozzolana [and Pozzuoli] ; the ship of Alexandria was bound for that part ; and therefore there Paul, and the rest bound for Rome, were put ashore, and went the remainder of their way by land. At Puteoli they found brethren, Christians ; they heard of him, or he inquired them out, as it were, by instinct. Brethren in Christ should find out one another, and keep up communion with each other, as those of the same country do in a foreign land. They desired Paul and his companions to tarry with them seven days, i. e. to forecast to stay at least one Lord's day, and assist them in their public worship. They knew not whether ever they should see Paul at Puteoli again ; therefore he must not go, but he must give them a sermon or two, or more. And Paul was willing to allow them so much of his time ; and the centurion, under whose command Paul now was, perhaps having himself friends or business at Puteoli, agreed to stay one week there, to oblige Paul.

4. From Puteoli they went forward toward Rome ; whether on foot, or on beasts, as ch. 23: 24. does not appear.

III. The meeting the Christians at Rome gave to Paul ; probably notice was sent them by the Christians at Puteoli, which gave an opportunity for this interview. Observe,

1. The great honor they did to Paul ; they had heard much of his fame, and of his sufferings, and how God had owned him, therefore they not only longed to see him, but thought themselves obliged to show him all possible respect, as a glorious advocate for the cause of Christ. He had some time ago written them a long epistle, the epistle to the Romans, in which he had not only expressed his great kindness for them, but had given them a great many useful instructions, and in return for that they show him this respect. They went to meet him, some as far as Appii-forum, 51 miles from Rome ; others, to a place called the Three taverns, 28, some say 33 miles, from Rome. They are to be commended for it, that, so far from being ashamed of him, or afraid of owning him, because he was a prisoner, that, for that very reason, they counted him worthy of double honor, and were the more careful to show him respect.

2. The great comfort Paul had in this ; now that he was drawing near to Rome, and perhaps heard at Puteoli what a tyrant the emperor Nero was now of late become, he began to have some melancholy thoughts about his appeal to Cesar, and the consequences of it ; till he meets with these good people that came from Rome, to show him respect ; and when he saw them, (1.) He thanked God ; we may suppose he thanked them for their civility, told them again and again how kindly he took it ; but that was not all, he thanked God. Note, if our friends be kind to us, it is God that makes them so, that puts it into their hearts, and into the power of their hands, to be so, and we must give Him the glory of it. Paul had thanked God for the Christians at Rome before he had ever seen them, on the report he had heard concerning them, Rom. 1: 8. But now that he saw them, he thanked God ; perhaps they appeared better than most Christians he had seen. But that was not all ; (2.) He took courage ; it put new life into him, cheered his spirits, and now he can enter Rome a prisoner, as cheerfully as ever he had entered Jerusalem at liberty. He finds there are those there who love and value him, and whom he may both converse with and consult with as his friends, which will take off much of the tediousness of his imprisonment, and the terror of his appearing before Nero. Note, It is an encouragement to those who are travelling toward heaven, to meet with their fellow-travellers, who are their companions in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ. And this is a good reason why respect should be shown to good ministers, especially when in sufferings and contempt, that it encourages them, and makes both their sufferings and their services more easy. Yet it is observable, that though the Christians at Rome were now so respectful to Paul, and he had promised himself so much from their respect, yet they failed him when he most needed them, 2 Tim. 4: 16. To venture the displeasure of the emperor, and the disobliging of other great men, by appearing in defence of Paul, and giving evidence for him, here they desired to be excused ; when it comes to that, they will rather ride as far out of town to miss him, as now they did to meet him. Which is an intimation to us, to cease from man, and to encourage ourselves in the Lord our God. The courage we take from his promises will never fail us ; when we shall be ashamed of that which we took from men's compliments.

IV. The delivering of Paul into custody at Rome, v. 16. 1. He is delivered, with other prisoners, to the captain of the guard, and can see no more of Rome than he will permit him. How many great men had made their entry into Rome, crowned, and in triumph, who really were the plagues of their generation ! But here a good man makes his entry into Rome, chained, and triumphed over, as a poor captive, who was really the greatest blessing to his generation. This thought is enough to put one for ever out of conceit with this world.

2. Yet [as it is] some favor is showed him ; he is a prisoner, but not a close prisoner, not in the common jail ; Paul was suffered to dwell by himself, in some convenient private lodgings his friends there provided for him, and a soldier was appointed his guard, we hope civil, and that let him take all liberty that could be allowed a prisoner, for he must be very ill-humored indeed, that could be so to such a courteous, obliging man as Paul. Paul, being suffered to dwell by himself, could the better enjoy himself, friends, and God, than if lodged with the other prisoners. This may encourage God's prisoners, that He can give them favor, Ps. 106: 46. as Joseph in the eyes of his keeper, Gen. 39: 21. and Jehoiachin in the eyes of the king of Babylon, 2 K. 25: 27, 28. When God does not deliver his people presently out of bondage, yet if He either make it easy to them, or them easy under it, they have reason to be thankful.

V. 17—22. Paul, with great expense and hazard, is brought a prisoner to Rome, and when he is come, nobody appears to prosecute him, or lay anything to his charge ; but he must call his own cause ; and here he represents it to the chief of the Jews at Rome, persons most distinguished as to estates and interests. It was not long, since, by an edict of Claudius, all the Jews were banished from Rome, and kept out till his death ; but in the five years since then, many Jews were come thither, for the advantage of trade, though it does not appear that they were allowed any synagogue there, or place of public worship ; Paul called them together, being desirous to stand right in their opinion, and that there might be a good understanding between him and them.

V. 16. When the company arrived at Rome, the other prisoners were committed to the custody of the captain of the imperial guards, to be lodged in prison : but, through the account sent by Festus, and the report of Julius, Paul was exempted from this hardship, and was allowed to dwell in a lodging apart from other prisoners ; and only guarded by a soldier. This Præfect 'permitted Paul,' &c., for (so Ulpian) the proconsul exercised a discretion as to the treatment of such, whether to put them in prison, or give them to a soldier's charge.' Bl. The allowing to Paul a separate confinement out of the common 'camp prison,' (where prisoners in 'free custody' were herded together,) was indeed a great favor. 20 For this cause therefore have I called for you, to see you, and to speak with you: because that for the hope <sup>r</sup> of Israel I am bound with this <sup>s</sup> chain.

21 And they said unto him, We neither received letters out of Judea concerning thee, neither any of the brethren that came shewed or spake any harm of thee.

never intended; but it is as true, he never opposed them in the Jews; but did himself, when among them, conform to them. He never quarrelled with them for practising according to the usages of their own religion, but only for their enmity to the Gentiles, Gal. 2:12. Paul had the testimony of his conscience for him, that he had done his duty to the Jews.

2. He modestly complains of the hard usage he had met with, v. 17. If he had spoken the whole truth in this matter, it would have looked worse than it did on the Jews, for they would have murdered him without any color of law or justice, if the Romans had not protected him; but, however, their accusing him as a criminal, before Felix the governor, and demanding judgment against him, were, in effect, delivering him prisoner into the hands of the Romans, when he desired no more than a fair and impartial trial by their own law.

3. He declares the judgment of the Roman governors concerning him, v. 18. It was for Paul's honor, that those who most carefully examined his case, acquitted him, and none condemned him but unheard, and such as were prejudiced against him.

4. He pleads the necessity he was under to remove himself and his cause to Rome; and that it was only in his own defence, and not with any design to recriminate, or exhibit a cross bill against the complainants, v. 19. When the Jews spake against his discharge, finding the governors, one after another, stood so much in awe of them, that they would not discharge him, for fear of making them their enemies; it was necessary for him to appeal to the higher powers: this was all he aimed at, not to accuse his nation, but only to vindicate himself. Every man has a right to plead in his own defence, who yet ought not to find fault with his neighbors. It is an invidious thing to accuse, especially to accuse a nation, such a nation. Paul made intercession for them, but never against them. The Roman government had at this time an ill opinion of the Jewish nation, as factious, turbulent, disaffected, and dangerous, and it had been easy for a man with such a fluent tongue as Paul had, a citizen of Rome, and so injured as he was, to have exasperated the emperor against the Jewish nation; but Paul would not, for ever so much, do such a thing; he was for making the best of every body, and not making bad worse.

5. He puts his sufferings on the true foot, and gives them such an account of the reason of them, as should engage them not only not to join with his persecutors against him, but to concern themselves for him, and to do what they could on his behalf, if they had any interest, to procure him his liberty, v. 20. He carried the mark of his imprisonment about with him, and probably was [as was the custom] chained [at least at times] to the soldier that kept him; and it was, (1.) Because he preached that the Messiah was come, who was the Hope of Israel, He whom Israel hoped for. (2.) Because he preached, that the resurrection of the dead would come; that also was the hope of Israel; so he had called it, ch. 23:6. 24:15. 26:6, 7. 'They would have you still expect a Messiah that would free you from the Roman yoke, and make you great and prosperous on earth; and they are angry at me for directing their expectations to the great things of another world, and persuading them to embrace a Messiah, who will secure those to them, and not external power and grandeur; I am for bringing you to the spiritual and eternal blessedness which our fathers by faith had their eye upon, and that is what they hate me for; because I would take you off from that which is the cheat of Israel, and will be its shame and ruin, the notion of a temporal Messiah; and lead you to that which is the true and real hope of Israel, and the genuine sense of all the promises made to the fathers, a spiritual kingdom of holiness and love set up in the hearts of men, to be the pledge of, and preparative for, the joyful resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come.'

II. Their reply; they own,

1. That they had nothing to say in particular against him; nor had any instructions to appear as his prosecutors before the emperor, either by letter or word of mouth, v. 21. None had written, or come up to Rome, on the subject of his prosecution. This was very strange, and some think they told a lie here, and had orders to prosecute him, but durst not own it, being themselves obnoxious to the emperor's displeasure; who, though he had not, like his predecessors, banished them all from Rome, yet he gave them no countenance there. But I am apt to think that what they said was true, and Paul now found he had gained the point he aimed at, in appealing to Cesar, which was to remove his cause into a court to which they durst not follow it. This was David's policy, and it was his security, 1 S. 27:1. and it proves so, v. 4.

2. That they desired to know more particularly concerning the doctrine he preached, and the religion he took so much pains to propagate in the face of so much opposition, v. 22. 'what thy opinions or sentiments are, what are those things thou art so wise about, and hast such a relish of, and zeal for; for though we know little else concerning Christianity, we know it is a sect everywhere spoken against.' Those who said this scornful, spiteful word of the Christian religion, were Jews, the chief of the Jews at Rome, who boasted of their knowledge, Rom. 2:17. and yet this was all they knew concerning the Christian religion, that it was a sect everywhere spoken against. They give it an ill name, and then run it down. They looked upon it to be a sect, and that was false. True Christianity establishes that which is of common concern to all mankind, and is not built on such narrow opinions [bigoted pride] and private interests as sects commonly owe their original to. It aims at no worldly benefit or advantage, as sects do; but all its gains are spiritual and eternal. And, besides, it has a direct tendency to unite the children of men, not to divide, and set them at variance, as sects have. It is, and always has been, the lot of Christ's holy religion, to be everywhere spoken against: [which should teach us, that public opinion, even in 'the most enlightened nation,' is not the best measure of right and wrong.]

V. 23—29. We have here a short account of a long conference Paul had with the Jews at Rome, about the Christian religion. Though so far prejudiced against it, yet they were willing to give it a hearing; which was more than the Jews at Jerusalem would do; probably, being men of [more liberal views, from] larger acquaintance with the world, and more general conversation, they were more free in their inquiries than the bigoted Jews at Jerusalem were; and would not answer this matter before they heard it.

I. How Paul managed this conference.

1. There were many got together to Paul; though a prisoner, the confinement he was now under, if duly considered, instead of prejudicing them against his doctrine, ought to confirm it to them; for it was a sign, not only that he believed it, but that he thought it worth suffering for. And Paul made room for them in his lodging, not fearing giving offence to the government, so that he might do good to them.

2. He was very large and full in his discourse with them; seeking their conviction more than his own vindication. (1.) He expounded, or explained, the kingdom of God to them, showed them the nature of it, how it is heavenly and spiritual, seated in the minds of men, and shines not in external pomp, but in purity of heart and life. What kept the Jews in their unbelief, was, a misunderstanding of the kingdom of God, as if it came with observation; let but that be expounded to them, and set in a true light, and they will be brought into obedience to it. (2.) He not only expounded the kingdom of God, but testified it, plainly declared it, and confirmed it by incontestable proofs, that the kingdom of God, by the Messiah's administration, was come, and was now set up in the world. He attested the extraordinary powers by which it was set up, the miracles by which it was confirmed. He bore his testimony to it from his own experience of its power and influence on him, and the Beza. His address was the language of candor, caution, and benevolence; and he spake of his chain with great indifference, being willing to wear it for Christ's sake.

(18.) 'I appeal to Cesar from necessity [in self-defence], not out of any intent of accusing my brethren.'

V. 22. This answer shows, that the Jews in Judea despaired of success in following up their accusations at Rome; and that immense pains had been taken to misrepresent the Christians, in every part of the world.

(22.) Everywhere spoken against.] 'Some think this refers to a fact mentioned by Justin Martyr, and afterwards by Origen and Eusebius, that the Jews at Jerusalem sent chosen men of the most distinguished character all over the world, representing the Christians as an atheistical sect, and charging them with the grossest calumnies, which the ignorant heathens advanced against them. The fact itself is in all respects very credible; but I apprehend that the exact date of it cannot be ascertained, nor can I anywhere find (as some have asserted) that it is mentioned by Philo Judæus.'

V. 23—29. 'As for the quotation from Isaiah, which he applies to them, I would observe, that it is quoted oftener than any other text from the O. T., (i. e. six times,) in the New: (here, and Mat. 13:14, 15. Mark 4:12. Luke 8:10. John 12:40. Rom. 11:8.) yet in such a variety of ex-

25 And when they agreed not among themselves, they departed, after that Paul had spoken one word; Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers,

26 Saying, Go unto this people, and say, Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and not perceive;

27 For the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them.

28 Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it.

29 And when he had said these words, the Jews departed, and had great reasoning among themselves.

30 ¶ And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him, y Ps. 81:11, 12. Is. 6:3. Je. 5:21. Eze. 5:6, 7. 12:2. Mat. 13:14, 15. Ro. 11:8. c. 13:46, 47. 18:6. 22:21. 26:17, 18. Ro. 11:11.

manner of his being brought into subjection to it. (3.) He not only expounded and testified the kingdom of God, but he persuaded them, urged it on their consciences, and pressed them with all earnestness to embrace it, and submit to it, and not to persist in opposition. He followed his doctrine with a warm and lively application to his hearers, which is the most proper, profitable method of preaching. (4.) He persuaded them concerning Jesus; the design and tendency of his whole discourse were to bring them to Christ, to convince them of his being the Messiah, and to engage them to believe in Him as He is offered in the Gospel. He urged upon them the things concerning Jesus, the prophecies of Him, which he read to them out of the law of Moses and out of the prophets, as pointing at the Messiah, and showed how they had all had their accomplishment in this Jesus.

3. He was very long; it should seem from morning till evening, perhaps 8 or 10 hours; the subject was curious, he was full of it; it was of vast importance, his heart was upon it; he knew not when he should have such another opportunity; therefore, without begging pardon for tiring their patience, he kept them all day; but probably he spent some time in prayer with them.

II. The effect of this discourse; one would have thought all the hearers should have yielded; but it did not prove so; the child Jesus is set for the fall of some, and the rising again of others, a Foundation Stone to some, and a Stone of stumbling to others. 1. They did not agree among themselves, v. 25. Some thought Paul was in the right, others would not admit it. This is that division which Christ came to send; that fire which He came to kindle, Luke 12: 49, 51. Paul preached with great plainness and clearness, yet his hearers could not agree about the sense and evidence of what he preached. 2. Some believed, and some believed not, v. 24. Such has always been the success of the Gospel; to some it has been a savor of life unto life; to others, of death unto death. If all had believed, there had been no disagreement; so that all the blame of the division, lay on those who would not believe.

III. The awakening word Paul said to them at parting; he perceived, by what they muttered, that many, perhaps the greater part, were obstinate, and would not yield to what he said; and they were getting up to be gone, they had had enough; 'Hold,' says Paul, 'take one word with you before you go, and consider of it when you come home: what do you think will be the effect of your obstinate infidelity? What will you do in the end hereof? What will it come to?'

1. You will, by the righteous judgment of God be sealed up under unbelief. Turn to that scripture, Is. 6: 9, 10. and read it seriously, and tremble, lest the case there described should prove to be your case. As there are in the O. T. gospel-promises, which will be accomplished in all that believe, so there are gospel-threatenings of spiritual judgments, which will be fulfilled in them that believe not; and this is one. What was spoken by JEHOVAH, is here said to be spoken by the Holy Ghost, which proves that the Holy Ghost is God. He that believes not shall be damned, is Gospel, as well as, He that believes shall be saved, Mark 16: 16. Or, this may be explained by that of our Savior, Mat. 15: 7. 'Well did Esaias prophesy of you.' The Holy Ghost said to your fathers that which would be fulfilled in you, Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand.'

(1.) 'Their great sin against God, is yours; You will not see; your eyes you have closed,' v. 27. That speaks an obstinate infidelity, and a willing slavery to prejudice. They would not prosecute their convictions, and for that reason would not admit them. They have purposely closed their eyes, lest they should see with their eyes the great things which belong to their everlasting peace; should see the glory of God, the amiableness of Christ, the deformity of sin, the beauty of holiness, the vanity of this world, and the reality of another; they will not be changed and governed by those truths, and therefore will not receive the evidence of them; lest they should hear with their ears that which they are loth to hear, the wrath of God revealed from heaven against them, and the will of God revealed from heaven to them. Thus their fathers did, they would not hear, Zech. 7: 11, 12. And what they are afraid of in shutting their eyes and ears, is, lest they should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. They kept their mind in the dark, or at least in a constant confusion and tumult, lest, if they should admit a considerate, sober thought, they should understand with their heart how much it is both their duty and their interest to be religious, and so by degrees the truth should be too hard for them, and they should be converted from the evil ways which they take pleasure in, to those exercises which they have now an aversion to. Observe, God's method is, to bring people first to see and hear, and so to understand with their hearts, and then to convert them, and bow their wills, and so heal them; which is the regular way of dealing with a rational soul: and therefore Satan prevents the conversion of souls to God, by blinding the mind, and darkening the understanding, 2 Cor. 4: 4. And the case is very sad, when the sinner joins with him herein, and puts out his own eyes. They plunge into ignorance, that they may sin the more freely, Jer. 51: 9. This was the sin.

(2.) 'God's great judgment on them for this sin, is, his judgment on you, You shall be blind. God will give you up to a judicial infatuation; because you will not give your minds to understand, God will not give you strength and grace to understand; seeing, you shall see; you shall have abundance of miracles and signs done before your eyes, but you shall not perceive the convincing evidence of them. Take heed lest it be true of you, what Moses said to your fathers, Deut. 29: 4. and what Isaiah said to the men of his generation, Is. 29: 10—12.' How should they be happy, that will not be healed of a disease that makes them miserable? And how should they be healed, that will not be converted to the use of the methods of cure? And how should they be converted, that will not be convinced either of their disease or of their remedy? Let all that hear the Gospel, and do not heed it, tremble at this doom; for when once they are thus given up to hardness of heart, they are already in the suburbs of hell; for who shall heal them, if God do not?

2. 'Your unbelief will justify God in sending the Gospel to the Gentile world, which is the thing you look upon with such a jealous eye, v. 28. that salvation which was of the Jews only, John 4: 22. the Gentiles stand fairer for it than you do: it is sent to them, and they will hear it, and receive it, and be happy in it.' And if they thought salvation of so small a value, as not to be worth their acceptance, surely they could not grudge it the Gentiles, as too good for them, or envy them for it.

Thus also he would improve their displeasure at the favor done to the Gentiles, to their advantage, bring good out of that evil; for when he had spoken of this very thing in Rom., the benefit the Gentiles had by the unbelief and rejection of the Jews, he says, he took notice of it on purpose that he might provoke his dear countrymen the Jews to a holy emulation, and save some of them, Rom. 11: 14. And if it had not that effect on them, it would aggravate their condemnation, as it did that of the Scribes and Pharisees, who, when they saw the publicans and harlots submit to John's baptism, did not afterwards thereupon repent of their folly, that they might believe him, Mat. 21: 32.

IV. The breaking up of the assembly, as it should seem, in some disorder. 1. They turned their backs on Paul; with a resolution never to hear him preach again, nor trouble themselves with further inquiries about this matter. 2. They set their faces one against another; they that agreed to depart from Paul, yet agreed not in the reasons why they departed, but had great reasoning among themselves. Many have great reasoning, who yet do not reason right; can find fault with one another's opinions, and yet not yield to truth. Nor will men's reasoning among themselves convince them, without the grace of God to open their understandings.

V. 30, 31. We are here taking our leave of the history of blessed Paul; and therefore, since God saw it not fit we should know any more of him, we should carefully notice every particular of the circumstances here.

I. It cannot but be a trouble to us, that we must leave him in bonds for Christ, nay, and have no prospect given us of his being set at liberty. He appealed to Caesar, in hope of a speedy discharge, yet is continued a prisoner two whole years. So little reason have we to trust in men, especially despised prisoners in great men; witness Joseph's case, Gen. 40: 23. Yet some think it was early pression as plainly proves, the apostles did not confine themselves, exactly, either to the words of the original or the Gr. version. Doddr. Sc. (28.) Salvation.] 'The original word here, sōtērion, is used sometimes for the Author of salvation, as Ln. 2: 30. and sometimes, as here, for the preaching of the Gospel. Possibly, God might have given the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles, though the Jews had not despised and rejected it.'

V. 30, 31. Doubtless Luke, Aristarchus, and others who attended on the apostle, or came to him, being themselves at liberty, labored diligently to make the Gospel known in the city and its vicinity, during all the time of the apostle's imprisonment; though the historian, by a modesty almost unprecedented, is wholly silent concerning his own labors and sufferings.

(30.) Two whole years.] 'As Luke concludes his history with Paul's abode at Rome, before his journey into Spain, we may infer, as Dr. More observes, that he wrote his Gospel and the Acts while the apostle

in the first of these two years, that he was first brought before Nero, and then his bonds in Christ were manifest in Cesar's court, as he says, Phil. 1:13. And at that first answer it was, that no man stood by him, 2 Tim. 4:16. But it seems, instead of being set at liberty on his appeal, as he expected, he hardly escaped out of the emperor's hands with his life; he calls it a deliverance out of the mouth of the lion, 2 Tim. 4:17. and his speaking there of his first answer, intimates, that since that, he had a second, in which he had come off better, and yet was not discharged. During these two years' imprisonment, he wrote his epistle to the Galatians, then his second epistle to Timothy, then those to the Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and to Philemon, in which he mentions several things, particularly concerning his imprisonment; and lastly, his epistle to the Hebrews, just after he was set at liberty, as Timothy also was, who, coming to visit him, was on some account or other made his fellow-prisoner; (with him, writes Paul to the Hebrews, 13:23. if he come shortly, I will see you;) but how or by what means he obtained his liberty, we are not told; only that two years he was a prisoner. Tradition says, that after his discharge, he went from Italy to Spain, thence to Crete, and so with Timothy into Judea, and from thence to visit the churches in Asia, and at length came a second time to Rome, and there was beheaded in the last year of Nero. But Baronius himself owns, that there is no certainty of anything concerning him, betwixt his release from this imprisonment, and his martyrdom; but it is said by some, that Nero, having, when he began to play the tyrant, set himself against the Christians, and persecuted them, (and he was the first of the emperors that made a law against them, as Tertullian saith, Apol. cap. 3.) the church at Rome was much weakened by that persecution, and that brought Paul the second time to Rome, to re-establish the church there, and to comfort the souls of the disciples that were left, and so he fell a second time into Nero's hand. And Chrysostom relates, that a young woman that was one of Nero's misses, (to speak modestly,) being converted, by Paul's preaching, to the Christian faith, and so brought off from the lewd course of life she had lived, Nero was incensed against Paul for that, and ordered him first to be imprisoned, and then put to death.

But, to keep to this short account here given of it,

1. It would grieve one to think that such a useful man, as Paul was, should be so long in restraint; two years a prisoner under Felix, ch. 24:27. and beside all the time between that and his coming to Rome, here two years more a prisoner under Nero. How much Paul might have done for Christ, in these five years, (for so much it was at least,) if he had been at liberty! But God is wise, and will show that He is no debtor to the most useful instruments He employs, but can and will carry on his own interest, both without their services, and by their sufferings. Even Paul's bonds fell out to the furtherance of the Gospel, Phil. 1:12, 14.

2. Yet even Paul's imprisonment was in some respects a kindness to him; before, he had always accustomed himself to sojourn in the houses of others, now he has got a house of his own, his own while he pays the rent for it; such a retirement would be a refreshment to one who had been always on the remove; so that the bringing of him into this prison, was like Christ's call to his disciples to come into a desert place, and rest awhile, Mark 6:31. When at liberty, he was in continual fear by reason of the lying in wait of the Jews, ch. 20:19. but now his prison was his castle.

II. Yet it is a pleasure to us, (for we are sure it was to him,) that we leave him at work for Christ; his mouth is not stopped; he is bound, but the Word of the Lord is not bound. Observe,

1. Whom he preached to; to all that had a mind to hear him, whether Jews or Gentiles; he received all that came to him, was not afraid of the greatest, nor ashamed of the meanest: Note, Ministers' doors should be open to such as desire to receive instruction from them, and they should be glad of an opportunity to advise those that are in care about their souls. When we cannot do what we would in the service of God, we must do what we can. He was ready to preach on the first day of the week to Christians, on the seventh day to Jews, and to all who would come on any day of the week; and he might hope the better to speed, because they came in unto him, which supposed a desire to be instructed, and a willingness to learn; and where these are, it is probable that some good may be done.

2. What he preached; he does not fill their heads with curious speculations, or with matters of state and politics, but preaches the kingdom of God, does all he can to advance its true interests; teaches those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ; the whole history of Christ, his incarnation, doctrine, life, miracles, death, resurrection, ascension; all that relates to the mystery of godliness. Ministers, when tempted to divert from that which is their main business, should reduce themselves with this question, What does this concern the Lord Jesus Christ? What tendency has it to bring us to Him, and to keep us walking in Him? For we preach not ourselves, but Christ.

3. With what liberty he preached. (1.) Divine grace gave him a liberty of spirit; he preached with all confidence, as one that was himself well assured of the truth of what he preached, and of the worth of it, that it was what he durst stand by, and suffer for. He was not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ.

(2.) Divine Providence gave him a liberty of speech; no man forbidding him, giving him any check for what he did, or laying any restraint on him; the Jews, that used to forbid him to speak to the Gentiles, had no authority here; and the Roman government as yet took no cognizance of the profession of Christianity as a crime. Herein we must acknowledge the hand of God, [1.] Setting bounds to the rage of persecutors; Nero was a bloody man, and there were many, both Jews and Gentiles, in Rome, that hated Christianity; yet so it was, unaccountably, that Paul, though a prisoner, was connived at in preaching the Gospel, and it was not construed a breach of the peace. Thus God makes the wrath of men to praise Him, and restrains the remainder of it, Ps. 76:10. Though so many had it in their power to forbid Paul's preaching, (even the common soldier that kept him might have done it,) yet God so ordered it, that no man did forbid him. [2.] Providing comfort for the relief of the persecuted. It was some comfort to him to do a little; and then there were saints even in Cesar's household, Phil. 4:22. When the city of our solemnities is thus made a quiet habitation at any time, and we are fed from day to day with the bread of life, no man forbidding us, we must give thanks to God for it, and prepare for changes; still longing for that holy mountain, in which there shall never be any pricking brier or grieving thorn.

PRACT. OBS. Those who are despised for their rude and uncultivated manners, are often more hospitable, and show more genuine philanthropy, than their more polished neighbors: and heathens, or reputed barbarians, will rise up in judgment against many persons, in this civilized, Christian nation, who do not scruple to embezzle the property, or injure the persons, of such as are cast upon our shores.—True dignity has no need of affected stateliness; and pride or sloth alone deems that beneath any man, which the present exigency requires for personal or social advantage.—The Lord raises up friends to his people, in every place whither He leads them; He rewards, or enables them to requite, their benefactors in a suitable manner; and He renders them a blessing to all who are connected with them.—The cure of diseases is far more valuable when united with the means of grace and salvation; and the friends, who are raised up to a pious man by his good behavior and usefulness, will be above all others affectionate and liberal; as far as this is needful and consistent. The ordinary transactions of travelling are seldom worth a recital: but the comfort of 'communion with the saints,' and the kindness shown us by our friends, are deserving of a more particular mention.—Should we be called to wear a chain for Christ's sake, we ought not to be ashamed of it, but to glory in it; and though real Christians are everywhere, and at all times, in this deluded, ungodly world, 'spoken against,' as a precise, troublesome, or fanatical sect; yet we may so behave, that none can speak any personal harm of us.—If, under reproach and persecution, the true minister can obtain leave and liberty to preach the Gospel, and is favored with success, he will think his sufferings amply compensated; and be reconciled to his own want of liberty, if he finds that 'the Word of God hath free course and is glorified.'

It is said, and there is great reason to believe it, that he gave his head to the fatal stroke with the greatest cheerfulness, and also that he was buried on the Via Ostiensis, two miles from Rome, where Constantine the Great erected a church to his memory, A. D. 318, which was successively repaired and beautified by Theodosius the Great, and the Empress Placidia.'

TOPOGRAPHICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL NOTICES,

ILLUSTRATING PAUL'S LIFE AND TRAVELS, AND THE EARLY PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY. (See the Map, and Cuts.)

Paul was born about six years B. C. in

Tarsus:

'the capital city of Cilicia; rich, populous, and containing academies and schools, excelling even those of Alexandria and Athens, in the various branches of literature and philosophy; its inhabitants possessed all the immunities and privileges of Roman citizens, which had been conferred upon them by Julius Cesar and Augustus, in return for valuable services rendered. To it imperial Rome itself was indebted for some of the best and wisest of its professors, and, in many respects, it held a proud place even among the first cities of that day. Now, however, it is a place of no importance; for during the wars of the Greek emperors with the Saracens and Persians, it was brought low, and perhaps the only trace of former times it retains, is, that Christianity, first planted there by P., is not yet wholly extinct, but still continues to linger fondly amidst the ruined shrines that looked upon its birth. It is no stretch of fancy, therefore, to suppose, that if its existence had not been indissolubly joined with the name and memory of the celebrated apostle, every trace of it would long since have vanished from the records of time.'

It is now called Tarsous, has no good buildings, and is but ill supplied with the necessaries of life. In this province, where P. passed his childhood, nature still presents her most captivating, secluded, and romantic aspects. P. finished his education under the highest masters, in

Damascus.

This most ancient city [founded, say the Arabs, by Demshah, son of Canaan, son of Ham, son of Noah] was, and still is, a great centre of oriental civilization and intercourse. Lamartine remarks, 'Arab tradition represents this city, and its neighborhood, to form the site of the lost Paradise; and certainly I should think that no place upon earth was better calculated to answer one's ideas of Eden. The vast and fruitful plain, with the 7 branches of the blue stream which irrigates it; the majestic framework of the mountains; the glittering lakes which reflect the heavens upon the earth; its geographical situation between the seas; the perfection of its climate;—everything, indicates that Damascus has been one of the first towns that were ever built by the children of men,—one of the natural halts of humanity in primeval times. It is, in fact, one of those sites pointed out by the hand of God, for a city,—a site predestined to sustain a capital, like Constantinople. These are, perhaps, the only 2 cities which could not possibly have taken their post in an empire, from arbitrary selection; but which are palpably indicated by the configuration of the place. So long as the earth shall bear empires on her surface, Damascus will continue to be a great city, and Stamboul the metropolis of the world.'

Of its 2 to 400,000 inhabitants, 30,000 are Armenian Christians, whom the fanatic populace, since the conquering Ibrahim equalized in it the rights of Mahometans and Christians, are scarce restrained from massacring.—'Remembrances of P.,' says Lamartine, 'are always present to the Christian at Damascus. The ruins of the house are still visible, from whence he escaped during night, let down in a basket.' The principal building, in the back ground, now the chief mosque, was once the church of St. John. It has several large courts, ornamented with ancient Corinthian columns; and stands in the street called 'straight,' Acts 9:11, which runs from the E. to the W. gate, and is lined with shops. No building in the principal streets, but displays some taste. Note, I, K. II: 24.

From Damascus P. wanders in Arabia (Gal. 1:17.), probably among those rovers who have ruled, and in turn been ruled by, this turbulent capital, viz. the Bedouins, (as Damascus tells us now,) finding exercise for his trade, under the hospitable protection of these tent-dwellers,—maturating his religious views, probably, not taught of men,—and spreading the Gospel to S. Arabia, Mesopotamia, Edom, and Syria; to all which countries these tribes wander. See Burckhardt's Bedouins. These tribes, from the simplicity of their manners and character, are peculiarly susceptible to a purer and simpler faith, as is proved by the progress Wahabism (the puritanism of Islani) has made among them. In them, the patriarchs still live. 'We have the authority of the Mahometans for saying, that, previous to Mahomet, the 3 wandering tribes of Thauouk, Bakera, and Naclab, professed the Christian religion; and that in those very plains of Arabia Deserta, where the famed cities of Mecca and Medina were subsequently erected, many Arab families embraced Christianity, soon after the Gospel was first preached among them.' After 2 years' sojourn, P. returns to Damascus, A. D. 33, (Gal. 1:18.) and preaches openly in the synagogue; but Aretas, k. of Arabia, being now at war with Herod, the Roman tetrarch, P.'s enemies found means to persuade the governor, that P. (known to be a Roman citizen) was sent as a spy, by the Roman government, so that he was obliged to escape to Jerusalem, perhaps favored by the Arab friends he had made, some of whom are always at war with Damascus. 'Having remained 15 days at Jerusalem, the same unrelenting persecution, stirred up against him at Damascus, began to show itself in the holy city; wherein the Hellenists now sought his life. With that fearlessness, however, which formed so conspicuous an ingredient in his character, the apostle, notwithstanding the persecution which raged against him, hesitated for a time to leave Jerusalem. But many of the disciples who had seen his usefulness, and praised God that so efficient an instrument had been sent to do his work, trembled for his safety, and, in the warmth of their affection, besought and urged him to depart, and neither lessened their entreaties, nor ceased their more active exertions, till they had brought him to

on the shores of the Mediterranean. In the days of P., it was perhaps the most splendid city, as it was undoubtedly the greatest seaport, of Palestine. It was erected by Herod the Great, upon the site of an obscure fortress, called the Tower of Strato [a Phœnician king], between Dora and Joppa, about 75 miles from Jerusalem. It derived its name from Augustus Cesar, to whom it was dedicated by its founder, in the 28th year of his reign. The most remarkable feature of the city was its magnificent harbor, and the perfect shelter it afforded from every breath of wind. It was of great extent, fully as large as that of Athens, and capable of containing a royal fleet. The natural situation of the coast did not admit of much protection; but to obviate this, Herod built a prodigious mole, in a semi-circular form, extending far into the sea, and of such amazing strength as to resist every effort of the wildest tempest. One half of it was so formed as to present an impenetrable bulwark to the waves, and on the other half a strong wall, surmounted by many fortified turrets, was erected. In the centre a quay, or landing-place, was built; and around the whole a pathway was formed, on which the inhabitants of the city might enjoy the soft breezes of the Mediterranean. Near this harbor, the residences of the mariners rose upon open arches;—and around the beach, beyond it, the proud city, built in the shape of a crescent, ascended gradually from the sea. On a rising ground, at a short distance from the end of the quay, a temple was erected, which served as a guide, or beacon, to mariners; and within its walls stood two colossal statues, one of Cesar, and another of Imperial Rome personified. All the private houses in the city were built of marble; and its many temples; its palaces; its theatres; and forum, of the fairest and richest architecture, were of the same material. The building of this magnificent city commenced shortly before the Christian era, occupied 12 years, and had been finished only about 15 years before the period of the apostle's embarkation from it. It was, therefore, in its glory when he first beheld it; and although no external change had taken place during any of his subsequent visits, the fairness of its beauty had often been soiled by scenes of bloodshed and murder. The inhabitants were partly heathens, partly Jews, and, animated with a constant dislike to each other, they were invariably engaged in broils, which set all peace and order at defiance.

'With regard to the Christian church established at Cesarea, it flourished till the 7th century, when the city was captured by the Saracens, being the last of their many exploits during the Syrian war. But before this event, a flame, which was destined to outlive its marble walls, was conferred upon Cesarea. It was there that the prophet Agabus foretold that P. should be bound at Jerusalem, and be delivered into the hands of the Gentiles; it was there that the apostle was confined for 2 years; it was there that he was tried before Felix and Festus; it was there that Cornelius the centurion, who was baptized by Peter, lived; it was there that Philip, the deacon, and his 4 daughters, distinguished by the spirit of prophecy, dwelt; and it was there that Herod, even in the midst of his own splendid palaces, arrayed in cloth of silver, and in cloth of gold, surrounded by fawning courtiers, and an applauding multitude, borne up with pride, and seated on his jewelled throne, was at once struck dead, and devoured of worms, a loathsome and disgusting spectacle, because he assumed unto himself the glory which was due to God.

'Now, should we journey to Palestine, to gaze upon the fair city of the apostle's day, our journey would indeed be vain. The Arabs still call it Kisary; and perhaps this would be one of the few associations which might enable us to discern its site. Its marble halls and palaces are gone,—its temples,—its theatres,—its forum, have disappeared; the dwellings of the many are levelled with the dust; and if a single trace of them is to be found, it is in a shapeless mass, or mound of blackened earth. The waves, it is true, still beat against the ruins of the mole, for the storms and tempests of nearly 2000 years have not been able to effect the entire demolition of that stupendous work. Its huge remains are still to be seen; and here and there the crumbling ruins of its strongest towers. But the whole surrounding country is a sandy desert; the waste and silent desolation of which is only disturbed by the angry howlings of a few solitary beasts of prey.'

Embarking at once, at this port, P. reached his native city in safety, and abode there between 5 and 6 years, continuing to propagate the Gospel by making many converts, and planting several churches in Cilicia: while he was gladdened by knowing that the good seed prospered in Judea also, where, in consequence of an unexpected persecution of the Jews themselves, by the emperor Caligula, they ceased, for a time, to persecute the Christians, and the churches had rest and flourished exceedingly. Here in Cilicia, too, P. had those visions and revelations, 2 Cor. 12. In the course of time, Barnabas came to solicit P.'s assistance, with whom he went, in the year 42, to

Antioch.

'This city, the capital of Syria, was at that period adorned with sumptuous palaces and temples; strongly and beautifully fortified, both by nature and by art, from its proud height it looked down on the bright streams of the Orontes, which bore the wealth of a hundred nations within its walls. This place, where the name of Christians first originated, and where, for many ages, the church continued so famous, was now the residence of the prefect or governor of the eastern provinces of the Roman empire, and oftentimes honored with the presence of the emperor himself, [for it was at one time second only to Rome; see Gibbon.]

'It was formerly called Riblath, (says Arundell), and was not known under the name of Antioch, till after the reign of Seleucus Nicanor, who built it, and called it Antioch, from respect to his father Antiochus, 301 B. C. The kings of Syria, successors to Alexander the Great, generally resided at Antioch.—The city was almost square; had many gates, and much of it, on the N. side, stood on a high mountain. It was adorned with galleries [gardens]: and fine fountains. Amm. Marcel, says, it was celebrated throughout the world, and that no city exceeded it, either in fertility of soil, or richness of commerce. The emperors Vespasian and Titus, and others, granted it very great privileges; but it has likewise been exposed to very great revolutions. It was almost demolished by earthquakes in the years, A. D. 340, 394, 396, 458, 526, and 528. The emperor Justinian repaired it in 529, and called it, says Evagrius, Theopolis, (city of God.) Chosroes, k. of Persia, took it, in 548, massacred the inhabitants, and burnt it. Justinian ordered it to be rebuilt, 552. Chosroes took it again, in 574, and destroyed the walls. In 588, it suffered a dreadful earthquake, whereby 60,000 perished; it was again rebuilt, and was again exposed to new calamities. The Saracens took it 637, or 8, in the reign of Heraclius; Nicephorus Phocas retook it 966. Cedrenus relates, that in 970 an army of 100,000 Saracens besieged it without success, but afterwards subdued it: added new fortifications, and made it almost impregnable. Godfrey of Bouillon besieged it, 1097. The siege was long and bloody; the Crusaders, by their indefatigable labors, and by a secret correspondence in the place, carried it, in 1098. Frequently attacked by Saracens, it was retaken, in 1268, by the Sultan of Egypt, and demolished. It has ever since lost its reputation and magnificence, and has groaned under the dominion of the Turk. It was near Antioch, at the passage of Bylan Boghaz, that the Turkish army was defeated by the Egyptians under Ibrahim Pasha, and, in 2 days after, it surrendered (1st Aug. 1832) to him.

'Antioch abounded with great men, and the church in this city was long governed by illustrious prelates; but it suffered much on several occasions, sometimes being exposed to the violence of heresies, and at other times being rent with violent schisms.—The Bp. of Antioch has the title of patriarch, and constantly has had a great share in the affairs of the Eastern church. This city, itself, formerly so beautiful, so flourishing, and so illustrious, is scarcely anything at present but a heap of ruins; the city walls are still standing, but within the city there is nothing but ruins, gardens, and some bad houses. The Orontes runs near it, outside.' See the engraving, p. 62.

In the year 44, Barnabas and Saul returned to Antioch from Jerusalem, whither they had gone with alms, and in 45 departed thence to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles, being separated to that work by the solemn and express appointment of the Holy Spirit. They came first to a fortified seaport, a short way N. of the mouth of the Orontes, 12 miles below Antioch, and named from its founder, Seleucus Nicanor, the most celebrated builder in the world. It was also sometimes called Seleucia ad Mare, (on the sea,) to distinguish it from 9 other cities of the same name, in Syria, and is mentioned in 1 Mac. as the termination of the conquests of Ptolemy Philometor. The ruins of it are now called Kapse, and lie on the side of a rocky mountain, nearly a mile from the ocean.'

'The apostle and his companions, did not, however, remain to preach here, but immediately embarked for the celebrated island of about 60 miles W. or rather S. W. of Seleucia. That it was of great importance, may be gathered from the known fact, that it contained at least 15 cities of considerable note, and was at one time divided into no fewer than 9 kingdoms. This, combined with the fact of its being the native land of Barnabas, and the residence of some Christians who had fled from the Jewish persecution, probably induced P. and his companions to commence their ministerial office there. They may likewise have been influenced by the knowledge of the gross idolatry and infamous wickedness into which the blinded inhabitants had fallen. Venus was the principal deity they worshipped, and, according to the established laws of the country, every woman in it was obliged to prostitute herself to strangers, [thus vilely was foreign trade encouraged!] More need not be said, to give a complete idea of the character of those to whom the apostle, in the spirit of brotherly love and kindness, now went to preach repentance, and forgiveness of their sins.—They landed at afterwards called Constantia, and subsequently Famagusta. In the apostle's day it was a named and extensive city, on the E. shores of Cyprus, and being the first place at which Christianity was preached, it was, in primitive times, constituted the metropolitan city of the island. It is also said, at a subsequent period, to have been the scene where Barnabas, the beloved companion and fellow-laborer of the apostle, suffered martyrdom. At least, his body was long after found here, buried, with a copy of the Gospel of Matthew, written in his own hand, lying on his breast.

Having finished the work given them to do at Salamis, the apostle and his companions crossed the island, preaching at the various towns and cities on their route, till they came to then a celebrated city on its W. coast; but of which 24 or 30 huts are now the miserable remains. In it many Romans of considerable note, as well as an immense number of unconverted Jews, resided. But they were far outnumbered by the priests and worshippers of Venus, who congregated there in thousands. In Paphos, the most celebrated temple of the goddess was erected, and so devoted was the attachment of her followers, that one of her distinguishing names was that of the Paphian and Cyprian queen. Yet P. had great success, even here: the conversion of a person filling so distinguished a situation as Sergius Paulus, induced the Cyprians to listen with much attention to the doctrines of Paul, and although it is historically known, that the worship of Venus continued in the island for nearly 400 years after this period, many persons, following the example of their wise and prudent leader, embraced the Christian faith. Indeed, so rapidly did Christianity spread from Paphos, that although, within 70 years afterwards, no fewer than 240,000 of the Christian inhabitants were murdered by the Jews, its progress could not be checked, and this barbarity only led to the total extermination of the latter race from the island. But religion there now stands at a very low ebb, and, like the country itself, has fallen into a most wretched and desolate condition.'

On leaving Cyprus, P., Barnabas, and John proceeded, in the year 46, from Paphos to Pamphylia, and landing near the mouth of the river Caystras, or Cestros, after a voyage of about 140 miles, they proceeded to the capital of the province, situated on the banks of the river, about 12 miles from the sea. The inhabitants of this city, famed as the birth-place of Apollonius, the geometrician, were worshippers of Dinna, and a celebrated temple was erected to her on an eminence, near the city, and in it solemn festivals were annually observed. Indeed, so devoted were the inhabitants to her worship, that their deity was often distinguished by the name of Dinna Pergena.

P. was met and opposed by the numerous priests of Dinna here, and did not remain long; but at a subsequent period, his preaching appears to have been attended with more success: for a Christian church, of considerable eminence, was established at Perga, and flourished till towards the close of the 8th century. Now it has passed away; and with it, Perga, as a place of any note, may be said to have likewise vanished from the earth.

Taking Titus with them, instead of John, Paul and Barnabas next came to the capital of the small province of Pisidia, and about 90 miles N. of Perga. This town, in which there were great numbers of Jews resident, was also built by Seleucus, in honor of his father; and, to distinguish it from the numerous other cities of the same name in W. Asia, was usually denominated Antiochia Pisidia. The remains, says Arundell, 'consist chiefly of prostrate temples, a theatre, churches, and between 20 and 30 arches of the most magnificently constructed aqueduct I ever beheld. [See the engraving, p. 167.] Immense squared blocks of stones and sculptured fragments, and the quantity of ancient pottery, tell us we were on the site of a great city. The superb members of a temple, which from the thyrsus on many of them, evidently belonged to Bacchus, was the first thing we saw. Passing on, a long and immense building, (160 ft. by 80.) constructed with prodigious blocks of marble, and standing E. and W., exhibited the remains of a church of Antioch! The ground plan, with the circular end for the bema, all were there; perhaps this was one of the very earliest temples consecrated to the Savior! The cut (from Arundell) shows, from the remains, the ground-plan of the church of Antioch, 160 feet long, without the portico, and 80 wide.' 'Perhaps we were standing on the very spot where P. made his admirable sermon; for it is very natural to suppose the oldest church was built on the site of the synagogue. N. are the arches of a grand underground passage, and the platform, and the ground-plan of a very large temple. E. are the remains of a theatre, 150 ft. diam.'

Beyond this, ascending still E., are vestiges of a small church.' Arundell also mentions, as near by, a curious and magnificent portico, or temple of the god Janus, and also foundations of the acropolis, probably. The whole were on the little hill, seen in the left front of the engraving (opposite page). The village in the distance is Yalabatz. The view near the aqueduct was enchanting, comprehending the modern village (Yalabatz), with groves of poplar and weeping willows in the plain; beyond rise the snowy heights of Taurus, under which appeared a lake, probably of Eyerhir. Not a Christian now resides here, except a single Greek in the kham! Antioch has usually been placed 6 hours N., at Aksher, but A. thinks this was Philomelium. 'This was the first city in which the Gospel was publicly preached to the Gentiles; and great success attended it also in the surrounding country.' Driven thence by the unbelieving Jews, they proceeded to

Iconium,

'80 miles E. of Antioch. It was then a large and populous city, situated on the banks of the lake Trogilus, in the richest and most fertile part of Lycaonia, of which province it was the capital. The inhabitants were Jews, Greek proselytes, and idolatrous Gentiles. As at Antioch, so at Iconium, Paul left many firm and zealous professors of Christianity behind him. These propagated the true faith so successfully, that, for a period of 800 years after the apostle's day, the Christian church continued to flourish there. Indeed, the religion so earnestly and uncompromisingly taught by him, can scarcely be said ever to have totally disappeared from the city. It is one of the few places, in which his voice was heard, but survives the wreck of time, and has not yet fallen into ruin and decay. It is now known by the name of Cogni or Konieh, the most remarkable and noted city of Caranania; and although no longer, as once, the seat of empire of the Turkish kings of Lesser Asia, is still the residence of a considerable Pasha. It is surrounded by a strong wall, several miles in circumference, fortified by 108 splendid towers, at equal distances. The infidel alone, it is true, is now allowed to inhabit the city, properly so called, but many Armenians and Christians of the Greek church, with their archbishop, still reside in its suburbs.'

On leaving this place, Paul and his companions fled to another city of Lycaonia, about 45 miles S. from Iconium, and the birth-place of Timothy, where also Lois and Eunice were converted. The headlong stupidity of this ignorant and superstitions people, after worshipping them as gods, was, of course, easily aroused, by interested misrepresentations, to stone Paul as a magician; and left him dead, and contemptuously unburied, upon the highway. Immediately on his miraculous restoration to life, Paul quits Lystra for about 20 miles S. E. of Lystra. Gaius, and the apostle John, were born here; it is not otherwise of any note.

After preaching in the neighboring regions of Phrygia and Galatia, and, as some think, establishing the churches of Colosse, (see Pref. to Col.) Laodicea, (see Pref. to Rev.) and Hierapolis, (see on Col. 4:13) (cities of considerable importance in Phrygia), though this is doubtful, determining to revisit and establish the churches he had planted, the apostle returned from Derbe to Lystra, thence to Iconium, and then to Antioch in Pisidia, 'ordaining elders in every church.' They then retraced their steps to Perga, where he tarried to preach, with what success we are not informed. Leaving it, they come to another city of Pamphylia, founded by Attalus, k. of Pergamus, whence its name. It is situated on a fine bay in the Mediterranean, about 30 miles S. W. of Perga.

'It is now known by the name of Satalia, or Statalia, and is still a place of some consequence, having been preserved from ruin by the Turks, who are careful to keep its fortifications and castle in repair, as a protection to their trade.'

Here they embarked for Antioch in Syria, and arrived there again, after a circuit of 2 or 3 years. At Antioch they remained 2 full years (A. D. 47, 48), during which P. and Barnabas were sent to the Council at Jerusalem, and, returning, made some further stay, probably during the remainder of the year 49, teaching and preaching with many assistants. About the beginning of the year 50, P. proposed to Barnabas to take another circuit through the churches in Asia, but they disagreeing on account of Mark, Barnabas went to Cyprus, and P. taking Silas, passed, through Syria, and Cilicia, (whose churches were probably founded during Paul's 6 years' residence at Tarsus,) to Derbe, and Lystra (where he took Timothy), through Phrygia and Galatia, confirming the churches in those parts, and 'delivering to each a copy of the decretal Epistle of the Council at Jerusalem. Leaving Lystra, the three passed by Antioch to the E., and through Phrygia. 'The inhabitants of this country were proverbially of a servile and stupid temper, "sero sapient Phryges," noted for the effeminacy and lightness of their conversation, superstitious to excess, worshippers of Cybele, and said to have been the inventors of augury, and other kinds of divination. Among these benighted people they do not appear to have made any stay, but passed on to Galatia (so called from the Gauls settled there, see Pref. to Gal.), a region which contained no fewer than 22 considerable cities. Here the apostle was received with marked veneration, and preached most successfully, planting many churches. These attained considerable excellence, and remained in a flourishing condition for 900 years, after which they were reduced by the Mahometans, Saracens, and Turks, and in Galatia Christianity is now almost buried in oblivion.' See Tuzier's trav. 1824.

Forbidden to preach in Asia proper, (Ionia, Eolia, Lydia,) they passed into Mysia; here, among a base and contemptible race, P. preached, and some vestiges of a Christian church have constantly remained there. Hence they would have gone E. to Bithynia, but were forbidden, and came by Lesser Mysia, which separated Bithynia from the region of Troas, to the city and port of its capital, where Luke joined them. 'This city was built on the Hellespont, by Lysimachus, one of Alexander's captains, peopled from the neighboring places, and originally called Alexandria, or Troas Alexandria, in his honor; but it soon lost its more distinguished name, and, with the surrounding country, retained that of Troas merely. Its site was only about 4 miles from that of the famous Troy, and in the apostle's day it was a noted seaport, where travellers from the upper part of Asia usually embarked for Europe.'

Invited to preach in Macedonia, the 4 set sail (A. D. 50,) with a fair wind for Stimothrace, or Samandracchi, as it is now called, an island about 20 miles round, famous anciently for the worship of Ceres, Proserpine, Philo, [Pluto?] Mercury, Castor, Pollux, Neptune, &c. Its religious mysteries (of the Cabiri) were so celebrated, that they were held in equal estimation with the famous Eleusinia mysteries, and foreigners, of the highest character, deemed it an honor to be initiated in them. Paul however did not land here, but, passing it, landed at now Napoli, or Christopolis, a seaport, originally belonging to Thrace, but afterwards taken into Macedonia, and deservedly celebrated as the first spot in Europe trodden by the great apostle's feet.

Here they made no stay, and do not even appear to have preached, yet Christianity has been more or less known and acknowledged by its inhabitants down to the present day.'

Journeying 15 miles further, they came to

Philippi,

'the ancient Dato, but subsequently named Philippi, in honor of Philip, k. of Macedonia, father of Alexander, by whom the city was rebuilt and beautified. It was the chief city of that part of Macedonia, a Roman colony, and the first place belonging to Romans, at which P. was ordained to preach.' As the Romans were under many a brand of prophecy, and detested by the Jews, therefore, perhaps, a supernatural call was given to the work of preaching to them.

'These Roman colonies were of two sorts; the one founded where no city had ever been, or, if it had, was totally destroyed. Such were peopled with none but Romans. The other sort were colonies in cities already built and inhabited, to which persons who had served in the wars, and such Romans as chose, were permitted to remove. These associated with the former inhabitants of the place, but at the same time they had a district of the town assigned to them to inhabit, and a portion of the country to cultivate and till. Both kinds of colonies, however, enjoyed the privileges of Roman citizens, and were governed by Roman laws. Philippi belonged to the latter class, and it is thought that the honor was conferred upon it, both by Julius and Augustus Cesar: by the 1st, in memory of the battle fought on the adjacent plains, betwixt him and Pompey the Great, and by the 2d, in honor of the struggle [there] betwixt him and Mark Antony on the one side, and Brutus and Cassius on the other. Its inhabitants, therefore, were not exclusively Romans, and there were many Jews in the city.'

Hence, after much both endured and enjoyed, Paul proceeds to

Amphipolis,

'This city, now Embolis, was built about 500 B. C. by the famous Athenian Cimon. It was the capital of the 1st division of Macedonia, situated on the confines of Thrace, close to the banks of the river Strymon, and contained about 10,000 inhabitants.'

Apollonia,

through which they next passed, was also a city of Macedonia, betwixt Amphipolis and Thessalonica, and although of not so much consequence as the former, in any point of view, had yet sufficient importance to attract the apostle's attention, and may probably have been the residence of some learned men, as it is known that men of talents did at different periods reside at Apollonia, and that a considerable school, at which Augustus Cesar acquired his knowledge of the Greek language, was established there. It would appear that P. staid not long in these two cities, nor do we read of converts made or churches planted at either. He next arrived at which, both from the length of time he resided there, and the eminent success attending his preaching, deserves more particular notice.

'In ancient days, this splendid city was called Haliis, and Therræ; but Philip, father of Alexander, subsequently named it Thessalonica, in commemoration of a great victory obtained over the Thessalians. In after days, it fell successively into the hands of the Romans, the Saracens, the Greeks, the Venetians, and the Ottoman Turks, in whose possession, under the name of Saloniki, it still continues. Even now it is a place of considerable importance, being upwards of 5 miles in circumference, and containing about 60,000 inhabitants. [See engraving, Pref. to Thess.] The traces, too, if the expression may be used, of the apostle's visit to it, yet remain, in so far as about 30 churches, belonging to the Christians of the Greek church, still rear their heads in the midst of about 50 Jewish synagogues, and an equal number of Mahometan mosques, or temples. This however is but the picture of it in its degenerate days. In the apostle's time, it was the capital of all the countries comprehended in the Roman province of Macedonia, the residence of the proconsul and questor, the seat of government, and a place much resorted to by strangers. Its situation at the bottom of the [deep] Therræic gulf (now Gulf of Saloniki), admirably adapted it for commerce, and consequently the trade carried on by its inhabitants was most extensive. A great number of Jews, too, resided in it, and there was, at least, one, if not more, synagogues in the city. All these circumstances combined, and especially the consideration, that Thessalonica was [like Antioch] the temporary residence of so many foreign merchants, who, on their return to their own countries, would naturally publish the conversion of the inhabitants, and an account of the miracles by which they had been converted, induced the apostle to take up his abode there longer than usual.'

'P.'s great success here, among a people whose minds were probably enlarged by their wide intercourse with mankind, excited, of course, the inveterate hostility of the Jews. In every large town, particularly of a mercantile description, there are hosts of idle and dissolute characters to be found, lingering about the market, and other places of public resort. To these the Jews applied, and, by mingled persuasions and promises, easily induced them, knowing little, and caring less about the matter, to adopt their views. The train thus ignited, and the [propensities] of a promiscuous rabble excited, it was an easy matter [by a few popular catchwords, perhaps] for the designing agitators to turn the fury of the mob in any direction they chose. The tumult and uproar having spread to an enormous extent, they accordingly seized the proper moment, and directed the popular attention to the house of Jason, where they knew the apostle lodged, in the hope, doubtless, of laying violent hands on him, and inducing the people at once to sacrifice him in their blind and [hellish] zeal. In this hope they were disappointed; and P.'s friends, fearing the probable result of another attempt, conveyed him and Silas out of the city by night, and set them forward on their way to another great and populous city of Macedonia, near the Therræic gulf, about 40 miles W. of Thessalonica. The noble (for they loved truth, come whence it would) and candid disposition of the Bereans received the Gospel with greater favor, but his Thessalonian enemies pursuing Paul thither, at last drove him from Berea (where, however, he leaves Silas and Timothy awhile) to

Athens,

'situated in a [once] beautiful plain of Attica, the fairest part of Greece,—on the gulf of the Ægean, which runs up to the Morea. [See its plan on the map.] It lay about 250 miles to the S. of Berea, and 35 E. of Corinth, [and, in its splendor, was 22 miles in circuit.] At the period of the apostle's visit, it maintained its place as one of the most renowned cities in the world; although it unquestionably had then somewhat retrograded from its pristine splendor, in consequence of the seat of government having been fixed at Corinth, after the conquest of Greece had been completed by the Romans. It was still, however, so celebrated, as being the seat of science, philosophy, and the arts, and, according to Cicero, the fountain whence civility, learning, religion, and the laws flowed to all other nations, that it deservedly obtained the name of the University of the Roman Empire and the world. It was flocked to from all quarters, for the purpose of acquiring knowledge in every branch of literature, and so essential was it to completing the education of the man of wisdom and manners, to have been there, that, according to an old writer, "He who had not seen Athens was accounted a block; he who had seen it, and was not in love with it, a dull, stupid ass; and he who, after having seen it, could be willing to leave it, fit for nothing but to be a packhorse." Yet, notwithstanding the many advantages the inhabitants of this splendid city enjoyed,—notwithstanding their eloquence, their learning, their talents, their wit, their knowledge of the arts and sciences, and of all that might be presumed, in the eyes of a misjudging world, to raise man above his fellow-man, it remains as matter of deep regret to be added, that they were sunk in the grossest superstition and idolatry.'

What then must have been the benevolent, the truly wise apostle's thoughts, the grief of his keenly sensitive heart, while walking among the 30,000 idols of Athens! He is brought before the court of Areopagus, not indeed as an accused person, but that his new doctrines, 'if they met the approbation of the Areopagites, might receive their sanction, and be admitted, with the rest, into the extensive code of their religious regulations.' How discouraging the prospect of success for the simple story of the uncompromising Gospel, whose first word sweeps all other religions away!

This court or senate-house, we must recollect, 'was situated upon Mars-hill,—in former times, almost in the centre of the city, although now, [see the plan on the map, here with,] entirely without its bounds. Its foundations, formed of enormous blocks of stone, upon which a terrace or platform was raised, still remain to show its great extent. In the centre of the platform there was a tribunal [the pyx, still to be seen] cut from the solid rock, and all around it seats, likewise made of stone, were ranged in a semi-circular form. There the senate met, and in the open air heard and determined every cause. The wisdom and uprightness guiding the decisions of this court, which, before the conquest of Greece by the Romans, used to judge in all causes, both of a civil and religious nature, were held in such esteem, that even after the Roman proconsuls had been sent to rule in Greece, it was no uncommon thing for them to refer difficult causes to the judgment of the Areopagites. But, in the apostle's day, their consequence and splendor had both dwindled away,—their jurisdiction in civil matters was at an end,—and although they still pretended to judge of those of a religious nature, and maintained that no strange worship could be introduced till it had first received their approbation, their celebrated court-house had, in fact, become little more than a point of meeting, or place of general rendezvous, for those who desired either to tell or hear something new.'

Here, then, P. stood, beneath the clear sky of that classic land, in the midst of a countless crowd of human beings; around him lay the plain, studded with temples, and palaces, amid groves of olives and other trees; the marble porticoes of the academy, and gardens full of art; beyond, circled the blue hills, opening behind him upon the sparkling sea; in front, arose the perfect temple of Theseus, the forum, and the populous city; stretching to the right, towered terrace upon terrace, palace, theatre, and many-columned temple, up the steep hill of the Acropolis, crowned with the everlasting Parthenon. How difficult his task, to turn the attention of such an auditory, in such a place, from the things of time to those of eternity!

'Though there are still thousands of remains of antiquity at Athens, the birth-place of Solon, Socrates, Aristides, Demosthenes, Miltiades, Themistocles, and hundreds of others celebrated in philosophy, oratory, and war, is for ever gone. The modern city, [see the engraving, at Acts 17:] now made the capital of the Kingdom of Greece, does not contain above 10,000 inhabitants; but, strange to say, notwithstanding the little success which attended the preaching of the apostle, Christianity has maintained its footing, and lingered around the ruined shrines of Athens till the present day. About three fourths of its inhabitants are now Christians, and have a bishop at their head.' Flourishing schools, also, are supported and taught there, by Christians of our own distant land, which promise, under her present protestant king, incalculable good to regenerated Greece.

Corinth

was P.'s next station; here he remained a yr. and 6 mo., i. e. the latter part of A. D. 51, the whole of 52, and the early part of 53. 'This city, anciently called Epirus, is supposed to have been founded in the time of Solomon. For many centuries it was governed by a race of kings, and subsequently by an aristocracy, till the time of the consul Mummius, who took and reduced it to ashes, in revenge of a gross insult, put by the inhabitants upon the Roman ambassadors. About a century after, it was rebuilt by Julius Cesar, and peopled with a Roman colony. It then became the capital of Greece, and one of the fairest cities of the world. The citadel, called Acr-cornibus, built upon an almost inaccessible promontory, rendered it well-nigh impregnable; and this, joined to its central position upon the narrow isthmus betwixt the Peloponnesus, or Morea, and the continent of Greece, open to the Adriatic and Ægean, by its suburbs, the seaports of Lecheum, on the Gulf of Lepanto, and Cenchea on the Gulf of

ACTS.—CONCLUDING NOTE.

Egina, enabled it, on the W. and on the E., to command a lucrative and increasing trade with every quarter of the known world. In consequence, the inhabitants soon became enriched, and when the apostle arrived, it had become more famed for its extent and population, and the philosophy, politeness, learning, and wealth of its inhabitants, than any other city in Greece. But how worse than futile is intellectual without moral education! While the arts and sciences flourished in so fair a soil, they brought pride of heart in their train, and the exuberant riches of the people produced many sorts of iniquity and vice. Lasciviousness was a reigning sin among the Corinthians, and so far was the grossest idolatry recognised, that a splendid temple was erected to the worship of Venus, in the vile service of which some thousand females were employed. The fact, that the infamous Thais, supposed to have been one of these, demanded 10,000 drachms for one night's lodging, most effectually discloses one manner in which the wealth of the inhabitants was squandered, and the grossness of the abomination into which they had sunk. No wonder, then, that here a fearful dejection of mind should have weighed down even the firmness of the apostle, requiring the immediate interposition of his Master to comfort and encourage him. Acts 18:9, 10. Thus strengthened, his success was great; and a new source of doing good, viz. by writing, seems now first to have opened itself to his mind, and from Corinth he wrote several of his epistles.

The considerable church Paul labored so hard to establish in this celebrated city, sunk, at no distant period, into a wretched and degenerate condition: false teachers arose among the Corinthians; disorders and schisms were the consequences; some of the disciples pretended to be followers of P.—some of Peter,—some of Apollos,—and some, discarding all minor teachers, pretended to be followers of Jesus Christ alone. Yet, notwithstanding this confusion, the church did not, as might have been expected, fall to pieces. It has maintained a place at Corinth to the present day, and one half of the inhabitants are still Christians, with an archbishop at their head. But Corinth is now a decayed and desolate place. [see Pref. to I Cor.:] containing, at the highest, not more than 2000 miserable inhabitants. Embarking at

Cenchrea,
Ephesus.

(Note, Rom. 16:1.) Paul, on his way to Cesarea and Jerusalem, sails 250 miles, to the extent, trade, and wealth of this metropolis of proconsular Asia, has already been mentioned, and its famous temple described. It was 'beautiful for situation,' being 'in the side of a gently sloping hill, by the banks of the river Cayster, with a far extended verdant plain, stretching to the W.' See the engraving, Pref. to Eph.; also another, p. 166, which shows its theatre, Ac. 19:29. The cut herewith is a plan of the Grecian theatre, from Vitruvius; it differs a little from the Roman; comp. cut, Ac. 19:29.

'Lost and degraded as the Ephesians were, the apostle, during his short stay among them, at this period, made a stronger impression than he had done upon the minds of many a more enlightened people.'—Proceeding 700 miles, to Cesarea, P. went thence to Jerusalem, and thence to Antioch in Syria, where he made some stay, in 54, then through the remainder of Syria and Cilicia, and again visited all the churches of Galatia and Phrygia, and came back to Ephesus. During this residence, probably about the beginning of the year 56, P. received and answered a letter from Corinth. 'Combining example with instruction too, he not only led a blameless life, during the full two years he staid here, but even with the world of employment he had upon his hands, labored for his own maintenance, that no aspersions might [in this trading community] be cast upon the purity of his motives, nor the greatest enemy of the Gospel have it in his power to say, that he taught its precepts for the sake of worldly gain. The consequences were brilliant in the extreme. Ephesus was the resort of many strangers, some of whom flocked thither to pay reverence to their renowned goddess; others to be instructed in the arts of sorcery and magic, for which the city stood in high repute,—others to prefer their suits and solicitations to the Roman governor of the province,—others for the sake of commerce; and not a few to learn more of those doctrines and miracles, of which they had heard so much, and with their own ears to listen to the instructions the apostle gave. An innumerable multitude of these wayfaring people were converted to the Christian faith, and each returning to his own home, preached the Gospel to his benighted kinsmen; so that, ere Paul's stay at Ephesus was at an end, the joyful tidings had not only been heard throughout the whole land, even from one end of Lesser Asia to the other, but many churches were founded, to which the apostle subsequently referred, when he declared that "they had not seen his face in the flesh."'

'The church, decayed in the 6th century, was finally crushed by the Mohammedan power, and Ephesus is now levelled in the dust. Scarcely one stone remains on the top of another; [the foundations only of some churches may be traced, and one is now a mosque:] the site of the temple is unknown, and, with the exception of a few wretched and dependent Greek peasants, inhabiting some miserable huts at Aiasuluk, not a living being breathes within its walls. Its candlestick has indeed "been removed out of its place."'

'On his departure (A. D. 55) from Ephesus,' says Horne, 'P. went first to Troas, expecting to meet Titus, on his return from Corinth, (2 Cor. 2:12, 13.) Here he preached a short time with great success, and then proceeded to Macedonia, where he received the contributions for Judea. In his progress (in 57) from Macedonia into Greece, he is supposed to have preached on the confines of Illyricum. [N. of Macedonia,] as mentioned in Rom. 15:19. [Remains of the church established here still exist.] He continued three months in Greece, principally, it is supposed, at Corinth (whence he wrote Rom.); and having received the contributions, sailed from Philippi to Troas,' and thence to

Mylene.

'20 miles S. of Troas, celebrated only for its quarries of sarcophagus [flesh-consuming] stone.' Here he neither preached nor remained for any time, but set sail for about 40 miles S. It was the principal city of Lesbos, one of the largest islands of the Archipelago, celebrated as the birth-place of Alceus, the poet; Pittacus, one of the 7 wise men; Diaphnes, the orator; Theophanes, the historian; and Arion, the musician. The whole island was sometimes called Mytilene, and sometimes Pentapolis, from its 5 cities, Issa, Pyrrha, Eressos, Arisba, and Mytilene. There was no Christian church in it for many centuries after the apostle's time. At the present day, although not a place of any consequence, it is fortified and garrisoned by the Turks.

now Scio, 'a considerable island, famed both in ancient and modern days for its wine, its figs, and its marble: and now for its excellent mastic. Here, more than in all the Turkish dominions, Christians have enjoyed the greatest civil and religious liberty, secured by treaty, with Mahomet II., and unviolated; but on the rebellion of the Greeks, the Turks perpetrated a general massacre of its Greek inhabitants.' 'Previous to the 5th cent. when the first Christian church was established, human sacrifici-ces were common here. Many Genoese now inhabit it. 50 miles S. E., Paul came to for many ages a state of considerable impotence, and governed as a commonwealth. But from the days of the apostle, downward, the Persians, Greeks, Romans, Saracens, and Turks, have in turns mastered it. Here Juno and Pythagoras were born, and Lycurgus died. Fear of the numerous pirates of those seas, has caused the Thruka almost to desert it, but many Christians (remnants of the church established in the 2d century) reside there, under an archbishop. Stretching a short way E., the vessel next touched at a promontory and small town at the foot of Mt. Mycale, on the Asiatic coast. Here he landed, and sailing next morning, arrived that evening at the capital of Caria and Ionia, then noted for its extensive harbors, capable of containing the whole Persian fleet,—for its neighborhood to the famous river Meander, winding through the surrounding plains,—and for its splendid temple of Apollo. It was founded by Cretans, and from its 4 harbors, extended its commerce and colonies to remote regions, as the Black Sea, and some think to Ireland even. They retained independence till they agreed to pay Cressus tribute; withstood Darius, and Alexander, who took their city, but pardoned and liberated them. They took the side of the Romans in the Antiochian war. 'The church established here in the 5th cent. maintained itself 400 years, when it altogether disappeared, and since the Saracens ravaged the surrounding country, the city has followed it, and now only exists in the few miserable huts of Melas.' It is still called Palat, or Palatia, 'the Palaces.' The ruins of a theatre, of 457 ft. marble front, heathen walls, pedestals, broken arches, inscriptions, and some fragments of churches, remain; rubbish and thickets overspread the whole site of the city. 'Here P. sent for the church elders at Ephesus, 36 miles off, and gave them his affecting farewell charge. On the day after he reached island and town, 30 miles S. W., formerly celebrated for its stately temples of Juno and Apollo, its wines, and transparent robes; also as the birth-place of Hippocrates and Apollon. So early as Jehoshaphat, it was a separate kingdom, but fell under the Persians, Parthians, and Romans, in turn. Christianity was introduced about 300 years after P.'s visit, but it never flourished much, and when the island, now called Staniora, Lango, or Zia, indifferently, fell under the Saracens, it was almost totally lost. 40 miles S. E. he came to the famous 10 miles from the coast, 40 long, 15 broad, and once sacred to the sun; no one need to be reminded of its colossus, [on the most picturesque site in the world,]—of the expertness of its navigators,—its romantic scenery,—its fertile soil,—the exquisite clearness of its air,—the delicious brightness of its climate,—its myriads of fragrant roses, whence some derive its name,—nor of the height of excellence to which the study of eloquence and the mathematics was carried there. At this time it was part of the province of the islands; afterwards it fell, in turn, to the Saracens, Greeks, Seljukian Turks, the gallant knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and the Ottomans. Christianity was introduced about the middle of the 4th cent., and still has footing among the oppressed Greeks, now, with the Spanish Jews, its principal inhabitants, who number about 30,000. [Of the view (cut), from the heights above Rhodes, an eyewitness says, 'Its beauty, unsurpassed in the E., is augmented by the excessive purity of the atmosphere: how clearly, almost ethereally, distinct is each distant bark on the channel, and each mountain-peak, precipice, and forest of Asia! It is a splendid panorama, over which, at noon, there is a pale purple haze, like a faint shroud, which, as the sun sinks lower, melts away. The ruins of the ancient kingdoms of Asia Minor, stretched out upon the opposite capes and hills, desolate and solitary, are almost visible to fancy's eye; at least, there are dim forms and shadows which resemble them.' How glorious were the scenes of peopled Asia, where P. was born and bred, and wandered; yet he forgot all for Christ!]

This important naval power founded colonies in Sicily, Italy, and Spain; its commercial laws were adopted as the basis of maritime law on all the Mediterranean coasts, and some fragments still retain their authority. This island was the last barrier of Christian chivalry to Ottoman power; it was taken by Solyman II., after six months' siege in 1523. Paul next came to a 'maritime city of Syria, in Asia Minor, much celebrated for the excellence of its harbors, and the beauty and magnificence of its many splendid temples; one of which was dedicated to Apollo, and contained an oracle no ways inferior to Delphi. Christianity was introduced here in the 4th cent., and flourished till the Saracens' conquest in the 9th. Its fair harbor is now choked with sand, and its far-spread ruins attest its ancient greatness. Here Paul took another ship for a strong place, even in Joshua's time.' See Ezek. 27: end, and cut, Is. 23:1. The cut of the colored page, herewith, shows part of the mole now left. The fate of the continental city is what Ezekiel foretold; and what Zechariah (9:3.) said of the insular city is also come to pass! It was finally razed by the Mamelukes of Egypt, to prevent its being a refuge for the persecuted Christians. After praying in an oriental manner, and fasting, he left for

Ptolemais.

'30 miles distant, now called Acre. Few cities have undergone more reverses. When given to the tribe of Ashur, it was called Achza; Ptolemy Philadelphus, rebuilding it, named it Ptolemais. In the Crusades it suffered much, both from the Infidels and Christians; in the middle ages it was a place of great magnificence and strength, and called Acre or Acre, and St. John D'Acre, from the Knights Hospitaliers. It is still one of the most considerable cities on the coast, but is most distinguished for its ruins. The most extensive are of the churches of St. Andrew and St. John. Hence P. went to Cesarea, 30 miles S., thence to Jerusalem.' Hence he was at last hurried away, a prisoner, as we have seen, by night, 40 miles, to a small town 'in a beautiful and fertile plain, and formerly called Capharsalma, or Caphar Saba, but being beautified and repaired by Herod the Great, he called it Antipatris, in honor of his father. Reposing here till the next morning, they then started for Cesarea.'

After a long imprisonment, and several hearings, P., obliged by Jewish malice, appeals to Rome, and accordingly being put under a proper guard, he is shipped from this port for the imperial city. 'Luke and Aristarchus accompany him in his adversity. The ship first touches at

60 miles N., a city as old as the days of Noah; famed in time for high mercantile character, luxury, and wealth, it has undergone many changes. Early preached here, the Gospel, amid all its reverses, has still maintained a place in it; and although its trade is long ago destroyed, its harbors choked up, its streets sunk in silence and gloom, it still has 16,000 inhabitants, the great majority Christians. Instead of stretching directly across the sea, P. and his companions were compelled, by contrary winds, to coast along, and disembarked at a considerable city of Lycia, and entered a large Alexandrian ship, laden with Egyptian grain, going to Italy. Variable winds drove them as far as Cape Cnidus. (now Crio.) with a city of worshippers of Venus. They did not touch here, but, the wind changing, they sailed S., passed the promontory of Salmone, (now Salmine,) at the E. end of Crete, and, steering W., they came to

This port (still so called) is on the S. E. part of the island, near Lasea, a considerable town, which could furnish needed supplies; so they reposed here many days.

Crete.

Availing himself of this delay, P. went ashore, and preached the Gospel with success in this island, one of the largest in the Mediterranean. Once it contained upwards of 100 cities, and is supposed to have been originally peopled by the Philistines who fled from Canaan in the days of Joshua, (and from Egypt, in earlier days?) Subsequently to the Trojan war, many Greeks immigrated to it. Its ancient inhabitants were famous for [laws,] archery. [2 S. 8:18.] falsehood, debauchery, and piracy. They long had kings, then a commonwealth for many centuries, till conquered by the Romans. Saracens, Greeks, Venetians, and Ottoman Turks, have since held it in turn; and [it is now under the Viceroy of Egypt, and] called Candia, or Candy.—P. succeeded in establishing a church here, and Christianity has ever since had a footing in the island, though now, like it, at the lowest ebb. Towards the end of September they left Fairhavens to winter at a commodious and sheltered port, on the W. side of Crete. But a furious N. E. wind drove them off, and thus they passed a vision P. had, and at last, though the ship was lost, all on board got safe to land, in a little creek, still called the bay of St. Paul, on the island of Malta.

This is 60 miles from Africa, and has its name from having been a refuge to Tyrians, on their way to Spain. It is about 60 miles round, and formerly was only a barren rock, with 12,000 miserable inhabitants; but now, after having successively passed under the Phocians, Phœnicians, Carthaginians, Romans, Goths, Saracens, Sicilians, Knights of St. John, the French, and English, who now possess it, it has become quite the reverse, and produces abundance of fruit, cotton, and other productions, and contains nearly 50,000 inh., among whom a sort of half-breathing Christianity still exists.

The high probability that "St. Paul's bay" is the scene of the events of Acts 27: [will give interest to the following sketch.] The ship might have anchored at a or b. The inlet c has very much the appearance of a creek, and would lead us to think that the anchorage was at b; m is an island, and "two seas meet" at d, where the water is too shallow for such a vessel as P. was in to pass through. Whether the anchorage was at a or at b, the ship might "fall into" this place, and run aground. With the Euroclydon, or N. E. wind, (the present Levanter,) she would not indeed be likely to fall upon d, if the mariners, after getting under way at b, steered for the creek at c; but they might have managed unskillfully, or more probably the wind had changed to the S. E. or S. There is a "shore" or good [beach or] landing-place, at e, and also at g, and on the creek c. From the island m to n (where the Maltese pretend Publius had a country-house) is upwards of a mile. The rock at the point s, where are salt-works, runs under water, and some have supposed the vessel struck on this point, and that we are to understand the phrase, "where two seas meet," of the meeting of the waves, on the opposite sides of such a low projection; but at e, it would now be scarcely possible, after a storm, to effect a general landing on boards and pieces of a ship. [The sand-bank at b, (not noted in Dr. A.'s sketch,) being thrown up by them, shows that opposing currents exist, arising from the sea-flow in and out of St. Paul's bay, and from the N. through the gut d s; so it is likely the vessel cast anchor S. of Selmonë, under its shelter, and struck on the N. E. point of the sand-bank b, between d and b, the bank probably running farther in that direction than is indicated.] "If the vessel struck at d, (the traditional place,) it would be possible to land at e, especially if the wind had changed to the southward, as the shore is near, low, and sandy, and the water shallow. At g and c are also fine landings. The shore at p is precipitous, at r, rough and dangerous." Rev. Dr. Anderson. 'Obs. on the Peloponnesus,' &c.: from which the lettering, and view below, of the appearance of the shores and opening at p, d, m, are taken: h, palace; i, fort; j, n, battery, k, tower; l, St. Paul's castle.

After an interesting and successful stay at Malta, of three months, Paul sails to Syracuse, one of the most renowned and splendid cities of ancient time. It was founded 700 B. C. on the E. of Sicily, commanding a beautiful prospect, both by sea and land; its harbor was surrounded with splendid buildings, supported on walls of white marble. In its best days it contained 1,200,000 inhabitants, was 22 miles in circumference, and not only the largest, but far the wealthiest of the Greek cities in any part of the world. Its standing army was 100,000 foot, and 10,000 horse, and it had a navy of 500 vessels in its capacious harbors. Its 4 parts, divided by their walls, were respectively famous for splendid temples of Jupiter, and of Fortune, an amphitheatre, with a statue of Apollo, two temples to Diana and Minerva, and the fountain of Arethusa. Here Archimedes was killed, 250 years before, when the Romans took and almost entirely destroyed it. But under Augustus it recovered part of its splendor, till the Saracens razed it. Only one of these parts, Ortygia, is now peopled; its narrow streets have a dejected, sickly population, of 15,000. P. remained here 3 days, and then embarking, landed on the following day at Rhegium, now Reggio, on the S. coast of Italy, where he tarried a day; but starting again, a fair wind brought them, in 24 hours, through the straits of Messina to Puteoli,

(the little wells,) now Pozzuoli, in the kingdom of Naples, and near its chief city, about 100 miles S. of Rome. Pozzuoli is built on a hill, opposite the renowned Baie of the Romans, and has, in its bounds, 35 natural hot-baths, of different mineral waters. It abounds in Roman antiquities, and is still a bishoprick. Here P. was entertained by Christian friends 7 days, after which he went to Appii Forum, an ancient city of the Volsci, 51 miles from Rome, where a numerous body met him to honor his approach: 18 miles further they reached Tres Tabernæ, or 3 Taverns, another city on the Appian way, where another party of brethren met them, and so they entered Rome. Its state at that time will be seen by the plan on the map. '3 days after his arrival, P. stated his case to the Jews of Rome. For 2 years he dwelt in his hired house, supported in part, at least, by the affectionate contributions of the Philippians. Called before the emperor Nero, all his friends deserted him for fear; but, though dismissed with contempt from the presence, his eloquent defence impressed some of Nero's court,—as Terpes, afterwards martyred, of high rank in his household; also, Nero's cup-bearer, and Poppæa Sabina, one of Nero's concubines, and Onesimus.'

He gloriously improved this period of restraint from his more active labors, too, in writing, for the unspeakable furtherance of true religion, those precious epistles to the Philippians, the Colossians, and the Ephesians. 'His first act, when freed' as tradition states, (the Jews not daring nor able to accuse him,) 'was, to proceed on his Gentile mission, N. through the greater part of Italy, and during his journey he wrote Hebrews. Crossing the sea to Spain, he preached in various places; then turning N. he journeyed through France, and, in the 66th year of his age, crossed into Britain, then a Roman colony. From its wealthy, populous, and flourishing capitals, London and Verulam, the intercourse with Rome was mutual and constant. Many Britons of high rank had been at Rome, and many distinguished Romans visited Britain. The progress of Christianity in other parts, therefore, was well known to the Britons, and they received P. gladly. The blessed light of the Gospel soon dispelled their dark and gloomy superstitions. May it, constantly grow brighter and broader with the growing influence, upon the world, of all who speak the English language, now, by the blessing of God, the most active of the nations in propagating Christianity. God grant they may both practise and spread it, in all its primitive power and purity!

After 9 months in Spain, France, and Britain, P. went to Crete and preached; then (making Titus Bishop of Crete) he visited Judea, in her afflicted state, just before her final revolt and ruin. From Antioch, first, passing through the surrounding country, he travelled through Cilicia, the greater part of Galatia, to Colosse, preaching and exhorting at all the various cities on this extended route. Thence he went to Ephesus, Troas, and Philippi, where he remained some time. Then to Nicopolis, a considerable city on the Danube, whence he wrote Titus. Remaining till the winter was over, he then passed S. through Macedonia to Corinth, where he made a short stay. Embarking at Cenchræa, he landed once more at Troas, whence, after a short stay, he went to Timothy, at Ephesus. Shortly, he again set his face towards Rome, where he arrived soon after the commencement of Nero's first general persecution. Nero, being absent in Greece, his counterpart, Helius, the governor, imprisoned Paul as a principal leader of the obnoxious Christian sect.'

The cut is of the Mamertine prison, where, tradition says, Peter and Paul were confined by Nero. It is considered the oldest monument of Rome, and attributed to Ancus Martius, its 4th king; the lower cell, to Servius Tullius. It is under a little church, behind the arch of Severus, on the declivity of the Capitoline hill. This lower cell is 6 1-2 feet high, 19 long, and 9 wide; of Cyclopean architecture, the large stones being strangely united by iron cramps. The cell above it is 27 1-2 ft. by 19 1-2, and 14 high, hewn from the solid rock. By the circular aperture at top, prisoners condemned to be starved or strangled were thrust down. Here Jugurtha was starved to death, and others of note. 2 Timothy contains several allusions to Paul's second and severe imprisonment. 'In this imprisonment P. converted many poor prisoners, and even 2 of their centurions, Processus and Martinian; and wrote 2 Tim., justly called by Chrys. his "last testament," [note, 2 Tim. 1:16, 17.] which should, therefore, be peculiarly precious to us. The "crown" he panted for in the last vs. of that, his last letter, he soon obtained. The evil-minded later of Christianity returned to Rome. P. was taken from prison, and, with but little form of trial, condemned to die; the only privilege accorded to him being, that, as a Roman citizen, he should suffer by the sword. His usefulness ceased not in this last extremity; he converted three of the guard which led him to execution. He was led, bound, and in fetters, to the Salvian waters, about 3 miles from Rome, where, on the 29th of June, A. D. 66, and in the 68th year of his age, he closed his life of persecution and trial. His remains were interred in the Via Ostiensis [map], and over them Constantine erected a splendid church, afterwards greatly beautified and added to. All of it has since been burnt, but another stately fabric is now building in its place.'
